Special "evenings" dot the course of the remaining concerts. On Wednesday next the "request" programme of last week will be repeated. Monday will be devoted to Italian selections, Verdi predominating. The overture to that composer's "La Forza del Destino," the prelude to "Aida," a fantasia from "Il Trovatore," and the introduction to "Otello," hold places of prominence. Tuesday brings tribute from the Russians. Less hackneyed pieces then to be performed are Glinka's "Kamarinskaja," and the hopak from Mousorgsky's "Fair of Sorochinsk." Rubinstein's wedding march from "Feramors" serves as overture. On Thursday operatic snatches will predominate, selections from "The Prophet," "Mignon," "Der Rosenkavalier," "La Bohême," "Lohengrin," "Rigoletto," "The Jewels of the Madonna," "La Gioconda," "Pagliacci," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Samson and Delilah" being listed. Friday brings five well-tested pieces from Wagnerian scores, and Saturday a medley of miscellaneous tunes and symphonic numbers, ranging from Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave" to Sousa's throbbing march, "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

At The Pops Tonight

Hungarian Mareh ....Berlioz
Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Waltz, '"Sunny Days" ....Holy
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Roumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Eili, Eili ....Arranged by Jacchia
Canzone ....Van Westerhout
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Marche Slave ....Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ....Strauss
Indian Wedding Festival.........Baron

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JUNE 30

Closing Week of Pop Concerts

The coming week will be the last of the Pop season in Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia and the Pop Symphony orchestra will be heard in a different special program on each of the six remaining nights.

Monday, July 2, will have an Italian-Verdi program; Tuesday, July 3, a Russian program.

On Wednesday, July 4, the request program will be repeated for the convenience of the many who could not gain admittance on Request night.

Thursday will bring an operatic, and Friday a Wagnerian program.

The Italian-Verdi program on Monday follows:

Italian Royal March..............Gabetti
Overture to "Norma"..............Bellini
Camellia Gavotte..............Jacchia
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"......Puccini
Overture to "La Forza del Destino"...
Prelude to "Aida"...............
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"...........Verdi
Introduction to "Othello" ("The Tempest")...
Rhapsody, "Italia"..............Casella
Legende..............Troccoli
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris".......Mascagni

TUESDAY, JULY 3
Russian program

Wedding March from "Feramors"...Rubinstein
Flower Waltz..............Tschaikovsky
Hindu Song from "Sadko"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale, "Fourth Symphony".......Tschaikovsky
Last Movement from "Scheherazade"..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Kamarinskaja"..............Glinka
"Eili, Eili"..........Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Overture Solonnelle, "1812"......Tchaikovsky
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"......Tchaikovsky
Russian Folk Songs.....Arr. by Aggie Jacchia
Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk".. Moussorgsky

WEDNESDAY, JULY 4
Request program (repeated)

March, "Pomp and Circumstance".......Elgar
Overture to William Tell"............Rossini
"Eili, Eili"............Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida"....................Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt"...................Grieg
Largo.............................Handel
Parade of the Wooden Soldiers..........Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody............Liszt
Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"..........Wagner

THURSDAY, JULY 5
Operatic program

Coronation March from "The Prophet".. Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon"................Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosengavalier"..R. Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme"...............Puccini
Quartet from "Rigoletto"...............Verdi
Introduction, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna"...........Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana from "La Gioconda"..........Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais"...................Massenet
Two Intermezzi—
(a) From "Pagliacci"..........Leoncavallo
(b) From "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".. Saint-Saens

FRIDAY, JULY 6
Wagner program

Prelude to "Carmen"................Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"..........Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights"..............Strauss
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie".......
Prelude to "Lohengrin"........... Wagner
Dreams.............
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz)
"The Ride of the Valkyries".......
Overture to "Tannhauser"...........
Preludes Op. 28, Nos. 3-4-7-20—Chopin-Jacchia
Reverie.............................Going
First Hungarian Dance...............Brahms

SATURDAY, JULY 7
Closing night

First Slavonic Dance................Dvorak
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".......Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"......Czabulsa
Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"................Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody..............Liszt
Deep River...............Burleigh-Jacchia
Serenade.....(Arr. by Agide Jacchia) Schubert
Marche Slave.................Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana.....Mascagni
Waltz, "Espana"................Waldteugel
"Stars and Stripes Forever"...........Sousa
"Auld Lang Syne"

TRAV. JUNE. 30

LAST WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

The coming week will be the last of the Pop season in Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia and the Pop Symphony orchestra will be heard in a different special program on each of the six remaining nights.

Monday, July 2, will have an Italian-Verdi program; Tuesday, July 3, a Russian program.

On Wednesday, July 4, the Request program will be repeated for the convenience of the many who could not gain admittance on Request night.

Thursday will bring an Operatic and Friday a Wagnerian program.

Mr. Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Hungarian March, Berlioz; Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Waltz, "Sunny Days," Holy; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Agide Jacchia; Canzone, Van Westerhout; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Marche Slave, Tschaikovsky; Waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; Indian Wedding Festival, Baron.

TELE. JUNE. 30

"Pops" Program for Tonight

Hungarian March ....Berlioz
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" ....Mozart
Waltz "Sunny Days" ....Holy
Fantasia, "Aida" ....Verdi
Rumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
"Eili, Eili" arranged by Agide Jacchia
Canzone ....Van Westerhout
Overture to "Tannhäuser"...Wagner
Marche Slave ....Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".......Strauss
Indian Wedding Festival......Baron

MONITOR. JUNE 30

LAST WEEK OF POPS

A special program will be given at each of the remaining nights of the Pops season in Symphony hall, which begin their last week tomorrow. Monday night will have an Italian-Verdi program, which Agide Jacchia, the Italian Pops conductor, is particularly well fitted to interpret. On Tuesday, July 3, there will be a Russian program. On Wednesday, July 4, the request program will be repeated in order to accommodate the innumerable Pop fans who were unable to gain admission last Wednesday. Thursday's program will be operatic, and Friday's Wagnerian.

The programs of the week follow:

Monday, July 2.
ITALIAN-VERDI PROGRAM

1. Italian Royal March..........Gabetti
2. Overture to "Norma"...........Bellini
3. Camellia Gavotte.............Jacchia
4. Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" Puccini
5. Overture to "La Forza del Destino" Giuseppe Verdi
6. Prelude to "Aida".....Giuseppe Verdi
7. Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" Giuseppe Verdi
8. Introduction to "Othello" ("The Tempest")...............Giuseppe Verdi
9. Rhapsody, "Italia"............Casella
10. Legende ....Troccoli
11. Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" Mascagni

Tuesday, July 3.
RUSSIAN PROGRAM

1. Wedding March from "Feramors" Rubinstein
2. Flower Waltz..........Tchaikovsky
3. Hindu song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakoff
4. Finale, "Fourth Symphony" Tchaikovsky
5. Last Movement from "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
6. "Kamarinskaja" ....Glinka
7. "Eili, Eili".Arranged by Agide Jacchia
8. Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tchaikovsky
9. Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tchaikovsky
10. Russian Folk Songs Arranged by Agide Jacchia
11. Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" Moussorgsky

Wednesday, July 4
REQUEST PROGRAM (REPEATED)

1. March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
2. Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
3. "Eili, Eili".Arranged by Agide Jacchia
4. Fantasia, "Aida"..........Verdi
5. Suite, "Peer Gynt"...........Grieg
6. Largo...........Handel
7. Parade of the Wooden Soldiers..Jessel
8. Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
9. Ouverture Solonnelle, "1812" Tchaikovsky
10. Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"..........Strauss
11. "The Ride of the Valkyries"..Wagner

Thursday, July 5
OPERATIC PROGRAM

1. Coronation March from "The Prophet"...........Meyerbeer
2. Overture to "Mignon"........Thomas
3. Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" R. Strauss
4. Fantasia, "La Boheme"........Puccini
5. Prelude to "Lohengrin"........Wagner
6. Quartet from "Rigoletto"........Verdi
7. Introduction, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna"........Wolf-Ferrari
8. Furlana from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
9. Fantasia, "Thais"..........Massenet
10. Two Intermezzi—
a. From "Pagliacci"....Leoncavallo
b. From "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
11. Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ....Saint-Saens

Friday, July 6.
WAGNER PROGRAM

1. Prelude to "Carmen"...........Bizet
2. Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ....Nicolai
3. Waltz, "1001 Nights"..........Strauss
4. Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"..Wagner
5. Prelude to "Lohengrin"......Wagner
6. Dreams, solo violin, J. Theodorowicz Wagner
7. The Ride of the Valkyries....Wagner
8. Overture to "Tannhauser"....Wagner
9. Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3-4-7-20 Chopin-Jacchia
10. Reverie ....Going
11. First Hungarian Dance........Brahms

Saturday, July 7.
CLOSING NIGHT

1. First Slavonic Dance..........Dvorak
2. Prelude to "The Mastersingers".Wagner
3. "Love's Dream After the Ball" Czibulka
4. Fantasia, "L'Oracolo"...........Leoni
5. First Hungarian Rhapsody.........Liszt
6. Deep River ....Burleigh-Jacchia
7. Serenade (arranged by Agide Jacchia)...............Schubert
8. Marche Slave.............Tchaikovsky
9. Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
10. Waltz, "Espana"...........Waldteufel
11. Stars and Stripes Forever.......Sousa

AULD LANG SYNE.

HERALD. JULY. 1.

Italian Program Opens Final Pop Week

THIS is the final week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall.

For tomorrow night Agide Jacchia has made up an Italian program, with four excerpts from Verdi operas, besides Casella's "Italian Rhapsody," the "Norma" overture, the "Hymn to the Sun" from Mascagni's "Iris, a "Madama Butterfly" fantasia and other selections.

On Tuesday night there will be a Rusisan program, featuring Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" finale, Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, "Eili, Eili" and folk songs. The request program played last week will be repeated next Wednesday night. There will be an operatic program on Thursday night and a Wagner program Friday night.

For the final Saturday night concert Mr. Jacchia will offer Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody, "Marche Slave," a Slavonic dance by Dvorak, several Wagner numbers, "Deep River" and other pieces.

ADVTSR. JULY. 1.

Closing Week of the Symphony Hall "Pops"

Six special programs will make a feature of each night of this closing week of the "Pop" season at Symphony Hall. Tomorrow the Italian-Verdi program will include four excerpts from the operas of Verdi; the "Italia" Rhapsody of Casella, the "Hymn to the Sun" from Mascagni's opera, "Iris"; "Madame Butterfly" fantasia and "Norma" overture.

A Russian program Tuesday will include among other numbers the finales of "Scheherazade" and of Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, Glinka's "Kamarinskaja," "Eili, Eili," "1812" overture, Moussorgsky's "Hopak," Russian folk songs.

Wednesday's request program will include "William Tell" and "1812" overtures, the "Peer Gynt" Suite, Handel's Largo, Second Hungarian Rhapsody and "Pomp and Circumstance." Of the operatic program Thursday there may be mentioned the overture to "Mignon" and "Lohengrin," Fantasias "La Boheme" and "Thais," "Rosenkavalier" waltzes, "Rigoletto," quartet. Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah."

The Wagnerian program Friday will include the following numbers of Wagner: Magic Fire music from "The Valkyrie," "Tannhauser" overture, "Ride of the Valkyries," "Dreams," for violin solo.

Closing night, Saturday, will bring an especially popular program, with Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody, "Marche Slave," Fantasias, "L'Oracolo" and "Cavalleria Rusticana," Dvorak's First Slavonic Dance, prelude to "The Meistersingers" and "Deep River."

GLOBE JULY. 1.

ITALIAN NIGHT AT POPS

The Pap Concerts in Symphony Hall will open their last week tonight with an Italian program.

Italian Royal March .... Gabetti
Overture, "Norma" .... Bellini
Camellia Gavotte .... Jacchia
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Oxerture, "La Forza del Destino"
Prelude, "Aida"
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore"
Introduction, "Othello" .....Giuseppe Verdi
Rhapsody, "Italia" .... Casella
Legende .... Troccoli
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris" ....Mascagni

ADVTSR-JULY. 2.

Closing Week of the "Pops"

SYMPHONY HALL—Six special programs will be given during the closing week of the "Pops."

This evening's Russian program will be as follows: Wedding March from "Feramors," Rubinstein; "Flower Waltz," Tchaikovsky; Hindu song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Finale, "Fourth Symphony," Tchaikovsky; last movement from "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Kamarinskaja," Glinka; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Agide Jacchia; Overture Solonnelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Russian folk songs, arranged by Agide Jacchia; Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky.

GLOBE. JULY. 3.

RUSSIAN NIGHT AT POPS

The last Russian program of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight.

Wedding March, "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Flower Waltz ....Tchaikovsky
Hindu Song, "Sadko".....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale, "Fourth Symphony"....Tchaikovsky
Finale, "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Kamarinskaja" ....Glinka
"Eili, Eili"................Arr. by Jacchia
Overture, "1812" ....Tscaikovsky
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin".....Tchaikovsky
Russian Folk Song....Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Hopak, "Fair of Seretchinsk".Moussorgsky

ADVTSR. JULY 3

PROGRAM AT POPS

The third and last Russian program of the season will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Wedding March from "Feramors" Rubinstein
Flower Wats.................Tchaikovsky
Hindu Song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale, "Fourth Symphony"..Tchaikovsky
Last Movement from "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Kamarinskaja" ....Glinka
"Eili, Eili"....Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tchaikovsky
Russian Folk Songs Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Hopak from "The Fair of Serotchinsk" Moussorgsky

HERALD. JULY 3

RUSSIAN PROGRAM AT POPS

The third and last Russian program of the season will be given at the Pop Concerts in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Wedding March from "Freamors," Rubinstein; Flower Waltz, Tchaikovsky; Hindu Song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff; Finale, "Fourth Symphony," Tchaikovsky; Last Movement from "Schcherazado," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Kamarinskaja," Glinka; "Eili, Eili," Arrangedf by Agide Jacchia; Ouverture Solennelle, "1912" Tchaikovsky; Polonaies from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Russion Folk Songs, Arranged by Agide Jacchia; Ropak from "The Fair of Scrotchinsk," Moussorgsky.

TELE.

Holiday "Pops" Programs

TONIGHT
Russian Program

Wedding March from "Feramors" Rubinstein
Flower Waltz ....Tschaikowsky
Hindu Song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Finale, Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Last Movement from "Schéhérazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Kamarinskaja" ....Glinka
"Eili, Eili" Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikowsky
Russian Folk Songs Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Hopak from "The Fair of Serotchinsk" ....Moussorgsky

TOMORROW NIGHT
Request Program

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar
Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
"Eili, Eili" Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida".................Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt"...............Grieg
Largo ....Handel
Parade of the Wooden Soldiers Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ....Strauss
Ride of the Valkyries..........Wagner

MONIT

At The Pops Tonight

Russian Programme

Wedding March, "Feramors"..Rubinstein
Flower Waltz...............Chaikovsky
Hindu Song, "Sadko"...Rimsky-Korsakov
Finale, "Fourth Symphony"..Chaikovsky
Final Movement of "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakov
Kamarinskaja ....Glinka
Eili, Eili..........Arranged by Jacchia
Overture, "1812"..............Chaikovsky
Polonaise, "Eugene Onegin"..Chaikovsky
Russian Folk Songs..Arranged by Jacchia
Hopak, "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" Moussorgsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

TRANS. JULY. 3.

[113]

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

Request night, the most popular of the season at the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, will take place tonight. The program, as determined by public vote, follows:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ...... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ...... Rossini
"Eili, Eili" ...... Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida" ...... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ...... Grieg
Largo ...... Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.)
"Parade of the Wooden Soldiers" ...... Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ...... Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .. Strauss
"Ride of the Valkyries" ...... Wagner

GLOBE. JULY. 4.

REQUEST PROGRAM AT POPS.

To satisfy those who were unable to obtain admission to request night at the Pops last week, this popular program will be repeated tonight.

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" .. Elgar
Overture, "William Tell" ...... Rossini
"Eili, Eili" ...... arr. by Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida" ...... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ...... Grieg
Largo ...... Handel
Parade of the Wooden Soldiers ...... Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Overture "1812" ...... Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "Beautiful Blue Danube" .. Strauss
Ride of the Valkyries ...... Wagner

ADVTSR. JULY. 4.

OPERA PROGRAM AT POPS

A program of operatic music will be presented at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Coronation March, "The Prophet." ...... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Mignon" ...... Thomas
Waltzes, "Der Rosenkavalier" ...... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ...... Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
Quartet, "Rigoletto" ...... Verdi
Selection, "Jewels of the Madonna." ...... Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana, "La Gioconda" ...... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais" ...... Massenet
Two Intermezzi—
"Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
"Cavalleria Rusticana" ...... Mascagni
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah." ...... Saint-Saens

ADVTSR. JULY. 5.

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Coronation March, "The Prophet" ...... Meyerbeer
Overture, "Mignon" ...... Thomas
Waltzes, "Rer Rosenkavalier" ...... R. Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ...... Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
Quartet, "Rigoletto" ...... Verdi
Introduction, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" ...... Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana, "La Gioconda" ...... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais" ...... Massenet
Two Intermezzi:
a. "Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
b. "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" ...... Saint-Saens

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY. 5.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

Operatic Program

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .. Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" ...... Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" ...... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohême" ...... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ...... Verdi
Introduction, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ...... Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana from "La Gioconda" ...... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais" ...... Massenet
Two Intermezzi
a. From "Pagliacci" .. Leoncavallo
b. From "Cavalleria Rusticana" ...... Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ...... Saint-Saëns

MONITOR. JULY. 5.

WAGNER MUSIC AT POPS

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will featured at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is the last night but one of the season. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen" ...... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ...... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ...... Strauss
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
Dreams ...... Wagner
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz
The Ride of the Valkyries ...... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20, ... Chopin-Jacchia
Revue ...... Going
First Hungarian Dance ...... Brahms

HERALD. JULY. 6.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

March, "The Man Behind the Gun" .. Sousa
Overture, "Mignon" ...... Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ...... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ...... Verdi
Oveture, "The Flying Dutchman" ...... Wagner
Indian Dirge ...... Seydel
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ... Pierne
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Selection, "Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Perdita" ...... Repper
American Fantasy ...... Herbert

ADVTSR - JULY. 6.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

WAGNER NIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen" ...... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ...... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights" ...... Strauss
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "Walküre" .. Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
"Dreams" ...... Wagner
Solo Violin, J. Theodorowicz
The Ride of the Valkyries ... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ... Wagner
Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20 ...... Chopin-Jacchia
Revue ...... Going
First Hungarian Dance ...... Brahms

MONITOR. JULY. 6.

At The Pops Tonight

Wagnerian Programme

Prelude, "Carmen" ...... Bizet
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ...... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss, and Wotan's Farewell Fire Music from "Die Walkuere"—Prelude "Lohengrin"—Dreams (Solo Violin) —The Ride of the Valkyrs—Overture, "Tannhauser" ...... Wagner
Preludes (Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20) .... Chopin-Jacchia
Reverie ...... Going
First Hungarian Dance ...... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: J. Theodorowicz

TRANS. JULY. 6.

WAGNER MUSIC AT POPS

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be furnished at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is the last night but one of the season. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss; Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie," Wagner; Prelude to "Lohengrin." Wagner; Dreams, solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, Wagner; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3-4-7-20, Chopin-Jacchia; Revue, Going; First Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

TELE. JULY. 6.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

CLOSING NIGHT

First Slavonic Dance ...... Dvorák
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" ...... Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball" ...... Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" ...... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
"Deep River" ...... Burleigh-Jacchia
Sérénade ...... Schubert
Marche Slave ...... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" ...... Mascagni
Waltz, "España" ...... Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .. Sousa
AULD LANG SYNE

MONITOR - JULY. 7.

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT.

The Pop Concerts will close tonight. The program follows:

First Slavonic Dance ...... Dvorak
Prelude, "The Mastersingers" ...... Wagner
"Love's Dream" ...... Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" ...... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
"Deep River" ...... Burleigh-Jacchia
Serenade ...... Schubert
Marche Slave ...... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "Espana" ...... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever ...... Sousa
Auld Lang Syne.

ADVTSR. JULY. 7

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT

The closing Pop concert of the season in Symphony hall will be given tonight. The program follows:

First Slavonic Dance ...... Dvorak
Prelude to "The Mastersingers," .. Wagner
Love's Dream after the Ball .... Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" ...... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Deep River ...... Burleigh-Jacchia
Serenade ...... Schubert
Marche Slave ...... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "Espana" ...... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever ...... Sousa
Auld Lang Syne.

HERALD - JULY. 7

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 14-1923

INTERESTING NIGHTS AT "POPS."

A program of unusual interest at the "pop" concerts was that which Mr. Jacchia arranged for Wednesday evening, Norwegian night. For this he selected pieces by Halvorsen, Grieg, Svendsen, Ole Bull, a pot-pourri of Norwegian folk songs, besides a composition from Sibelius, whom Mr. Jacchia probably regards as distantly related to the Scandinavians. The familiar Peer Gynt suite of Grieg and the folksongs seemed to carry the greatest appeal for the audience, which included a goodly proportion of Norwegians.

Monday night was New England Conservatory Night and the glee club of that school sang a number of pieces, with Mr. Chadwick conducting. Interesting items from the week's programs include two numbers from Debussy's Little Suite, a fantasia from the opera L'Africaine, the beautiful solo for English horn from the third act of Tristan, a Caribbean Legend by Mr. Sequeira (the young Portuguese composer), effective arrangements for orchestra by Mr. Jacchia of Negro folk tunes, a Tarantella by Saint-Saëns for flute and clarinet, Mr. Jacchia's transcription for orchestra of Mendelssohn's popular rondo capriccioso, and the delightfully primitive dances from Borodin's opera, Prince Igor. Solo numbers of the week, in addition to those already noted, included the saccharine meditation from Massenet's Thais, played by Mr. Theodorowicz, the concertmaster of the "pops" orchestra; Iago's soliloquy from Verdi's Othello, sung by G. Roberts Lunger, and Wolfram's song to the evening star from Tannhäuser, played by Mr. Kellar, the first cellist of the orchestra.

NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 17 1923

Walter on

BRUNO WALTER spoke with a German newspaper man about his American experiences in part thus:

"I have received the best impression of the musical life in America, which I visited for the first time. I conducted in New York, Detroit, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Boston eighteen concerts. I found first-class orchestras everywhere, under model discipline, to conduct which was a real pleasure for me. Besides the fine material, that is due to the excellent conductors among whom there are world famous men: Mengleberg in New York, the Frenchman Monteux in Boston, and the Russian pianist Gabrilowitsch in Detroit, whose wife is a daughter of Mark Twain.

"The orchestras are of mixed nationality, since the Americans draw from the best material in the whole world; and I had to speak three different languages at different times, to make myself better understood by the members of one orchestra. The Italians are important, as well the Germans; the French dominate in the woodwind, but, especially among the strings, there are many Americans.

"Concert music has a dominating place in America, since opera houses are lacking. Besides the unique Metropolitan in New York and the Chicago Opera, there are no opera houses in America. The reason for this is that neither State nor city makes the least contribution for the expensive budget of an opera, and the meeting of the deficit must be undertaken by private persons. Concerts, thus, are in a certain way a substitute for the opera with Americans. They bring, therefore, the liveliest interest to the performances of the several orchestras, and listen to the virtuoso achievements of an orchestra with the same passionate devotion as the opera public of a European city gives to the arias of a diva.

"The American public has made the deepest impression on me. In Europe the mistaken idea is widespread that in America art is only an ornament of social life. But any one who, as I did, will observe the Americans in symphony concerts, in chamber music evenings, or at a song recital of Elena Gerhardt, will find that in the whole world there is no more attentive public, or one with more feeling for art. There are, to be sure, aberations from good taste in the large cities, but the artistic taste of the great American public is not to be measured by the circles that intoxicate themselves with noisy jazz music. What especially impressed me in the American mentality is its openheartedness, its freedom from prejudice and its fresh receptivity.

"It cannot be denied that anti-German feeling still shows itself here and there, but it seems to me that in the same degree in which this has begun to diminish, there is a certain loss of sympathy for the French, whose policy of might is decidedly disliked. At all events, in the realm of art the German masters have long since been restored to honor, and even Monteux did not hesitate at a performance of his orchestra in New York to give a Wagner program. German art has played the greatest part in the cultivation and deepening of the artistic life of America. Beside the German masters the Russians occupy a leading place (Tchaikovsky and Stravinsky), and the French (Ravel and Debussy) in the concert repertory. Creative art in America is unfortunately still in its childhood. There are promising talents among the native composers. England has made there a notable progress. Among the English composers whose works are performed in America are Holst, whose symphony 'The Planets' is a highly distinguished work; Elgar and others.

"The musical education of the American public through the medium of concerts is one of the best omens of that not very far distant time when the opera, too, will make its way there. For then this cut form, also popular there, will have a brilliantly prepared public with an open and delicate musi- [illegible] ica, which is at the present time making enormous progress; and this approach to the opera from the musical side will bring the finest fruits. All in all, it can be said that the musical life of America stands on a very high plane.

"Is there anything in America that can properly be called American music? Well, not exactly. There are at present a number of composers in America who make a claim to be considered as representatives of their homeland; but it is a question really of beginners.

"The first attempt to write symphonic music that should be nationally American, so far as I know, was made by Anton Dvorak. And yet this attempt—leaving entirely aside the absolute beauty of the symphony—wholly failed. This American music remains in its essence good Bohemian music, though there are numerous Americanisms in it, which are to be heard in certain less high-born music.

"Yes, negro rhythms? From these is to be formed the basis of American music, today more than ever. Oh, this jazz band—it is something terrible! I do not say that something useful may not be developed from this, something whose essence in a nobler form may not blossom in symphonic creation. Everything new pushes up from below; but in its present form this music is found lacking in merit by all intellectual Americans.

"We have no idea in this country how much and how good music there is in America. The high artistic level of the orchestras there is absolutely incredible. Everywhere there are only orchestral players of distinct, artistic powers. A discipline rules that makes conducting a real pleasure.

"The Boston orchestra is again at the top. It has now fully recovered from the collapse that occurred after the departure of Muck. But also orchestras such as I found in Philadelphia, Detroit and Minneapolis leave hardly anything to be desired.

"Is not this richness of artistic quality a natural result of the material wealth of the country? Is the attraction of the public toward music an inwardly artistic impulse or merely the expression of good form?

"The Americans' love of music is a genuine one. This is expressed not merely in the superbly cultivated attitude of the public but also in the taste that this public has. As with us, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner are the chief sources from which American concert programs are made up. They have the sense and feeling for style; they have a direct connection with the moderns, in which the French, naturally, in view of the war years, stand first. But the Germans also are there, and the interest for Strauss is fully awake. The most modern music, on the contrary, makes progress slowly.

"If the 'atonal' composers are heard there, then there is silence, after the American fashion. No—they have a feeling only for the artistically true. And I might almost say that the fresh point of view of the Americans in this matter judges much more surely than our thousandfold hyper-refined feeling."

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 7-1923

GALA NIGHTS AT "POPS."

For the second Sunday concert of the "Pops" season, Mr. Jacchia arranged a well-varied program of fragments from Wagner's operas and attracted an enthusiastic audience that filled every inch of available space in the hall. Mr. Jacchia's list included the overture to Rienzi, Venusberg music from Tannhäuser, closing scene from Tristan, fantasia from Lohengrin, prelude to The Meistersingers, procession of the Grail Knights from Parsifal, Forest Murmurs from Siegfried and Fire Music from Die Walküre.

Monday brought the annual Harvard Night, with Dr. Davison and the Harvard Glee Club assisting in accompanied and unaccompanied pieces from its repertory. Large crowds attended the remaining concerts of the week.

SAYS BOSTON NEEDS OPERA

Agide Jacchia Talks of Musical Future

Pop Concert Conductor Off to Italy to Visit Mother

Audiences Liked Russian Songs the Past Season

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the "Pop" concerts, sailed for Italy last Saturday to visit his mother, who is nearly 80 years of age.

When he was seen by the writer as he was in the rush and confusion of getting ready for his long journey home to Italy he said: "There are considerations in the life of a musician almost as sacred as his instinct for music."

Although he was trying to do many things at once he was persuaded to talk about what had come under his observation during the past season, and, before he hurried from his office he stated impulsively with all the frank enthusiasm of the Latin temperament what he believed the future held for the city.

He is the Italian from the Mediterranean shores of dry olive complexion, strong, well molded person, iron-gray hair, and when he emphasizes a point he raises both hands as though holding his thought firmly between his fingers.

"In Boston," he said, "I have found everything a musician filled with the beauty of exalted work would wish for: a great orchestra and a great audience awake to the subtlety of symphonic composition, which is a condition seldom found even in the cities of musical Italy, where instrumental education is always free, sometimes compulsory."

Boston's Musical Future

Once started, he ran on about music and its place in the life of Boston.

AGIDE JACCHIA.

He said: "Great musicians have root among the people and spring from their soil, and if Boston is to offer music as an expression of its culture, as an indication that the Boston character holds something in common with Milan and Paris, where music is not only diligently practiced but nurtured into the National genius, then there must be a much greater support of orchestras and a profounder technical study in the conservatories. The process of people becoming thoroughly saturated with a real and appreciative understanding of music takes generations, really centuries, and its best opportunity is in a city that supports a robust musical institution."

Mr Jacchia spoke of the incalculable value of State musical schools where, as in the case of his own country, young pupils are instructed for at least nine months. Then those that show talent are provided the means with which to continue through the schools to the academy until, finally, they are on the road to recognition as able musicians, and beyond that—for fewer, perhaps for only one, the laurels and applause to genius.

The Very Peasants Know Music

"It is little wonder," he said, "that the happy Italian peasant hums Puccini, knows Verdi by heart, and although it is difficult for him to be carried along on equal terms with the great artist, listens with awe to Wagner."

His expressive features brightened with the fire of one consumed with an indisputable argument, as he placed great emphasis upon this vast appeal of music, and explained how it creates the background for any sublime achievement when it is cherished. He offered the idea that music expresses something in their lives and brings out a respect that is akin to religion.

Turning back to his impression of things American, he continued, "Here, it is generally held that the 'popular concerts' are popular because their programs were made up of all the odd songs and waltzes that happened to be current favorites, and, therefore, drew fairly representative audiences from the mass. With this attitude is the common opinion that people are encouraged to go to a large restaurant where a thousand voices, clinking plates, and inconsequential music dispelled boredom. I hold exactly the opposite position. I believe that an amiable environment must be subdued to the different influences of program music collected from the great masters.

"An extraordinary interest in modern Russian composers has helped to direct the tendency of the programs of the last popular concert season towards serious music, away from the old 'cafe' melodies, and has helped me inestimably in lifting the program to a dominating position in the concert and keeping everything else in subordinate interest."

What Boston Likes

With a merry twinkle in his eye, he said: "The behavior of the audience is less conservative. This is natural, and the rigid manners of the [illegible] symphony concerts [illegible]

[114]

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

Request night, the most popular of the season at the Pop concerts at Symphony hall, will take place tonight. The program, as determined by public vote, follows:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ...... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
"Eili, Eili" .... Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Largo .... Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.)
"Parade of the Wooden Soldiers" ...... Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .. Strauss
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

GLOBE. JULY. 4.

REQUEST PROGRAM AT POPS.

To satisfy those who were unable to obtain admission to request night at the Pops last week, this popular program will be repeated tonight.

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" .. Elgar
Overture, "William Tell" .... Rossini
"Eili, Eili" .... arr. by Jacchai
Fantasia, "Aida" .... Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
Largo .... Handel
Parade of the Wooden Soldiers ...... Jessel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Overture "1812" .... Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "Beautiful Blue Danube" .. Strauss
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner

ADVTSR. JULY. 4.

OPERA PROGRAM AT POPS

A program of operatic music will be presented at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Coronation March, "The Prophet." Meyerbeer
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes, "Der Rosenkavalier" .... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" .... Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Quartet, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Selection, "Jewels of the Madonna." Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana, "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais" .... Massenet
Two Intermezzi—
"Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
"Cavalleria Rusticana" .... Mascagni
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah." Saint-Saens

ADVTSR. JULY. 5.

At the Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Coronation March, "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes, "Rer Rosenkavalier" ..... R. Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" .... Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Quartet, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Introduction, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana, "La Gioconda" ...... Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thais" .... Massenet
Two Intermezzi;
a. "Pagliacci" .... Leoncavallo
b. "Cavalleria Rusticana" ... Mascagni
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TRANS. JULY. 5.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

Operatic Program

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .. Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohème" ..... Puccini
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Introduction, Act III, "The Jewels of the Madonna" .... Wolf-Ferrari
Furlana from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Fantasia, "Thaïs" .... Massenet
Two Intermezzi
a. From "Pagliacci" .. Leoncavallo
b. From "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns

MONITOR. JULY. 5.

WAGNER MUSIC AT POPS

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will featured at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is the last night but one of the season. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights" .... Strauss
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie" .... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Dreams .... Wagner
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20, Chopin-Jacchia
Revue .... Going
First Hungarian Dance .... Brahms

HERALD. JULY. 6.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

March, "The Man Behind the Gun" .. Sousa
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ...... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .... Verdi
Oveture, "The Flying Dutchman" .. Wagner
Indian Dirge .... Seydel
March of the Little Lead Soldiers ... Pierne
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Selection, "Pagliacci" ...... Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Perdita" .... Repper
American Fantasy .... Herbert

ADVTSR - JULY. 6.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

WAGNER NIGHT

Prelude to "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights" .... Strauss
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "Walküre" ... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
"Dreams" .... Wagner
Solo Violin, J. Theodorowicz
The Ride of the Valkyries ... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ... Wagner
Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20 Chopin-Jacchia
Revue .... Going
First Hungarian Dance .... Brahms

MONITOR. JULY. 6

At The Pops Tonight

Wagnerian Programme

Prelude, "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss, and Wotan's Farewell Fire Music from "Die Walkuere"—Prelude "Lohengrin"—Dreams (Solo Violin) —The Ride of the Valkyrs—Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Preludes (Op. 28, Nos. 3, 4, 7, 20) .... Chopin-Jacchia
Reverie .... Going
First Hungarian Dance .... Brahms

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: J. Theodorowicz

TRANS. JULY 6

WAGNER MUSIC AT POPS

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be furnished at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, which is the last night but one of the season. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss; Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie," Wagner; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Dreams, solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, Wagner; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Preludes, Op. 28, Nos. 3-4-7-20, Chopin-Jacchia; Revue, Going; First Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

TELE. JULY. 6.

"Pops" Program for Tonight

CLOSING NIGHT

First Slavonic Dance .... Dvorák
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball" Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" .... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Deep River" ...... Burleigh-Jacchia
Sérénade .... Schubert
Marche Slave .... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "España" .... Waldteufel
"Stars and Stripes Forever" .. Sousa
AULD LANG SYNE

MONITOR. JULY. 7

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT.

The Pop Concerts will close tonight.
The program follows:

First Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
Prelude, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
"Love's Dream" .... Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" .... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Deep River" .... Burleigh-Jacchia
Serenade .... Schubert
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "Espana" .... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Auld Lang Syne.

ADVTSR. JULY. 7

POPS CLOSE TONIGHT

The closing Pop concert of the season in Symphony hall will be given tonight. The program follows:

First Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
Prelude to "The Mastersingers," .. Wagner
Love's Dream after the Ball ..... Czibulka
Fantasia, "L'oracolo" .... Leoni
First Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Deep River .... Burleigh-Jacchia
Serenade .... Schubert
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana" . Mascagni
Waltz, "Espana" .... Waldteufel
Stars and Stripes Forever .... Sousa
Auld Lang Syne.

HERALD. JULY. 7

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 14-1923

INTERESTING NIGHTS AT "POPS."

A program of unusual interest at the "pop" concerts was that which Mr. Jacchia arranged for Wednesday evening, Norwegian night. For this he selected pieces by Halvorsen, Grieg, Svendsen, Ole Bull, a pot-pourri of Norwegian folk songs, besides a composition from Sibelius, whom Mr. Jacchia probably regards as distantly related to the Scandinavians. The familiar Peer Gynt suite of Grieg and the folksongs seemed to carry the greatest appeal for the audience, which included a goodly proportion of Norwegians.

Monday night was New England Conservatory Night and the glee club of that school sang a number of pieces, with Mr. Chadwick conducting. Interesting items from the week's programs include two numbers from Debussy's Little Suite, a fantasia from the opera L'Africaine, the beautiful solo for English horn from the third act of Tristan, a Caribbean Legend by Mr. Sequeira (the young Portuguese composer), effective arrangements for orchestra by Mr. Jacchia of Negro folk tunes, a Tarantella by Saint-Saëns for flute and clarinet, Mr. Jacchia's transcription for orchestra of Mendelssohn's popular rondo capriccioso, and the delightfully primitive dances from Borodin's opera, Prince Igor. Solo numbers of the week, in addition to those already noted, included the saccharine meditation from Massenet's Thais, played by Mr. Theodorowicz, the concertmaster of the "pops" orchestra; Iago's soliloquy from Verdi's Othello, sung by G. Roberts Lunger, and Wolfram's song to the evening star from Tannhäuser, played by Mr. Kellar, the first cellist of the orchestra.

NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 17 1923

~~W~~alter on

BRUNO WALTER spoke with a German newspaper man about his American experiences in part thus:

"I have received the best impression of the musical life in America, which I visited for the first time. I conducted in New York, Detroit, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Boston eighteen concerts. I found first-class orchestras everywhere, under model discipline, to conduct which was a real pleasure for me. Besides the fine material, that is due to the excellent conductors among whom there are world famous men: Mengleberg in New York, the Frenchman Monteux in Boston, and the Russian pianist Gabrilowitsch in Detroit, whose wife is a daughter of Mark Twain.

"The orchestras are of mixed nationality, since the Americans draw from the best material in the whole world; and I had to speak three different languages at different times, to make myself better understood by the members of one orchestra. The Italians are important, as well the Germans; the French dominate in the woodwind, but, especially among the strings, there are many Americans.

"Concert music has a dominating place in America, since opera houses are lacking. Besides the unique Metropolitan in New York and the Chicago Opera, there are no opera houses in America. The reason for this is that neither State nor city makes the least contribution for the expensive budget of an opera, and the meeting of the deficit must be undertaken by private persons. Concerts, thus, are in a certain way a substitute for the opera with Americans. They bring, therefore, the liveliest interest to the performances of the several orchestras, and listen to the virtuoso achievements of an orchestra with the same passionate devotion as the opera public of a European city gives to the arias of a diva.

"The American public has made the deepest impression on me. In Europe the mistaken idea is widespread that in America art is only an ornament of social life. But any one who, as I did, will observe the Americans in symphony concerts, in chamber music evenings, or at a song recital of Elena Gerhardt, will find that in the whole world there is no more attentive public, or one with more feeling for art. There are, to be sure, aberations from good taste in the large cities, but the artistic taste of the great American public is not to be measured by the circles that intoxicate themselves with noisy jazz music. What especially impressed me in the American mentality is its openheartedness, its freedom from prejudice and its fresh receptivity.

"It cannot be denied that anti-German feeling still shows itself here and there, but it seems to me that in the same degree in which this has begun to diminish, there is a certain loss of sympathy for the French, whose policy of might is decidedly disliked. At all events, in the realm of art the German masters have long since been restored to honor, and even Monteux did not hesitate at a performance of his orchestra in New York to give a Wagner program. German art has played the greatest part in the cultivation and deepening of the artistic life of America. Beside the German masters the Russians occupy a leading place (Tchaikovsky and Stravinsky), and the French (Ravel and Debussy) in the concert repertory. Creative art in America is unfortunately still in its childhood. There are promising talents among the native composers. England has made there a notable progress. Among the English composers whose works are performed in America are Holst, whose symphony 'The Planets' is a highly distinguished work; Elgar and others.

"The musical education of the American public through the medium of concerts is one of the best omens of that not very far distant time when the opera, too, will make its way there. For then this cut form, also popular there, will have a brilliantly prepared public with an open and definite musical taste. In such a sense you can speak of the 'musicalizing' of America, which is at the present time making enormous progress; and this approach to the opera from the musical side will bring the finest fruits. All in all, it can be said that the musical life of America stands on a very high plane.

"Is there anything in America that can properly be called American music? Well, not exactly. There are at present a number of composers in America who make a claim to be considered as representatives of their homeland; but it is a question really of beginners.

"The first attempt to write symphonic music that should be nationally American, so far as I know, was made by Anton Dvorak. And yet this attempt—leaving entirely aside the absolute beauty of the symphony—wholly failed. This American music remains in its essence good Bohemian music, though there are numerous Americanisms in it, which are to be heard in certain less high-born music.

"Yes, negro rhythms? From these is to be formed the basis of American music, today more than ever. Oh, this jazz band—it is something terrible! I do not say that something useful may not be developed from this, something, whose essence in a nobler form may not blossom in symphonic creation. Everything new pushes up from below; but in its present form this music is found lacking in merit by all intellectual Americans.

"We have no idea in this country how much and how good music there is in America. The high artistic level of the orchestras there is absolutely incredible. Everywhere there are only orchestral players of distinct, artistic powers. A discipline rules that makes conducting a real pleasure.

"The Boston orchestra is again at the top. It has now fully recovered from the collapse that occurred after the departure of Muck. But also orchestras such as I found in Philadelphia, Detroit and Minneapolis leave hardly anything to be desired.

"Is not this richness of artistic quality a natural result of the material wealth of the country? Is the attraction of the public toward music an inwardly artistic impulse or merely the expression of good form?

"The Americans' love of music is a genuine one.' This is expressed not merely in the superbly cultivated attitude of the public but also in the taste that this public has. As with us, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner are the chief sources from which American concert programs are made up. They have the sense and feeling for style; they have a direct connection with the moderns, in which the French, naturally, in view of the war years, stand first. But the Germans also are there, and the interest for Strauss is fully awake. The most modern music, on the contrary, makes progress slowly.

"If the 'atonal' composers are heard there, then there is silence, after the American fashion. No—they have a feeling only for the artistically true. And I might almost say that the fresh point of view of the Americans in this matter judges much more surely than our thousandfold hyper-refined feeling."

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 7-1923

GALA NIGHTS AT "POPS."

For the second Sunday concert of the "Pops" season, Mr. Jacchia arranged a well-varied program of fragments from Wagner's operas and attracted an enthusiastic audience that filled every inch of available space in the hall. Mr. Jacchia's list included the overture to Rienzi, Venusberg music from Tannhäuser, closing scene from Tristan, fantasia from Lohengrin, prelude to The Meistersingers, procession of the Grail Knights from Parsifal, Forest Murmurs from Siegfried and Fire Music from Die Walküre.

Monday brought the annual Harvard Night, with Dr. Davison and the Harvard Glee Club assisting in accompanied and unaccompanied pieces from its repertory. Large crowds attended the remaining concerts of the week.

SAYS BOSTON NEEDS OPERA

Agide Jacchia Talks of Musical Future

Pop Concert Conductor Off to Italy to Visit Mother

Audiences Liked Russian Songs the Past Season

Agide Jacchia, conductor of the "Pop" concerts, sailed for Italy last Saturday to visit his mother, who is nearly 80 years of age.

When he was seen by the writer as he was in the rush and confusion of getting ready for his long journey home to Italy he said: "There are considerations in the life of a musician almost as sacred as his instinct for music."

Although he was trying to do many things at once he was persuaded to talk about what had come under his observation during the past season, and, before he hurried from his office he stated impulsively with all the frank enthusiasm of the Latin temperament what he believed the future held for the city.

He is the Italian from the Mediterranean shores of dry olive complexion, strong, well molded person, iron-gray hair, and when he emphasizes a point he raises both hands as though holding his thought firmly between his fingers.

"In Boston," he said, "I have found everything a musician filled with the beauty of exalted work would wish for: a great orchestra and a great audience awake to the subtlety of symphonic composition, which is a condition seldom found even in the cities of musical Italy, where instrumental education is always free, sometimes compulsory."

Boston's Musical Future

Once started, he ran on about music and its place in the life of Boston.

AGIDE JACCHIA.

He said: "Great musicians have root among the people and spring from their soil, and if Boston is to offer music as an expression of its culture, as an indication that the Boston character holds something in common with Milan and Paris, where music is not only diligently practiced but nurtured into the National genius, then there must be a much greater support of orchestras and a profounder technical study in the conservatories. The process of people becoming thoroughly saturated with a real and appreciative understanding of music takes generations, really centuries, and its best opportunity is in a city that supports a robust musical institution."

Mr Jacchia spoke of the incalculable value of State musical schools where, as in the case of his own country, young pupils are instructed for at least nine months. Then those that show talent are provided the means with which to continue through the schools to the academy until, finally, they are on the road to recognition as able musicians, and beyond that—for fewer, perhaps for only one, the laurels and applause to genius.

The Very Peasants Know Music

"It is little wonder," he said, "that the happy Italian peasant hums Puccini, knows Verdi by heart, and although it is difficult for him to be carried along on equal terms with the great artist, listens with awe to Wagner."

His expressive features brightened with the fire of one consumed with an indisputable argument, as he placed great emphasis upon this vast appeal of music, and explained how it creates the background for any sublime achievement when it is cherished. He offered the idea that music expresses something in their lives and brings out a respect that is akin to religion.

Turning back to his impression of things American, he continued, "Here, it is generally held that the 'popular concerts' are popular because their programs were made up of all the odd songs and waltzes that happened to be current favorites, and, therefore, drew fairly representative audiences from the mass. With this attitude is the common opinion that people are encouraged to go to a large restaurant where a thousand voices, clinking plates, and inconsequential music dispelled boredom. I hold exactly the opposite position. I believe that an amiable environment must be subdued to the different influences of program music collected from the great masters.

"An extraordinary interest in modern Russian composers has helped to direct the tendency of the programs of the last popular concert season towards serious music, away from the old 'cafe' melodies, and has helped me inestimably in lifting the program to a dominating position in the concert and keeping everything else in subordinate interest."

What Boston Likes

With a merry twinkle in his eye, he said: "The behavior of the audience is less conservative. This is natural, and the rigid manners of the Winter symphony concerts go unobserved, but the sportive abandon has been repressed, and the lowered conversations over the minor buffet repast are scarcely audible. Indeed, the only disturbance is the fresummer dresses as they by the tables. The conductor discovers through the encores what his audiences admire, and some pieces, now, particularly Russian songs, are played every concert."

[114]

Mr Jacchia laughingly agreed that the audiences were not Russian. He gathered from this method of selection that music that caught a certain intellectual feeling is as much admired in Boston, as it is in Paris.

Then, Mr Jacchia, himself a pupil of Mascagni, the Italian grand opera composer, rocked back and forth in an ecstasy about the future of an established opera in Boston. He believes that the Symphony Orchestra has become so great a part of life in Boston, that in a short time it will lead to a brilliant theatre where music and the drama are combined.

Need Opera Immediately

He brushed Time aside when he said: "We need the opera immediately, but the virtue of being possessed with an idea is to produce it through action. Boston has so much to choose from, it is not limited, as a great many Italian cities are, to a fervid prostration before Puccini to the exclusion of the French and German musicians. Boston has so assimilated their works through the Symphony that there is no doubt every performance of their complete operas would be filled."

As he spoke he seemed like some Florentine master planning the vivid pageant within a great auditorium surmounted by a glittering dome, having in his eyes a vista of bright steps leading up to the theatre.

"For Grand Opera," he announced, "one must have a Grand Orchestra!" the wide sweep of his arm that accompanied this statement drew in the imagination a host of gifted musicians into his opera house.

He said it is amazing that, although Boston enjoys the enviable reputation in Europe as the one city in America that gives excellent "notices," where music is taken seriously, and criticism is distinguished for its discrimination, yet it has waited so long. He went on, "For me, it is a matter of shame, social life without the opera is provincial."

He spoke of the school he started on the model of the state schools of Italy, which is overcrowded with pupils. He was glowing in admiration for their earnest faith in the great art and their determination to become unrivalled craftsmen.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 21-1923

BOSTON'S INTEREST IN "POPS" UNABATED

Laura Littlefield Scores as Soloist—Peirce Adds to Laurels as Choral Conductor—Summer Instruction at New England Conservatory—Barrows Pupils Give Recital—A French View of the New England Conservatory

Boston, July 17.—This is proving to be a record breaking season at the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacchia opened the last week of these popular concerts with his third Sunday evening program before a capacity throng. The program was drawn altogether from operatic sources, comprising these pieces: Polonaise from Eugen Onégin, Tschaikowsky; Overture to William Tell, Rossini; Meditation from Thais, Massenet; Bacchanal from Samson and Delilah, Sains-Saëns; Fantasia, Madame Butterfly, Puccini; Tempest Scene from Othello, Verdi; Prelude and Closing Scene from Tristan and Isolde, Wagner; Fantasia, Carmen, Bizet; Intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni; Dance of the Hours from La Gioconda, Ponchielli.

Through the balance of the week the concerts were marked by a heavy attendance. The Institute of Technology had its night Monday, while the Masonic Clubs filled the hall to overflowing on Tuesday. Wednesday brought Dartmouth night and Thursday Tufts. Enthusiasm was the rule throughout the week, Mr. Jacchia and his splendid orchestra winning well deserved plaudits, the Italian leader for his spirited conducting, the orchestra for its excellent playing.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 21-1923

Nikisch's American Orchestral Debut with Boston Symphony

Mitja Nikisch will make his first orchestral appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on November 2 and 3. A sentimental interest is attached to this engagement in view of the fact that his father, the late Arthur Nikisch, was a former conductor of the Boston Orchestra. His New York debut with the New York Symphony will follow a week later, and he will be soloist also with the Cincinnati Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra during the month of November.

NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 24 1923

Women Orchestra Players Abroad

A News item published not long ago to the effect that women had been admitted for the first time to full fellowship in the Royal Philharmonic Society of London caused the periodical called The Woman Citizen to inquire why women were not admitted to orchestras in the United tSates. Many women are members of small bands, but except as harpists they so rarely are seen in the large symphony orchestras that the appearance of several women players in the Cleveland Orchestra on its visit to New York caused some comment. Several prominent conductors were asked what they thought about it.

Walter Damrosch deprecated the employment of women as not strong enough physically to stand the strain of long rehearsals and many concerts; and the fatigue of touring would be hard for women players. The manager of the Chicago Orchestra holds the same opinion: that it is not advisable to have women players in an orchestra whose concerts require considerable traveling. Chicago has a Civic Orchestra, organized to educate young people in symphonic playing, which has included as many as twenty players out of eighty. The American Orchestral Society of New York, an organization with the same purpose, which The Woman Citizen forgot to mention, also includes a number of women. Apart from these the only women in American orchestras seem to be harpists.

On the other hand, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, does not find women a drawback even on the long and trying tours which the orchestra has been making under Mr. Sokoloff's conducting. He adds that he has found that women exert a pleasant and wholesome influence on a company of musicians, and that he considers their presence a genuine addition to the morale of the band.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrote:

"Certainly women orchestra players would be quite as acceptable to me as men, their abilities being equal. In the Colonne Orchestra which I conducted in Paris, several of the members were women, and my own orchestra there included, I think, six women, all of whom played very well and were quite as satisfactory as the other members."

William Mengelberg has found that the women in his Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam, "all first-class players, are as reliable as their men colleagues." There are a number of them playing various instruments. Bruno Walter has had "very good experiences" in some European orchestras with women players. "I cannot see," he adds, "any reason why women should not play all the instruments which do not ask physically more than they can give." It is well known to music lovers who have traveled abroad that many foreign orchestras employ women. Now the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood in London numbers a large proportion of women.

The Woman Citizen adds this: "The reason Mr. Damrosch gives against the employment of women—that they could not stand the strain of long rehearsals and traveling, might have more weight if it were not for the experience of the many theatrical and opera companies which include women. These organizations have long rehearsals and far more extended tours on the road than orchestras, and women members share the strain equally with the men, without apparent suffering. Perhaps women players here have accepted the situation and have not made a determined effort to break into the larger orchestras. It is probable that the breach will be [illegible] the more progressive West."

NEW YORK
TIMES
JUL 8 1923

BOSTON "POPS" CLOSE

WITH "Auld Lang Syne," the long season of the Boston Symphony "Pops" was last evening, in the language of Athenian authority, "to terminate according to tradition its final program." Perchance less tautological than eschatological, the words are at least conclusive.

Mr. Jacchia's farewells to Symphony Hall included a "request program" requested and repeated entire from the previous week. There were also an Italian and a Russian composers' night, an "operatic," an "all-Wagner," and a closing bill that ranged from Tschaikowsky's "Slavic March" to Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

[illegible] of newcomers, and the sound of light Summer dresses as they brush by the tables. The conductor discovers through the encores what his audiences admire, and some pieces, now, particularly Russian songs, are played at every concert."

Mr Jacchia laughingly agreed that the audiences were not Russian. He gathered from this method of selection that music that caught a certain intellectual feeling is as much admired in Boston, as it is in Paris.

Then, Mr Jacchia, himself a pupil of Mascagni, the Italian grand opera composer, rocked back and forth in an ecstasy about the future of an established opera in Boston. He believes that the Symphony Orchestra has become so great a part of life in Boston, that in a short time it will lead to a brilliant theatre where music and the drama are combined.

Need Opera Immediately

He brushed Time aside when he said: "We need the opera immediately, but the virtue of being possessed with an idea is to produce it through action. Boston has so much to choose from, it is not limited, as a great many Italian cities are, to a fervid prostration before Puccini to the exclusion of the French and German musicians. Boston has so assimilated their works through the Symphony that there is no doubt every performance of their complete operas would be filled."

As he spoke he seemed like some Florentine master planning the vivid pageant within a great auditorium surmounted by a glittering dome, having in his eyes a vista of bright steps leading up to the theatre.

"For Grand Opera," he announced, "one must have a Grand Orchestra!" the wide sweep of his arm that accompanied this statement drew in the imagination a host of gifted musicians into his opera house.

He said it is amazing that, although Boston enjoys the enviable reputation in Europe as the one city in America that gives excellent "notices," where music is taken seriously, and criticism is distinguished for its discrimination, yet it has waited so long. He went on, "For me, it is a matter of shame, social life without the opera is provincial."

He spoke of the school he started on the model of the state schools of Italy, which is overcrowded with pupils. He was glowing in admiration for their earnest faith in the great art and their determination to become unrivalled craftsmen.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 21-1923

BOSTON'S INTEREST IN "POPS" UNABATED

Laura Littlefield Scores as Soloist—Peirce Adds to Laurels as Choral Conductor—Summer Instruction at New England Conservatory—Barrows Pupils Give Recital—A French View of the New England Conservatory

Boston, July 17.—This is proving to be a record breaking season at the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacchia opened the last week of these popular concerts with his third Sunday evening program before a capacity throng. The program was drawn altogether from operatic sources, comprising these pieces: Polonaise from Eugen Onégin, Tschaikowsky; Overture to William Tell, Rossini; Meditation from Thais, Massenet; Bacchanal from Samson and Delilah, Sains-Saëns; Fantasia, Madame Butterfly, Puccini; Tempest Scene from Othello, Verdi; Prelude and Closing Scene from Tristan and Isolde, Wagner; Fantasia, Carmen, Bizet; Intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni; Dance of the Hours from La Gioconda, Ponchielli.

Through the balance of the week the concerts were marked by a heavy attendance. The Institute of Technology had its night Monday, while the Masonic Clubs filled the hall to overflowing on Tuesday. Wednesday brought Dartmouth night and Thursday Tufts. Enthusiasm was the rule throughout the week, Mr. Jacchia and his splendid orchestra winning well deserved plaudits, the Italian leader for his spirited conducting, the orchestra for its excellent playing.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

June 21-1923

Nikisch's American Orchestral Debut with Boston Symphony

Mitja Nikisch will make his first orchestral appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on November 2 and 3. A sentimental interest is attached to this engagement in view of the fact that his father, the late Arthur Nikisch, was a former conductor of the Boston Orchestra. His New York debut with the New York Symphony will follow a week later, and he will be soloist also with the Cincinnati Symphony and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra during the month of November.

NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 24 1923

Women Orchestra Players Abroad

A News item published not long ago to the effect that women had been admitted for the first time to full fellowship in the Royal Philharmonic Society of London caused the periodical called The Woman Citizen to inquire why women were not admitted to orchestras in the United tSates. Many women are members of small bands, but except as harpists they so rarely are seen in the large symphony orchestras that the appearance of several women players in the Cleveland Orchestra on its visit to New York caused some comment. Several prominent conductors were asked what they thought about it. Walter Damrosch deprecated the employment of women as not strong enough physically to stand the strain of long rehearsals and many concerts; and the fatigue of touring would be hard for women players. The manager of the Chicago Orchestra holds the same opinion: that it is not advisable to have women players in an orchestra whose concerts require considerable traveling. Chicago has a Civic Orchestra, organized to educate young people in symphonic playing, which has included as many as twenty players out of eighty. The American Orchestral Society of New York, an organization with the same purpose, which The Woman Citizen forgot to mention, also includes a number of women. Apart from these the only women in American orchestras seem to be harpists.

On the other hand, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, does not find women a drawback even on the long and trying tours which the orchestra has been making under Mr. Sokoloff's conducting. He adds that he has found that women exert a pleasant and wholesome influence on a company of musicians, and that he considers their presence a genuine addition to the morale of the band.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrote:

"Certainly women orchestra players would be quite as acceptable to me as men, their abilities being equal. In the Colonne Orchestra which I conducted in Paris, several of the members were women, and my own orchestra there included, I think, six women, all of whom played very well and were quite as satisfactory as the other members."

William Mengelberg has found that the women in his Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam, "all first-class players, are as reliable as their men colleagues." There are a number of them playing various instruments. Bruno Walter has had "very good experiences" in some European orchestras with women players. "I cannot see," he adds, "any reason why women should not play all the instruments which do not ask physically more than they can give." It is well known to music lovers who have traveled abroad that many foreign orchestras employ women. Now the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood in London numbers a large proportion of women.

The Woman Citizen adds this: "The reason Mr. Damrosch gives against the employment of women—that they could not stand the strain of long rehearsals and traveling, might have more weight if it were not for the experience of the many theatrical and opera companies which include women. These organizations have long rehearsals and far more extended tours on the road than orchestras, and women members share the strain equally with the men, without apparent suffering. Perhaps women players here have accepted the situation and have not made a determined effort to break into the larger orchestras. It is probable that the breach will be made in the more progressive West."

NEW YORK
TIMES
1923

BOSTON "POPS" CLOSE

WITH "Auld Lang Syne," the long season of the Boston Symphony "Pops" was last evening, in the language of Athenian authority, "to terminate according to tradition its final program." Perchance less tautological than eschatological, the words are at least conclusive.

Mr. Jacchia's farewells to Symphony Hall included a "request program" requested and repeated entire from the previous week. There were also an Italian and a Russian composers' night, an "operatic," an "all-Wagner," and a closing bill that ranged from Tschaikovsky's "Slavic March" to Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

1923 — 24

NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 2 1923

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been touched by the long arm of the Legion of Honor, that honor so difficult to avoid in France, and has been made a chevalier. Mrs. George Montgomery Tuttle, who has worked much for the school at Fontainebleau, has also been made the feminine counterpart of chevalier. Among other musicians, Henri Rabaud, also once conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now director of the Conservatoire, and Paul Dukas have been made officers. Roger-Ducasse, the composer, and Vanni Marcoux, the operatic baritone, are made chevaliers. Adolph Boschat, critic and biographer of Berlioz, has been promoted to offic

---

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
SEP 10 1923

Koussevitzky First Russian To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day that Serge Koussevitzky had been engaged as conductor for the season beginning with the fall of 1924. He will succeed Pierre Monteux and will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (Northern Russia) in 1874. He was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, where he made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra.

NEW YORK
TIMES
SEP 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last acepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already reestablished their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussetvitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opéra, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became a professor of Moscow Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N. Y.
WORLD

SEP 10 1923

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT IN BOSTON.

He Will Be First Russian to Lead Symphony Orchestra There—Begins Next Year.

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orcuestra beginning with the autumn of 1924, so announced Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the organization to-day.

Mr. Koussevitzky, long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, has, in the last three years, become the dominant figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the only great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, who, at the end of the pending season, will have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra five years.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept. 13-1923

KOUSSEVITZKY ENGAGED TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

SERGE ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky was born at Vishny Volotchk, northern Russia, on June 30, 1874. He studied at the conservatory at Moscow, his specialty being the double bass. In 1900 he was appointed a professor of that school and at the same time was a member of the Imperial Theater Orchestra. Becoming possessed of great means he went to Berlin, founding there in 1910 a Union for the Advancement of Russian Composers. He also travelled extensively throughout Europe giving recitals on the double bass. With his own private means he maintained a symphony orchestra in Russia and did pioneer work by travelling with it through various districts of the great land that knew nothing of symphonic music.

Koussevitzky remained in Russia during the war and revolution and, like all other prominent figures, was lost to the sight of the outside world for a long time. Then there came the report that he had been elected conductor of the orchestra which was formerly the Czar's private string band. Not long after that he succeeded in getting out of the country and has since made his headquarters in Paris conducting concerts there, in London and in Spain—and opera in Paris and Spain.

Koussevitzky has never visited this country. Arrangements were being made just before the war for him to come over in his capacity of double bass virtuoso but he was prevented from coming.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of Editorial

Sept-13-1923

KOUSSEWITZKY

A modest paragraph of stop-press news, tucked in the corner of page 17 of last week's issue, stated, in the form of a cable from our Paris correspondent, that Serge Koussewitzky had been chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in the fall of 1924; and this week the exclusive bit of news is confirmed by the official announcement of the orchestra's trustees. Once again the MUSICAL COURIER hit the nail on the head in advance of all other papers. Nothing is easier than to publish "rumors," and the name of Koussewitzky has been bandied about in connection with the Boston position for a year or more, as well as several other names. But the accuracy and promptness of the MUSICAL COURIER's information is shown by the fact that it preceded the official announcement by five days. The story was published in this paper on September 6 and the official announcement issued on September 11.

Koussewitzky is entirely an unknown quantity here, as he has never visited this country. In the ante-revolution days in Russia he had his own orchestra, but it was as a virtuoso on the double bass that he was known throughout Europe. The last few years he has made his headquarters in Paris conducting there and in London and various other places gaining a decided reputation for himself, especially in London. His coming will be awaited with great interest.

The passing of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for an appraisal of his work. Granted that his qualities as a conductor did not excite the general admiration that was the lot of leaders like Gericke, Nikisch and Muck—to name the most illustrious of his predecessors—Mr. Monteux's contribution to the musical history of Boston was nevertheless significant. When he came to Boston he found the symphony orchestra disrupted by the war and he spared no pains to reorganize it. No sooner, however, did the new orchestra begin to function smoothly, than it was again disorganized by a strike which resulted in the elimination of a third of the personnel. Again Mr. Monteux set to work to rebuild the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was the consensus of critical opinion that the early glories of the famous symphony orchestra had been restored, and there were not a few who claimed for it the leadership among orchestras that it enjoyed for many years.

Of Mr. Monteux's abilities it may fairly be said that he has made decided strides as a conductor and that as a program maker he might well serve as a model for many other orchestral leaders. His departure from Boston next spring will be regretted by a considerable part of the orchestra's following in Boston. On the other hand, the time was ripe for a change and the coming of Mr. Koussewitzky will be welcomed by the orchestra's well wishers not only in Boston, but also in New York and the other cities visited by this organization.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept 13-1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ANNOUNCES PLANS FOR FORTY-THIRD SEASON

Important Additions to New England Conservatory

Boston, Mass., September 8.—A busy season is anticipated for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A large schedule of concerts has been made, including, besides the forty-eight regular concerts, the five Monday evening concerts, Pension Fund and Young People's Concerts in Boston, fifteen concerts in Greater New York and numerous appearances in New England and other Eastern cities, which will include several concerts in Canada.

Pierre Monteux, who has been devoting a part of his summer in Europe to his annual search for new scores, will return late this month in readiness to begin rehearsals for his fifth season at the head of the orchestra. The personnel will remain as before, with no change in the leaders of the various sections.

A new record has been made in the matter of subscription renewals for the regular series of Boston concerts. The increased waiting list for the Friday afternoon series of twenty-four was considerably more than sufficient to exhaust those seats which were released by former subscribers, so that there was no public sale for this series.

The announcement of soloists to appear at the regular Boston concerts is now made. The singers will include Sigrid Onegin, Elisabeth Rethberg, Eva Gauthier, Vera Janacopulos, Marya Freund, and Roland Hayes. The pianists to appear are Harold Bauer, Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikisch, and E. Robert Schmitz. There will be two violinists —Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch—likewise Pablo Casals and Lionel Tertis, the prominent English viola virtuoso.

The season will open in Boston on October 12.

MONTREAL
CANADA
Star
ISSUE OF
SEP 15 1923

A New Conductor for The Boston Orchestra

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924, is announced.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become a striking figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longest terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He [illegible] Moscow Conservatory, having [illegible] a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded, and subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. He gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

In 1920 circumstances took him westward, and he became a central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris [illegible] take him to England and [illegible]

[116]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

1923 — 24

NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 2 1923

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been touched by the long arm of the Legion of Honor, that honor so difficult to avoid in France, and has been made a chevalier. Mrs. George Montgomery Tuttle, who has worked much for the school at Fontainebleau, has also been made the feminine counterpart of chevalier. Among other musicians, Henri Rabaud, also once conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now director of the Conservatoire, and Paul Dukas have been made officers. Roger-Ducasse, the composer, and Vanni Marcoux, the operatic baritone, ~~are~~ made chevaliers. Adolph Boschat, critic and biographer of Berlioz, has been promoted to officer.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
EP 1 0 1923

ussevitzky First Russian To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Frederick P. bot, president of the trustees of the ston Symphony Orchestra, an- unced to-day that Serge Koussevitz- had been engaged as conductor for e season beginning with the fall of 24. He will succeed Pierre Monteux d will be the first Russian to lead e Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver n northern Russia) in 1874. He was ght music by his parents, and at age of twelve conducted the or- stra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, where he made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra.

NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 1 0 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last acepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already reestablished their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussetvitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opéra, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khoyantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became a professor of Moscow Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N. Y.
WORLD

SEP 1 0 1923

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT IN BOSTON.

He Will Be First Russian to Lead Symphony Orchestra There—Begins Next Year.

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924, so announced Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the organization to-day.

Mr. Koussevitzky, long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, has, in the last three years, become the dominant figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the only great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, who, at the end of the pending season, will have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra five years.

MUSICAL COUR
Weekly Review of the World's

Editorial

Issue of

Sept - 13 - 1923

KOUSSEWITZKY

A modest paragraph of stop-press news, tucked in the corner of page 17 of last week's issue, stated, in the form of a cable from our Paris correspondent, that Serge Koussewitzky had been chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in the fall of 1924; and this week the exclusive bit of news is confirmed by the official announcement of the orchestra's trustees. Once again the MUSICAL COURIER hit the nail on the head in advance of all other papers. Nothing is easier than to publish "rumors," and the name of Koussewitzky has been bandied about in connection with the Boston position for a year or more, as well as several other names. But the accuracy and promptness of the MUSICAL COURIER's information is shown by the fact that it preceded the official announcement by five days. The story was published in this paper on September 6 and the official announcement issued on September 11.

Koussewitzky is entirely an unknown quantity here, as he has never visited this country. In the ante-revolution days in Russia he had his own orchestra, but it was as a virtuoso on the double bass that he was known throughout Europe. The last few years he has made his headquarters in Paris conducting there and in London and various other places gaining a decided reputation for himself, especially in London. His coming will be awaited with great interest.

The passing of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for an appraisal of his work. Granted that his qualities as a conductor did not excite the general admiration that was the lot of leaders like Gericke, Nikisch and Muck—to name the most illustrious of his predecessors—Mr. Monteux's contribution to the musical history of Boston was nevertheless significant. When he came to Boston he found the symphony orchestra disrupted by the war and he spared no pains to reorganize it. No sooner, however, did the new orchestra begin to function smoothly, than it was again disorganized by a strike which resulted in the elimination of a third of the personnel. Again Mr. Monteux set to work to rebuild the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was the consensus of critical opinion that the early glories of the famous symphony orchestra had been restored, and there were not a few who claimed for it the leadership among orchestras that it enjoyed for many years.

Of Mr. Monteux's abilities it may fairly be said that he has made decided strides as a conductor and that as a program maker he might well serve as a model for many other orchestral leaders. His departure from Boston next spring will be regretted by a considerable part of the orchestra's following in Boston. On the other hand, the time was ripe for a change and the coming of Mr. Koussewitzky will be welcomed by the orchestra's well wishers not only in Boston, but also in New York and the other cities visited by this organization.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept. 13-1923

KOUSSEVITZKY ENGAGED TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

SERGE ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky was born at Vishny Volotchk, northern Russia, on June 30, 1874. He studied at the conservatory at Moscow, his specialty being the double bass. In 1900 he was appointed a professor of that school and at the same time was a member of the Imperial Theater Orchestra. Becoming possessed of great means he went to Berlin, founding there in 1910 a Union for the Advancement of Russian Composers. He also travelled extensively throughout Europe giving recitals on the double bass. With his own private means he maintained a symphony orchestra in Russia and did pioneer work by travelling with it through various districts of the great land that knew nothing of symphonic music.

Koussevitzky remained in Russia during the war and revolution and, like all other prominent figures, was lost to the sight of the outside world for a long time. Then there came the report that he had been elected conductor of the orchestra which was formerly the Czar's private string band. Not long after that he succeeded in getting out of the country and has since made his headquarters in Paris conducting concerts there, in London and in Spain—and opera in Paris and Spain.

Koussevitzky has never visited this country. Arrangements were being made just before the war for him to come over in his capacity of double bass virtuoso but he was prevented from coming.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept 13-1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ANNOUNCES PLANS FOR FORTY-THIRD SEASON

Important Additions to New England Conservatory

Boston, Mass., September 8.—A busy season is anticipated for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A large schedule of concerts has been made, including, besides the forty-eight regular concerts, the five Monday evening concerts, Pension Fund and Young People's Concerts in Boston, fifteen concerts in Greater New York and numerous appearances in New England and other Eastern cities, which will include several concerts in Canada.

Pierre Monteux, who has been devoting a part of his summer in Europe to his annual search for new scores, will return late this month in readiness to begin rehearsals for his fifth season at the head of the orchestra. The personnel will remain as before, with no change in the leaders of the various sections.

A new record has been made in the matter of subscription renewals for the regular series of Boston concerts. The increased waiting list for the Friday afternoon series of twenty-four was considerably more than sufficient to exhaust those seats which were released by former subscribers, so that there was no public sale for this series.

The announcement of soloists to appear at the regular Boston concerts is now made. The singers will include Sigrid Onegin, Elisabeth Rethberg, Eva Gauthier, Vera Janacopulos, Marya Freund, and Roland Hayes. The pianists to appear are Harold Bauer, Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikisch, and E. Robert Schmitz. There will be two violinists—Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch—likewise Pablo Casals and Lionel Tertis, the prominent English viola virtuoso.

The season will open in Boston on October 12.

MONTREAL
CANADA

ISSUE OF

EP 1923

A New Conductor for The Boston Orchestra

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924, is announced.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become a striking figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longest terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded, and subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. He gave a series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

In 1920 circumstances took him westward, and he became a central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
SEP 10 1923

RUSSIAN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Announce the Engagement of Serge Koussevitzky for 1924.

CONDUCTOR NOW IN FRANCE

Previous to War Was a Great Patron of Composers in Native Country.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Will Return From France.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer.

Encouraged Composers.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and then take him to England and Scotland.

From HOME NEWS
Bronx, New York City
SEP 10 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Have Russian Leader

Serge Koussevitzky, who has been active in Western Europe for several seasons, will be the first Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced yesterday. Koussevitzky will take the place during the autumn of 1924. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, who will lead the orchestra for the fifth con[illegible] season this fall.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
SEP 10 1923

Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in 1874, was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra of the Municipal Theatre in his native town. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, where he studied the double bass, which he played in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra. In 1909 he organized an orchestra in Moscow and travelled over Russia with it. After the revolution he was made conductor of the Russian State Orchestra and in 1920 conducted in Paris and London, and also opera at the Grand Opera in Paris.

From SEP 10 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

Symphony Orchestra Season Opening ---Metropolitan Artists as Soloists

The list of soloists who are to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at the pending regular series of symphony concerts is now announced. This will constitute the 43d season of the orchestra, and will open on Oct. 12-13, the double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts extending from then through the following April.

There will be no public sale for the Friday afternoon concerts, since the increasing waiting list will more than exhaust such seats as are released by former subscribers. The few seats still untaken for the Saturday evening concerts are now obtainable.

Pierre Monteux will return from Europe in the latter part of September, in readiness to begin rehearsals for his fifth season as conductor of the orchestra. He has interspersed his period of rest by his quest for new scores of interest, the best of which will be included on the coming programmes for the winter.

Singers

Singers will figure conspicuously in the list of soloists. One of the foremost will be Sigrid Onegin, the contralto of Swedish origin, who first came to this country last autumn to join the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Company. When she came to Boston to give a concert, and later to appear at a pension fund concert, she was immediately called the most important new singer of the season.

The other principal new singer of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season was Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano, who likewise then came from Europe for the first time. In Europe she had been leading soprano of the Dresden opera for a long time. She appeared under Richard Strauss and Arthur Nikisch, and both of these eminent musicians made her their first choice for the interpreation of important scores.

Eva Gauthier, the French-Canadian mezzo soprano, is well known by her several recitals here. She is an ardent exponent of modern song.

Vera Janacopulos, a soprano of striking presence and impressively beautiful voice, is likewise a pioneer of modern songs, better known in Europe than in America, although she made a number of appearances here two seasons ago. She is shortly to return from a busy season in Europe, where she has appeared in several cities of France, Belgium and Spain.

Marya Freund, soprano, will make her first visit to this country.

There will be particular interest in the appearance with the orchestra of Roland Hayes, the colored tenor, who, after having been discovered and trained in Boston, went to Europe, where he gave numerous concerts in England and was highly acclaimed. He has sung in Paris with the Colonne Orchestra, likewise in Vienna and other cities, in each case winning a reception as fully enthusiastic as that of England. Roland Hayes is returning for a tour of this country, which is to include numerous recitals and several appearances with orchestra.

Instrumentalists

Of the pianists to appear in course of the season, the best known from numerous former occasions will be

Harold Bauer, whose favor with the Symphony patrons dates back to his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900, which was also his American debut.

A very great pianist who has not appeared here since 1907 is Moriz Rosenthal, whose return to this country will surely be a principal feature of the musical season. This pupil of Liszt and Joseffy has long been looked upon in Europe as a master virtuoso, second in this respect to none.

Pianists of the younger generation will be E. Robert Schmitz and Mitja Nikisch, who is to make his first visit to America.

There will be two violinists, Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, the Hungarian master. Carl Flesch made a short tour of America in 1914, which terminated with the advent of the war.

Pablo Casals, the master of the violoncello, has not appeared as soloist with the orchestra since 1915. Fritz Kreisler has called him "the greatest musician that has ever drawn a bow."

Lionel Tertis, the English virtuoso viola player, has appeared with orchestra many times in Europe with unvarying success. He will make his first visit to this country this season.

POST-SEPT.

Soloists Announced for New Symphony Season

A musically important season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in Symphony hall. The regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will begin on Oct. 12 and 13, and extend through the winter and spring. This season will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe with new scores of interest, to be included on the programs. The soloists engaged to appear with the orchestra in the course of the season will lend much distinction to these concerts.

SINGERS

The singers will include Sigrid Onegin, a contralto, and Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano, both leading singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company. There will also be Eva Gauthier, the distinguished mezzo-soprano, and Vera Janacopulos and Marya Freund, whose careers as yet have scarcely extended beyond Europe, where, however, they are ranked among the finest interpreters of song. The single tenor will be Roland Hayes, the noted colored singer who, American born, has had tremendous success in Europe.

The pianists will include Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, both having appeared on two previous occasions with this orchestra. There will also be two pianists of European renown: Moriz Rosenthal, called the greatest living exponent of the imperishable school of Liszt. and Mitza Nikisch, a young man of recent rise into prominence. whose coming will have a sentimental interest. in that he is the son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. who died last year.

TRAV. SEPT. 8.

PREFACE TO IMMINENT PLEASURES: ANOTHER SEASON OF SYMPHONY

ORCHESTRA AND CONDUCTOR IN PRIME POWER

Mr. Monteux and His Band, Now Brought to New Excellencies — Catholicity of Taste and Keen Discernment in Programme Making—The Augmented Choir of Horns—The Moving World—Assisting Soloists

WORK truly in the arts, and the goal, if it is worth the gaining, will ever recede. At larger and finer fruition than ever before stood last spring the Symphony Orchestra, as a new régime had gradually reconstituted and remoulded it. Yet in the new year, at beginning only five weeks away, it should go forward to richer fulfillment. Every visible or audible condition favors such progress. Only minor changes in the personnel and the rounding of a full octet of horns will alter the face of the orchestra. Otherwise, alike in virtuosi and in rank and file, it continues the band that Mr. Monteux has sifted, strengthened, schooled and vitalized in his own image. With each year of his present term the conductor's faculties and powers have run deeper and higher, become more sensitive and plastic. Through the season at hand, by every sign of the season past, the ends that he seeks should again, and more amply crown the work. The range of the music that he chooses, the balance that he holds between ancients and moderns, between the saints (as nearly all agree) and the sinners (as a few would have them) have given the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra a liberality and a catholicity hard to match elsewhere—pride for the present, precedent for the future, stimulation always. A free hand was ever the portion of his predecessors. To it he joined not only the open, but the enquiring mind. Yet rarely have the Symphony Concerts found more favor in their own city. A waiting list for the matinées—still waits for places seldom released. The subscribing audience of Saturday evenings steadily increase. The supplementary concerts flourish. Cities, far and near, hear the orchestra gladly. New York, long doubtful yet desiring, has begun to see—or hear—the light.

With these fair winds, conductor and managers may confidently set their course through a new season. The usual series of twenty-four paired concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, to end, again by precedent, in the early days of May. As in recent years, this long succession will be broken by five journeys, each a week long, to New York, Brooklyn and neighboring cities, and by a sixth expedition northward and westward. For Canadian audiences have begun of late to know and to welcome the orchestra. Cities of New England will share it for short series of concerts or for occasional visits.

The Pension Fund for retired or incapacitated members of the orchestra will receive its double due, and one of these concerts is likely to bring Beethoven's Choral Symphony, unheard with choir since Dr. Muck's time, well warranted by Mr. Monteux's version last winter of the three orchestral divisions. So stands the familiar schedule of the orchestra, full, since revenue is a desirable thing; yet not overtaxing since in the virtue of programme and performance lies the source of that revenue.

As already hinted, the orchestra of the year to come remains virtually the orchestra of the year past, since by its works weekly hearers have known and applauded it. No less should it be an orchestra in prime—at the fulness of its powers, yet not drying them into a mechanical and in degree devitalized perfection. (In a relatively recent past the Symphony Concerts knew both these heights and this pitfall.) The rumor of an additional clarinetist passes unfulfilled; while a seventh and an eighth horn joined to the present six meets an obvious need and finally restores the wind choir to former numbers. For two reasons, an octet is essential to the well-being and the range of orchestra and programmes. The horn is a taxing instrument since its quality in the concert-hall depends upon the sensibility in lip, finger, mind and spirit of the player. Four horns may be easily overworked; six are but partial salvation; only in eight is the division of labor secure. Composers, moreover, have written unabashed for eight horns and will not be denied, if their music is to sound even as they imagined. Wagner's four horns and four tenor-tubas—an easy equivalent—are an old story. In this and that tone-poem Strauss insists upon his eight. Bruckner sometimes joins tubas and horns, Wagner-wise; while now and again a full octet left Mahler barely content. He, Bruckner, Strauss of the later tone-poems—as some will say—might endurably be spared; but not if the modern repertory is to stand well rounded and Mr. Monteux is to achieve a just ambition. No luxury, but necessity, is such a choir, since high-placed orchestras must be less borrowers than self-contained and self-sufficient.

In the summer conductors sort and study scores, old and new. In the summer, they search the shelves of the publishers of music and bid composers open portfolios. This year Mr. Monteux has made a long summer of these sports and pastimes, and not until his return from Europe in September will any forecast be possible of chosen pieces. Yet, in a sense, the forecast is already made, being written in the record of two and three years past. Mr. Monteux has seldom overlooked the ancient or the classical composers. Yet is he wisely and resolutely minded that their music shall not be heard so often as to become the routine of inert listening and passive pleasure. As wise is he when he remembers that such composers have written not a little characteristic and abiding music outside their "standard works." There is a Handel of "The Water-Music" as well as of the Concertos; a Beethoven of the ballet, "Prometheus" as well as of the Symphonies and the Overtures. There is also the half-forgotten composer; yet in two or three pieces hardly obsolete. Mr. Monteux now and again rediscovers him. There are the established moderns, hardly less in danger of routine, if they be a Brahms, a Franck or a Wagner, than their remoter predecessors. Mr. Monteux keeps the balance. There are the accepted contemporaries, fruitful still in new music that by title of the composer—say Ravel or Respighi—deserves hearing. Mr. Monteux is mindful.

Finally, for blessing or curse, stand the "ultramoderns"—innovators or iconoclasts of this particular day. Or rather, they do not stand, but insist upon following, each his particular course. Some may not abide their music; others affirm an extravagant ostentatious pleasure in it. Along the middle path goes the open, inquiring, discriminating mind that would discover and appraise each "modernist" according to his purpose and accomplishment. Mr. Monteux takes it; his more intelligent hearers follow as reasonably. The lazy, the hide-bound, the faithful of the past, the fearsome of the present, do not hide [illegible]eir irritation. No more do the by-stand-[illegible] hide their amusement. By no compu[illegible]n need most of us listen to music we[illegible]like. By none, either may these same [illegible]odernists" be stayed or stilled. "In mus[illegible] well as among the planets "the world [illegible] move." It is not altogether wise to let [illegible]ver-pass us. There are fashions in tones as well as in clothes and motor cars. Indifference to the mode is not exactly the badge of the human tribe.

Whatever these programmes, "assisting artists" will grace them plentifully—beyond even the number of recent seasons. Established virtuosi will return like Mr. Bauer, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, since they are still in prime, of their powers. The master-violincellist of our time, signal musician as well, will be heard anew in Mr. Cassals. To Arthur Nikisch, of old conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will succeed his son, Mitja, pianist of

(a)MUSIC ... 48th year begins Oct. 1
OSTON, MASS.
SCHOOL OF THE MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS
structors: Drawing and Painting—Philip L. ale, F. A. Bosley, W. James, L. P. Thompson, K. Cross; Modeling—Charles Grafly, F. W. len; Design—Henry Hunt Clark, A. J. Morse, J. Hunt. Scholarships and Traveling Scho
BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS
Telephone Back Bay 3050

TRANS. SEPT. 8

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
SEP 10 1923

RUSSIAN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Announce the Engagement of Serge Koussevitzky for 1924.

CONDUCTOR NOW IN FRANCE

Previous to War Was a Great Patron of Composers in Native Country.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Will Return From France.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer.

Encouraged Composers.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and then take him to England and Scotland.

From HOME NEWS
Bronx, New York City
SEP 10 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Have Russian Leader

Serge Koussevitzky, who has been active in Western Europe for several seasons, will be the first Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced yesterday.

Koussevitzky will take the place during the autumn of 1924. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, who will lead the orchestra for the fifth consecutive season this fall.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
SEP 10 1923

Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in 1874, was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra of the Municipal Theatre in his native town. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, where he studied the double bass, which he played in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra. In 1909 he organized an orchestra in Moscow and travelled over Russia with it. After the revolution he was made conductor of the Russian State Orchestra and in 1920 conducted in Paris and London, and also opera at the Grand Opera in Paris.

From
Evening Sun
New York City
SEP 10 1923

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

Symphony Orchestra Season Opening ---Metropolitan Artists as Soloists

The list of soloists who are to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at the pending regular series of symphony concerts is now announced. This will constitute the 43d season of the orchestra, and will open on Oct. 12-13, the double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts extending from then through the following April.

There will be no public sale for the Friday afternoon concerts, since the increasing waiting list will more than exhaust such seats as are released by former subscribers. The few seats still untaken for the Saturday evening concerts are now obtainable.

Pierre Monteux will return from Europe in the latter part of September, in readiness to begin rehearsals for his fifth season as conductor of the orchestra. He has interspersed his period of rest by his quest for new scores of interest, the best of which will be included on the coming programmes for the winter.

Singers

Singers will figure conspicuously in the list of soloists. One of the foremost will be Sigrid Onegin, the contralto of Swedish origin, who first came to this country last autumn to join the roster of the Metropolitan Opera Company. When she came to Boston to give a concert, and later to appear at a pension fund concert, she was immediately called the most important new singer of the season.

The other principal new singer of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season was Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano, who likewise then came from Europe for the first time. In Europe she had been leading soprano of the Dresden opera for a long time. She appeared under Richard Strauss and Arthur Nikisch, and both of these eminent musicians made her their first choice for the interpreation of important scores.

Eva Gauthier, the French-Canadian mezzo soprano, is well known by her several recitals here. She is an ardent exponent of modern song.

Vera Janacopulos, a soprano of striking presence and impressively beautiful voice, is likewise a pioneer of modern songs, better known in Europe than in America, although she made a number of appearances here two seasons ago. She is shortly to return from a busy season in Europe, where she has appeared in several cities of France, Belgium and Spain.

Marya Freund, soprano, will make her first visit to this country.

There will be particular interest in the appearance with the orchestra of Roland Hayes, the colored tenor, who, after having been discovered and trained in Boston, went to Europe, where he gave numerous concerts in England and was highly acclaimed. He has sung in Paris with the Colonne Orchestra, likewise in Vienna and other cities, in each case winning a reception as fully enthusiastic as that of England. Roland Hayes is returning for a tour of this country, which is to include numerous recitals and several appearances with orchestra.

Instrumentalists

Of the pianists to appear in course of the season, the best known from numerous former occasions will be Harold Bauer, whose favor with the Symphony patrons dates back to his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900, which was also his American debut.

A very great pianist who has not appeared here since 1907 is Moriz Rosenthal, whose return to this country will surely be a principal feature of the musical season. This pupil of Liszt and Joseffy has long been looked upon in Europe as a master virtuoso, second in this respect to none.

Pianists of the younger generation will be E. Robert Schmitz and Mitja Nikisch, who is to make his first visit to America.

There will be two violinists, Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, the Hungarian master. Carl Flesch made a short tour of America in 1914, which terminated with the advent of the war.

Pablo Casals, the master of the violoncello, has not appeared as soloist with the orchestra since 1915. Fritz Kreisler has called him "the greatest musician that has ever drawn a bow."

Lionel Tertis, the English virtuoso viola player, has appeared with orchestra many times in Europe with unvarying success. He will make his first visit to this country this season.

POST-SEPT.

Soloists Announced for New Symphony Season

A musically important season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in Symphony hall. The regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will begin on Oct. 12 and 13, and extend through the winter and spring. This season will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe with new scores of interest, to be included on the programs. The soloists engaged to appear with the orchestra in the course of the season will lend much distinction to these concerts.

SINGERS

The singers will include Sigrid Onegin, a contralto, and Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano, both leading singers of the Metropolitan Opera Company. There will also be Eva Gauthier, the distinguished mezzo-soprano, and Vera Janacopulos and Marya Freund, whose careers as yet have scarcely extended beyond Europe, where, however, they are ranked among the finest interpreters of song. The single tenor will be Roland Hayes, the noted colored singer who, American born, has had tremendous success in Europe.

The pianists will include Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, both having appeared on two previous occasions with this orchestra. There will also be two pianists of European renown: Moriz Rosenthal, called the greatest living exponent of the imperishable school of Liszt, and Mitza Nikisch, a young man of recent rise into prominence, whose coming will have a sentimental interest, in that he is the son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who died last year.

TRAN. SEPT. 8.

PREFACE TO IMMINENT PLEASURES: ANOTHER SEASON OF SYMPHONY

ORCHESTRA AND CONDUCTOR IN PRIME POWER

Mr. Monteux and His Band, Now Brought to New Excellencies — Catholicity of Taste and Keen Discernment in Programme Making—The Augmented Choir of Horns—The Moving World—Assisting Soloists

WORK truly in the arts, and the goal, if it is worth the gaining, will ever recede. At larger and finer fruition than ever before stood last spring the Symphony Orchestra, as a new régime had gradually reconstituted and remoulded it. Yet in the new year, at beginning only five weeks away, it should go forward to richer fulfillment. Every visible or audible condition favors such progress. Only minor changes in the personnel and the rounding of a full octet of horns will alter the face of the orchestra. Otherwise, alike in virtuosi and in rank and file, it continues the band that Mr. Monteux has sifted, strengthened, schooled and vitalized in his own image. With each year of his present term the conductor's faculties and powers have run deeper and higher, become more sensitive and plastic. Through the season at hand, by every sign of the season past, the ends that he seeks should again, and more amply crown the work. The range of the music that he chooses, the balance that he holds between ancients and moderns, between the saints (as nearly all agree) and the sinners (as a few would have them) have given the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra a liberality and a catholicity hard to match elsewhere—pride for the present, precedent for the future, stimulation always. A free hand was ever the portion of his predecessors. To it he joined not only the open, but the enquiring mind. Yet rarely have the Symphony Concerts found more favor in their own city. A waiting list for the matinées—still waits for places seldom released. The subscribing audience of Saturday evenings steadily increase. The supplementary concerts flourish. Cities, far and near, hear the orchestra gladly. New York, long doubtful yet desiring, has begun to see—or hear—the light.

With these fair winds, conductor and managers may confidently set their course through a new season. The usual series of twenty-four paired concerts will begin at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, to end, again by precedent, in the early days of May. As in recent years, this long succession will be broken by five journeys, each a week long, to New York, Brooklyn and neighboring cities, and by a sixth expedition northward and westward. For Canadian audiences have begun of late to know and to welcome the orchestra. Cities of New England will share it for short series of concerts or for occasional visits

The Pension Fund for retired or incapacitated members of the orchestra will receive its double due, and one of these concerts is likely to bring Beethoven's Choral Symphony, unheard with choir since Dr. Muck's time, well warranted by Mr. Monteux's version last winter of the three orchestral divisions. So stands the familiar schedule of the orchestra, full, since revenue is a desirable thing; yet not overtaxing since in the virtue of programme and performance lies the source of that revenue.

As already hinted, the orchestra of the year to come remains virtually the orchestra of the year past, since by its works weekly hearers have known and applauded it. No less should it be an orchestra in prime—at the fulness of its powers, yet not drying them into a mechanical and in degree devitalized perfection. (In a relatively recent past the Symphony Concerts knew both these heights and this pitfall.) The rumor of an additional clarinetist passes unfulfilled; while a seventh and an eighth horn joined to the present six meets an obvious need and finally restores the wind choir to former numbers. For two reasons, an octet is essential to the well-being and the range of orchestra and programmes. The horn is a taxing instrument since its quality in the concert-hall depends upon the sensibility in lip, finger, mind and spirit of the player. Four horns may be easily overworked; six are but partial salvation; only in eight is the division of labor secure. Composers, moreover, have written unabashed for eight horns and will not be denied, if their music is to sound even as they imagined. Wagner's four horns and four tenor-tubas—an easy equivalent—are an old story. In this and that tone-poem Strauss insists upon his eight. Bruckner sometimes joins tubas and horns, Wagner-wise; while now and again a full octet left Mahler barely content. He, Bruckner, Strauss of the later tone-poems—as some will say—might endurably be spared; but not if the modern repertory is to stand well rounded and Mr. Monteux is to achieve a just ambition. No luxury, but necessity, is such a choir, since high-placed orchestras must be less borrowers than self-contained and self-sufficient.

In the summer conductors sort and study scores, old and new. In the summer, they search the shelves of the publishers of music and bid composers open portfolios. This year Mr. Monteux has made a long summer of these sports and pastimes, and not until his return from Europe in September will any forecast be possible of chosen pieces. Yet, in a sense, the forecast is already made, being written in the record of two and three years past. Mr. Monteux has seldom overlooked the ancient or the classical composers. Yet is he wisely and resolutely minded that their music shall not be heard so often as to become the routine of inert listening and passive pleasure. As wise is he when he remembers that such composers have written not a little characteristic and abiding music outside their "standard works." There is a Handel of "The Water-Music" as well as of the Concertos; a Beethoven of the ballet, "Prometheus" as well as of the Symphonies and the Overtures. There is also the half-forgotten composer; yet in two or three pieces hardly obsolete. Mr. Monteux now and again rediscovers him. There are the established moderns, hardly less in danger of routine, if they be a Brahms, a Franck or a Wagner, than their remoter predecessors. Mr. Monteux keeps the balance. There are the accepted contemporaries, fruitful still in new music that by title of the composer—say Ravel or Respighi—deserves hearing. Mr. Monteux is mindful.

Finally, for blessing or curse, stand the "ultramoderns"—innovators or iconoclasts of this particular day. Or rather, they do not stand, but insist upon following, each his particular course. Some may not abide their music; others affirm an extravagant ostentatious pleasure in it. Along the middle path goes the open, inquiring, discriminating mind that would discover and appraise each "modernist" according to his purpose and accomplishment. Mr. Monteux takes it; his more intelligent hearers follow as reasonably. The lazy, the hide-bound, the faithful of the past, the fearsome of the present, do not hide their irritation. No more do the by-standers hide their amusement. By no compulsion need most of us listen to music we dislike. By none, either may these same "modernists" be stayed or stilled. In music as well as among the planets "the world do move." It is not altogether wise to let it over-pass us. There are fashions in tones as well as in clothes and motor cars. Indifference to the mode is not exactly the badge of the human tribe.

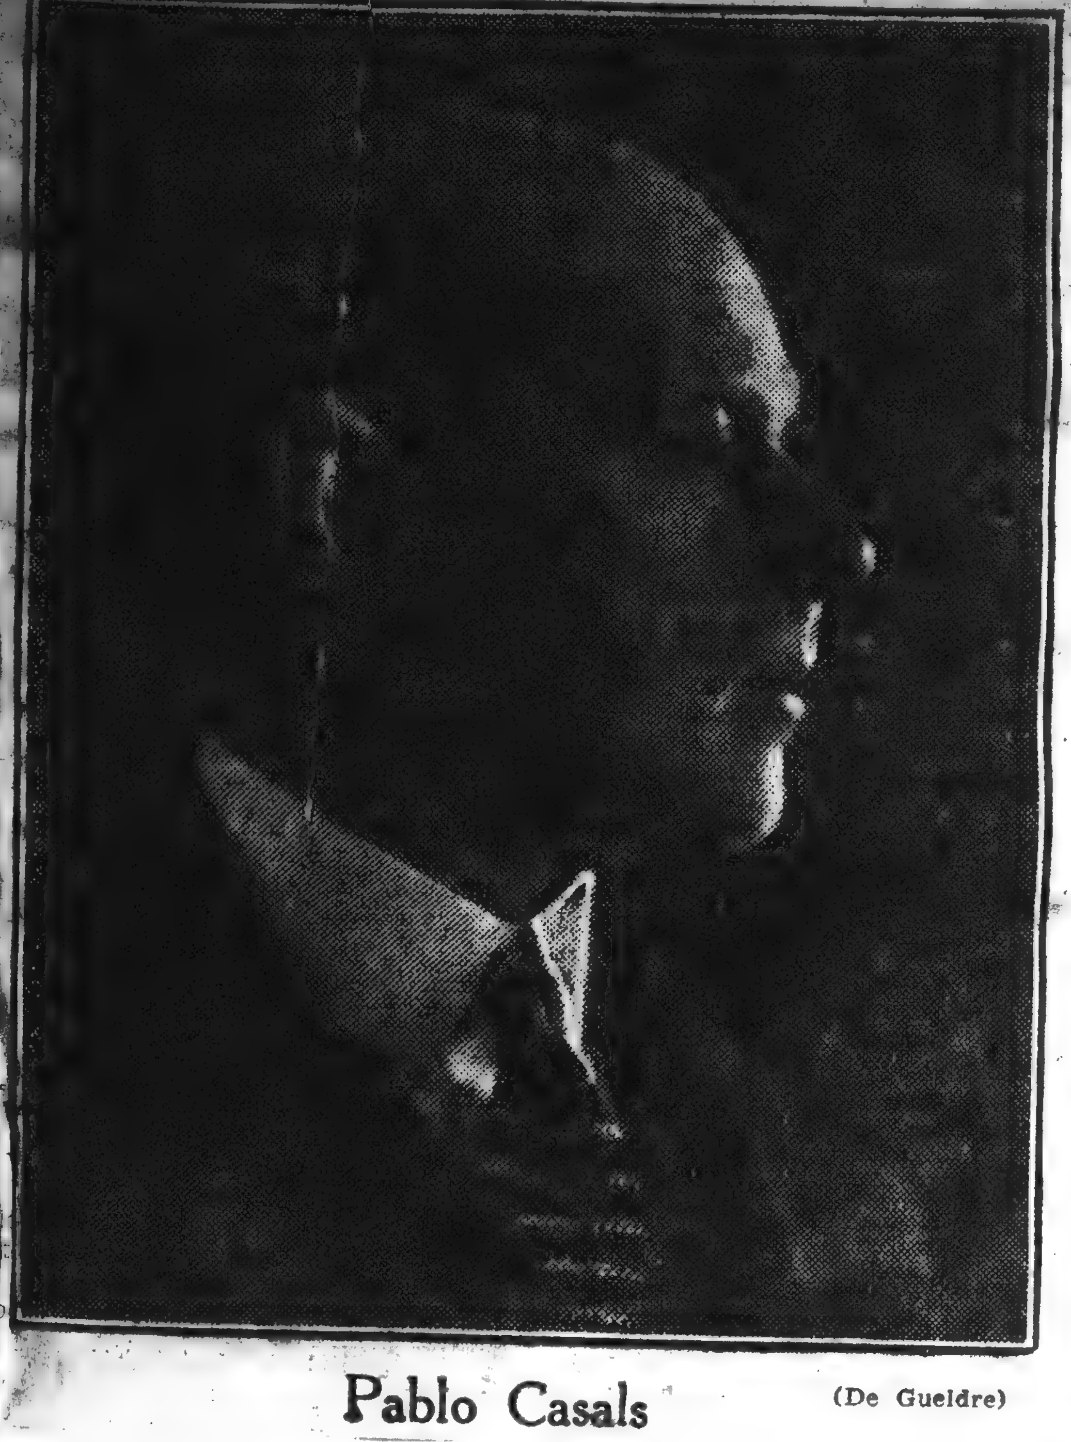
Whatever these programmes, "assisting artists" will grace them plentifully—beyond even the number of recent seasons. Established virtuosi will return like Mr. Bauer, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, since they are still in prime of their powers. The master-violincellist of our time, signal musician as well, will be heard anew in Mr. Cassals. To Arthur Nikisch, of old conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will succeed his son, Mitja, pianist of and to the rising generation. A renowned viola-player—rare species of virtuoso—comes from London in Mr. Tertis. Out of the past, but undiminished, returns Rosenthal, pianist, of hand, mind and, sometimes, heart. For foil, out of the younger French pianists, Mr. Schmitz will have place—and he is devotee of the "modernists." Mr. Flesch, able German violinist, barely discovered in America before the late war, keeps the international balance even.

Best of all, each and every singer [illegible] be newcomers "to these concerts" and of the new generation as well—Mme. O[illegible] gen of the spacious and lustrous [illegible] Miss Rethberg, best-liked of the young German singers at the Metropolitan Opera House; Mme. Gauthier, champion of [illegible] "modernists" rewarded; Mme. Janacopulos champion of the "modernists" remembered and re-discovered; Mme. Freund with [illegible] way to make, yet not without credentials; Mr. Hayes, the tenor, at last and deservedly summoned in his own country to an orchestra of the first rank. Re-read the list [illegible] re-measure it. No clearer proof could [illegible] be of the new freedom, the new pleasure of the Symphony concerts. At last [illegible] court youth.

H. T. P.

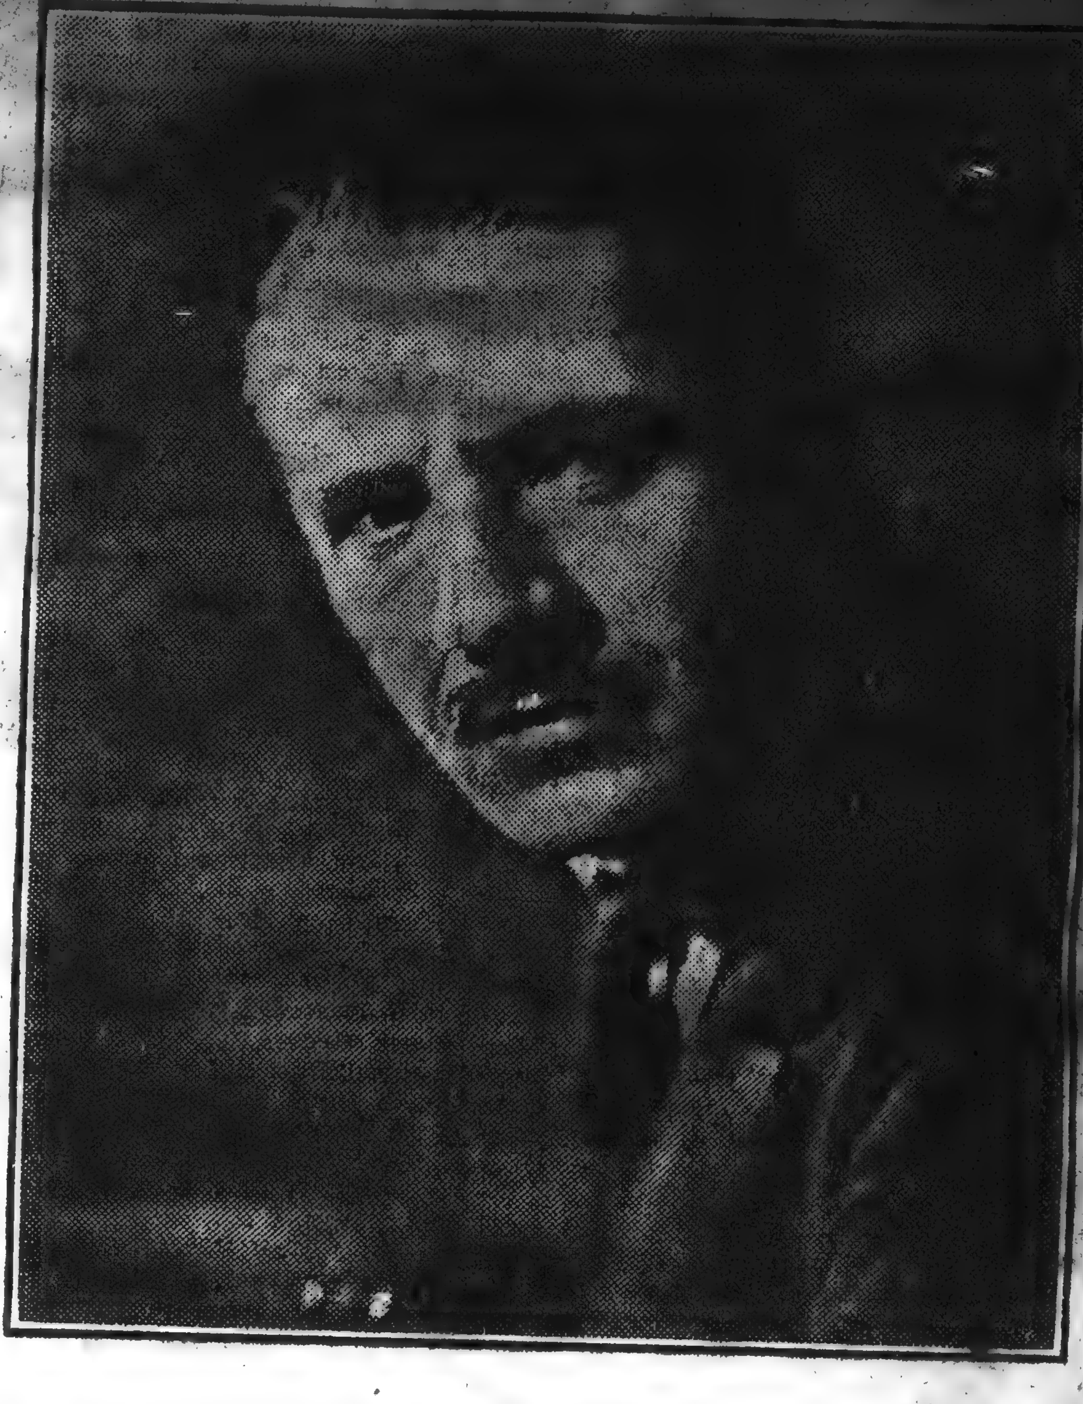
[117]

Newcomer and Old Favorites---Soloists With the Symphony This Season



Pablo Casals (De Gueldre)

Vera Janacopulos (De Strelecki)



Jacques Thibaud (Kesslere)

TRANS. SEPT. 8.

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED

The complete list of soloists for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts, now announced, is more attractive than for several seasons past. As usual there are one or two names that do not seem quite explicable. But the proportion of first-rate newcomers is unusually high.

Many among the local public interested in music will be especially glad to see Roland Hayes' name in the list, where it might well have appeared several seasons back. He is as great a musician as Boston has yet produced, and now not without honor in his own country.

He has sung with several leading European orchestras, and won the highest praise everywhere, not as a negro singer, but as one of the few really fine tenors to be heard in this generation, regardless of racial and National considerations.

Another name of especial interest to Bostonians is that of Mitja Nikisch, son of the former conductor of the orchestra, who is to make his American debut after attaining eminence as a pianist in Germany and England.

Of the other artists making their first appearances as soloists at these concerts Sigrid Onegin, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, whose voice is all that the passionate press agent claims it to be, as those who heard her recital here last season will testify, will be awaited eagerly by many.

Pablo Casals is again to be a soloist. He is the one and only 'cellist who ever made a concerto for violoncello and orchestra really enjoyable to the present writer.

Who They Are to Be

Moritz Rosenthal, a pianist known only by name to most of the younger generation in America, is coming back. Carl Flesch, whom some will recall as an excellent violinist heard in recital and with the Symphony in 1914, is another artist in the list better known in Europe than hereabouts.

Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud are the only players in the list who have played much with the Symphony, and most people are always glad to hear either of them, especially on their "good days."

The other singers, besides Roland Hayes and Mme Onegin, are to be Eva Gauthier, whose devotion to ultra modern song, and distinctive interpretations are more responsible than her voice for her fame; Elizabeth Rethberg, a soprano new to the Metropolitan last year and well though not extravagantly spoken of by those who have heard her, Vera Janocoupolos and Marya Freund, the last two practically unknown here, even by name. These two are sopranos and reputed famous in Europe.

An interesting novelty will be the appearance as soloist of Lionel Tertis, an Englishman who has won reputation as a viola player.

E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist often heard here in recital, is again to be a soloist. His name completes the list.

No information is at hand as to what pieces the soloists and conductor may agree upon as best suited to display their respective talents without disturbing the dignity of the Symphony programs.

If anybody else chooses "Vissi d'Arte," from "La Tosca," by Puccini, as one soprano did last year, there is one reviewer not disposed to let the lowering of the standard pass without any comment, as he did last time. It was the first performance of that aria at a Boston Symphony concert, and the first of any work by Puccini.

Vocalists have a far easier choice of numbers for orchestral performance than pianists or violinists. Most concertos are inferior specimens of the work of fourth-rate composers, like Vieuxtemps, Popper, Saint-Saens, and innumerable Teutons of the caliber of Raff.

What They Might Play

Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mozart and some still older composers like Bach, have indeed given us a few concertos worth listening to. Beethoven's violin concerto is still the best, but most concert goers know it almost by heart and long for something else. Not so the writer, who prefers the good things heard before to the dubious things as yet unheard.

If we must have pianists, violinists and occasionally harpists and other virtuosi as soloists, is not there still something to be said for lettting them play a few short pieces without encores to piano accompaniment. When we be- [illegible] devoted to music for its own sake our orchestral concerts will not advertise soloists at all, and will only employ them when it is desired to play a composition absolutely requiring their services.

But this is expecting too much from poor human nature. Meanwhile, if we must have soloists, to make sure that enough people will come to the concerts, why disguise the fact that they are there as window dressing? With some of them a mere appearance on the stage without any performance would suffice to give the audience its money's worth, and the supposedly indispensable relaxation from the somber nobility of symphonic music. Only when a Melba comes and sings "Vo' che sapete," a Paderewski plays the "Emperor" concerto, or a Kreisler, the violin concerto of Beethoven, does one listener feel that the soloist really added to the pleasure, the musical pleasure of the afternoon at the Symphony.

The list of soloists for the Monday concerts is not yet announced, though the series is to be given as for the past two years, and seats are to be had. This series offers a good chance for younger and less illustrious artists of high caliber and established position to appear. If the management could afford it the highest fees ought to go to the soloists at these concerts. Their public is less accustomed to orchestral music and much more disposed than that of the regular series to make a fuss over the soloist and over nothing else in the concert.

No details are yet forthcoming about the Symphony programs, nor about the general concert prospects, save a few scattered hints, and the announcement of Shuro Cherkassky for Sept 30, McCormack for Oct 7 at Symphony Hall. The following attraction will be Chaliapin Oct 14, de Pachmann Oct 21 and Schumann-Heink Oct 28.

Cherkassky, to judge by competent witnesses in Baltimore, is not at all the ordinary "infant prodigy," but a pianist artistically mature in many ways at the tender age of 12. e shall hear what we shall hear, but those curious about spotting the early efforts of those about to become great might well go to Symphony Hall Sept 30 on the off chance that they will want to be able to say in years to come when Cherkassky is mentioned, as people now say of Josef Hofmann, "Yes, I heard him the first time he ever played in Boston."

GLOBE SEPT. 9

43D SEASON OF SYMPHONY SERIES BEGINS OCT. 12

An eventful and musically important season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin on Oct. 12 and 13 and extend through the winter and spring. This season will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe with new scores of interest, to be included on the programs.

The subscription renewals exceeded all records and indeed there will be no Friday afternoon seats placed on sale. For the Saturday evening concerts a limited number of seats are now available.

The singers already engaged follow: Sigrid Onegin, a contralto; Elizabeth Rothberg, soprano; Eva Gauthier, the distinguished mezzo-soprano; Vera Janacopulos and Marya Freund, whose careers as yet, have scarcely extended beyond Europe, and Roland Hayes, the noted negro tenor.

The pianists to appear include Harold Bauer, and E. Robert Schmitz, the distinguished French musician. There will also be two pianists of high European renown, Moris Rosenthal and Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last year.

Pablo Casals, the supreme master of the cello, will likewise be one of the soloists. The violinists will include Jacques Thibaud, Carl Flesch and Lionel Tertis, the famous English viola player, who is to come to this country for the first time.

TELEGRAM SEPT

Famous Soloists for Symphony Season

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-third season, which will begin October 12 and 13, and extend through the Winter and Spring, many noted soloists have been engaged.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will return from Europe shortly. The personnel of the orchestra will remain as before, except that two new horn players have been secured to make a complete octet. A new record is being set in the matter of subscription renewals. The waiting list for the Friday afternoon concerts more than exhausted seats released by former subscribers. A few seats for the aSturday evening concerts are now on sale.

Conspicuous among the pianists to appear with the orchestra in the course of the season is Moriz Rosenthal, foremost apostle of the romantic tradition of Liszt. A newcomer to this country will be Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who died last year. The other two pianoists will be Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz.

Prominent among the singers are two artists who came from Europe last year to join the Metropolitan Opera Company, Sigrid Onegin, Swedish contralto, and Elizabeth Rethberg, long leading soprano of the Dresden Opera.

Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano; Vera Janacopulos, Greco-Brazilian soprano, and Marya Freund, French soprano, are all famous abroad. The only tenor in the list is Roland Hayes, negro artist, [illegible] America and trained in Boston, and now an international celebrity.

The two violinists to appear are Carl Flesch, Hungarian virtuoso, and Jacques Thibaud, Pablo Casals and Lionel Tertis, 'cellists, are also to appear. Tertis is a famous Englishman.

SYMPHONY CONCERT STARS

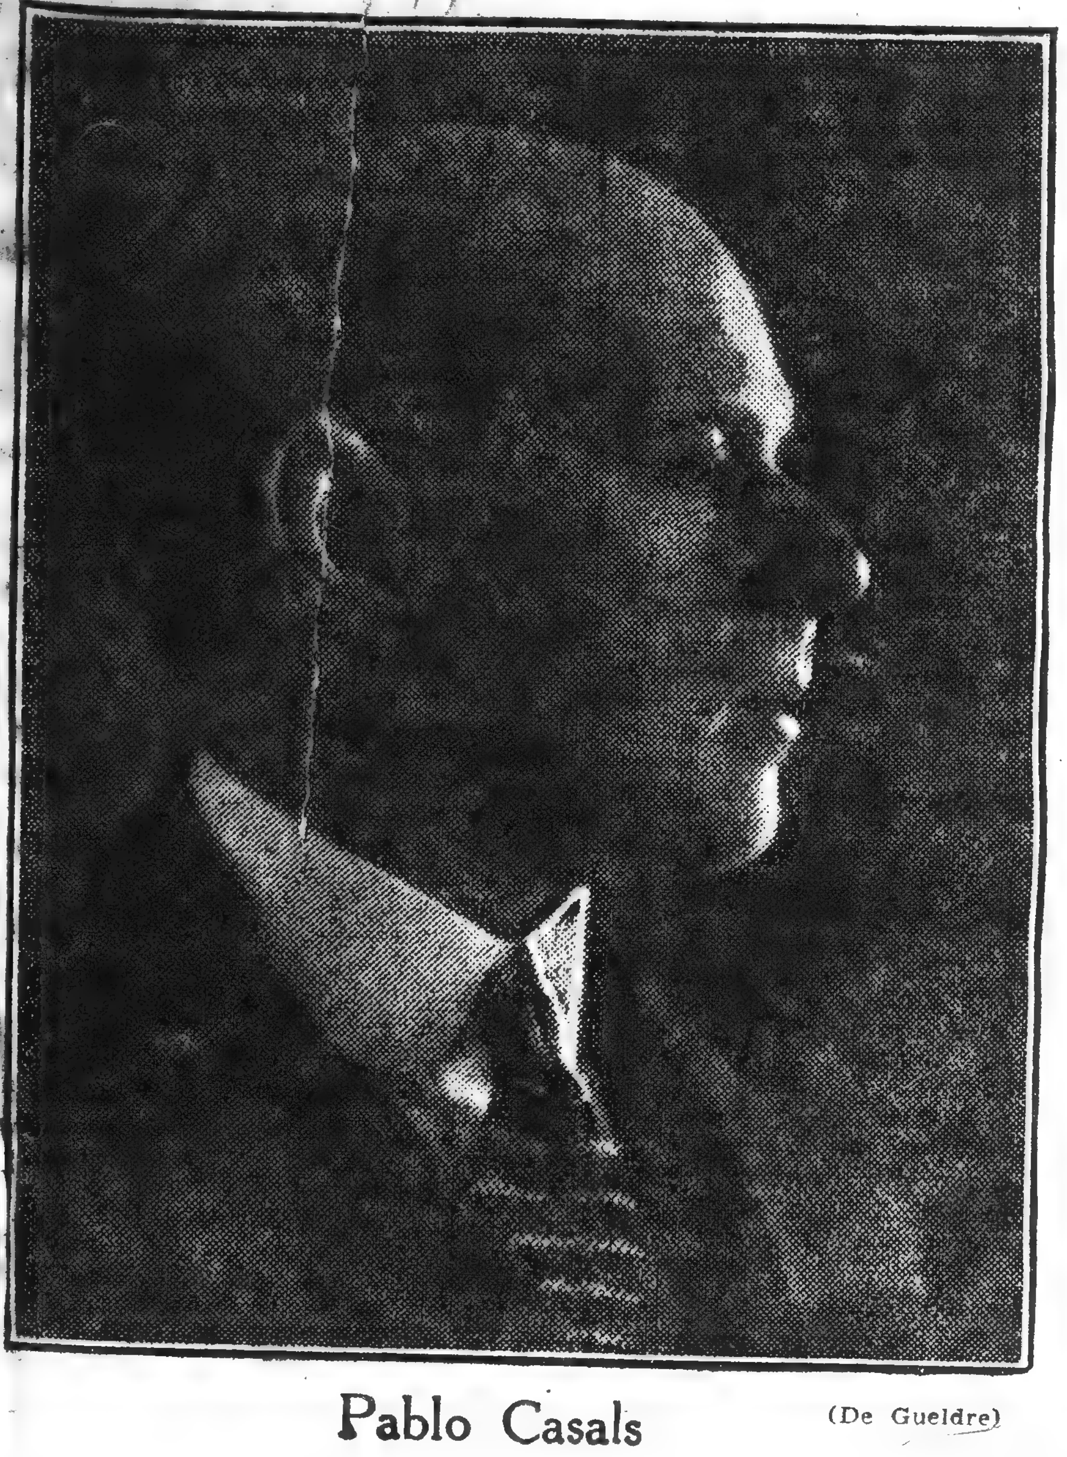
Sigrid Onegin

Elizabeth Rethberg

Eva Gauthier

ADVTSR - SEPT 9

Newcomer and Old Favorites---Soloists With the Symphony This Season



Pablo Casals (De Gueldre)

Vera Janacopulos (De Strelecki)

Jacques Thibaud (Kesslere)

T[illegible] SEPT. 8

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED

The complete list of soloists for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts, now announced, is more attractive than for several seasons past. As usual there are one or two names that do not seem quite explicable. But the proportion of first-rate newcomers is unusually high.

Many among the local public interested in music will be especially glad to see Roland Hayes' name in the list, where it might well have appeared several seasons back. He is as great a musician as Boston has yet produced, and now not without honor in his own country.

He has sung with several leading European orchestras, and won the highest praise everywhere, not as a negro singer, but as one of the few really fine tenors to be heard in this generation, regardless of racial and National considerations.

Another name of especial interest to Bostonians is that of Mitja Nikisch, son of the former conductor of the orchestra, who is to make his American debut after attaining eminence as a pianist in Germany and England.

Of the other artists making their first appearances as soloists at these concerts Sigrid Onegin, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, whose voice is all that the passionate press agent claims it to be, as those who heard her recital here last season will testify, will be awaited eagerly by many.

Pablo Casals is again to be a soloist. He is the one and only 'cellist who ever made a concerto for violoncello and orchestra really enjoyable to the present writer.

Who They Are to Be

Moritz Rosenthal, a pianist known only by name to most of the younger generation in America, is coming back. Carl Flesch, whom some will recall as an excellent violinist heard in recital and with the Symphony in 1914, is another artist in the list better known in Europe than hereabouts.

Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud are the only players in the list who have played much with the Symphony, and most people are always glad to hear either of them, especially on their "good days."

The other singers, besides Roland Hayes and Mme Onegin, are to be Eva Gauthier, whose devotion to ultra modern song, and distinctive interpretations are more responsible than her voice for her fame; Elizabeth Rethberg, a soprano new to the Metropolitan last year and well though not extravagantly spoken of by those who have heard her, Vera Janocoupolos and Marya Freund, the last two practically unknown here, even by name. These two are sopranos and reputed famous in Europe.

An interesting novelty will be the appearance as soloist of Lionel Tertis, an Englishman who has won reputation as a viola player.

E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist often heard here in recital, is again to be a soloist. His name completes the list.

No information is at hand as to what pieces the soloists and conductor may agree upon as best suited to display their respective talents without disturbing the dignity of the Symphony programs.

If anybody else chooses "Vissi d'Arte," from "La Tosca," by Puccini, as one soprano did last year, there is one reviewer not disposed to let the lowering of the standard pass without any comment, as he did last time. It was the first performance of that aria at a Boston Symphony concert, and the first of any work by Puccini.

Vocalists have a far easier choice of numbers for orchestral performance than pianists or violinists. Most concertos are inferior specimens of the work of fourth-rate composers, like Vieuxtemps, Popper, Saint-Saens, and innumerable Teutons of the caliber of Raff.

What They Might Play

Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mozart and some still older composers like Bach, have indeed given us a few concertos worth listening to. Beethoven's violin concerto is still the best, but most concert goers know it almost by heart and long for something else. Not so the writer, who prefers the good things heard before to the dubious things as yet unheard.

If we must have pianists, violinists and occasionally harpists and other virtuosi as soloists, is not there still something to be said for lettting them play a few short pieces without encores to piano accompaniment. When we become really devoted to music for its own sake our orchestral concerts will not advertise soloists at all, and will only employ them when it is desired to play a composition absolutely requiring their services.

But this is expecting too much from poor human nature. Meanwhile, if we must have soloists, to make sure that enough people will come to the concerts, why disguise the fact that they are there as window dressing? With some of them a mere appearance on the stage without any performance would suffice to give the audience its money's worth, and the supposedly indispensable relaxation from the somber nobility of symphonic music. Only when a Melba comes and sings "Vo' che sapete," a Paderewski plays the "Emperor" concerto, or a Kreisler, the violin concerto of Beethoven, does one listener feel that the soloist really added to the pleasure, the musical pleasure of the afternoon at the Symphony.

The list of soloists for the Monday concerts is not yet announced, though the series is to be given as for the past two years, and seats are to be had. This series offers a good chance for younger and less illustrious artists of high caliber and established position to appear. If the management could afford it the highest fees ought to go to the soloists at these concerts. Their public is less accustomed to orchestral music and much more disposed than that of the regular series to make a fuss over the soloist and over nothing else in the concert.

No details are yet forthcoming about the Symphony programs, nor about the general concert prospects, save a few scattered hints, and the announcement of Shuro Cherkassky for Sept 30, McCormack for Oct 7 at Symphony Hall. The following attraction will be Chaliapin Oct 14, de Pachmann Oct 21 and Schumann-Heink Oct 28.

Cherkassky, to judge by competent witnesses in Baltimore, is not at all the ordinary "infant prodigy," but a pianist artistically mature in many ways at the tender age of 12. We shall hear what we shall hear, but those curious about spotting the early efforts of those about to become great might well go to Symphony Hall Sept 30 on the off chance that they will want to be able to say in years to come when Cherkassky is mentioned, as people now say of Josef Hofmann, "Yes, I heard him the first time he ever played in Boston."

43D SEASON OF SYMPHONY SERIES BEGINS OCT. 12

An eventful and musically important season of Boston Symphony concerts will begin on Oct. 12 and 13 and extend through the winter and spring. This season will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe with new scores of pieces, to be included on the programs.

The subscription renewals exceeded all records and indeed there will be no Friday afternoon seats placed on sale. For the Saturday evening concerts a limited number of seats are now available.

The singers already engaged follow: Sigrid Onegin a contralto; Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano; Eva Gauthier the distinguished mezzo-soprano, Vera Janacopulos and Marya Freund, whose careers as yet have scarcely extended beyond Europe, and Roland Hayes, the noted negro tenor.

The pianists to appear include Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, the distinguished French musician. There will also be two pianists of high European renown, Moris Rosenthal and Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last year.

Pablo Casals, the supreme master of the cello, will likewise be one of the soloists. The violinists will include Jacques Thibaud, Carl Flesch and Lionel Tertis, the famous English viola player, who is to come to this country for the first time.

Famous Soloists for Symphony Season

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-third season, which will begin October 12 and 13, and extend through the Winter and Spring, many noted soloists have been engaged.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will return from Europe shortly. The personnel of the orchestra will remain as before, except that two new horn players have been secured to make a complete octet. A new record is being set in the matter of subscription renewals. The waiting list for the Friday afternoon concerts more than exhausted seats released by former subscribers. A few seats for the aSturday evening concerts are now on sale.

Conspicuous among the pianists to appear with the orchestra in the course of the season is Moriz Rosenthal, foremost apostle of the romantic tradition of Liszt. A newcomer to this country will be Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who died last year. The other two pianoists will be Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz.

Prominent among the singers are two artists who came from Europe last year to join the Metropolitan Opera Company, Sigrid Onegin, Swedish contralto, and Elizabeth Rethberg, long leading soprano of the Dresden Opera.

Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano; Vera Janacapulos, Greco-Brazilian soprano, and Marya Freund, French soprano, are all famous abroad. The only tenor in the list is Roland Hayes, negro artist, born in America and trained in Boston, and now an international celebrity.

The two violinists to appear are Carl Flesch, Hungarian virtuoso, and Jacques Thibaud, Pablo Casals and Lionel Tertis, 'cellists, are also to appear. Tertis is a famous Englishman.

SYMPHONY CONCERT STARS

Sigrid Onegin

Elizabeth Rethberg

Eva Gauthier

ADVER- SEPT 7

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN THE SERIES OF CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL BEGINNING OCTOBER 12

ELIZABETH RETHBERG, SOPRANO

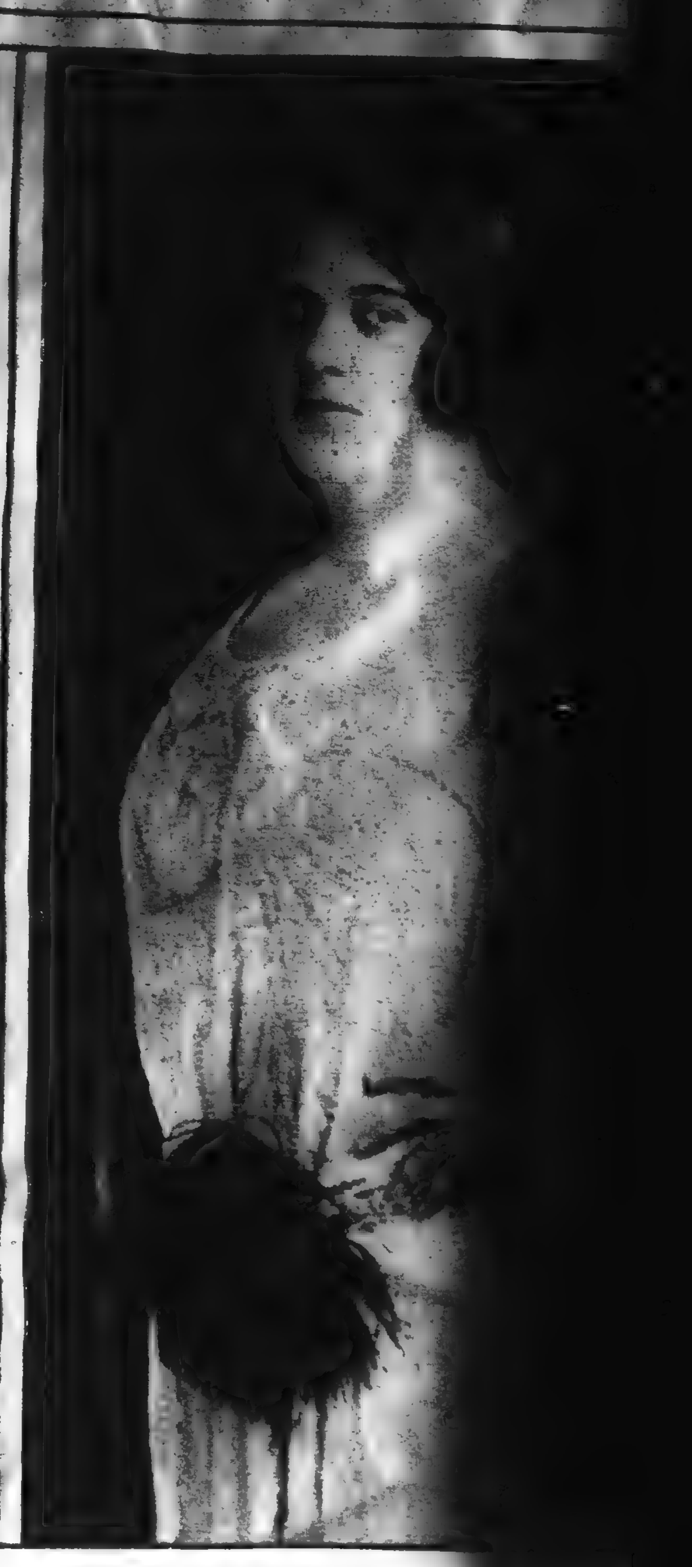
This Will Be Her First Appearance in Boston. She Was Praised Highly in New York and Has Had Many Successful Seasons with the Dresden Opera.

HAROLD BAUER

A Well Known Pianist and a Favorite of Long Standing with the Patrons of Symphony Concerts. He Has Appeared as Soloist at These Concerts on Numerous Occasions, Contributing Much to Their Success.

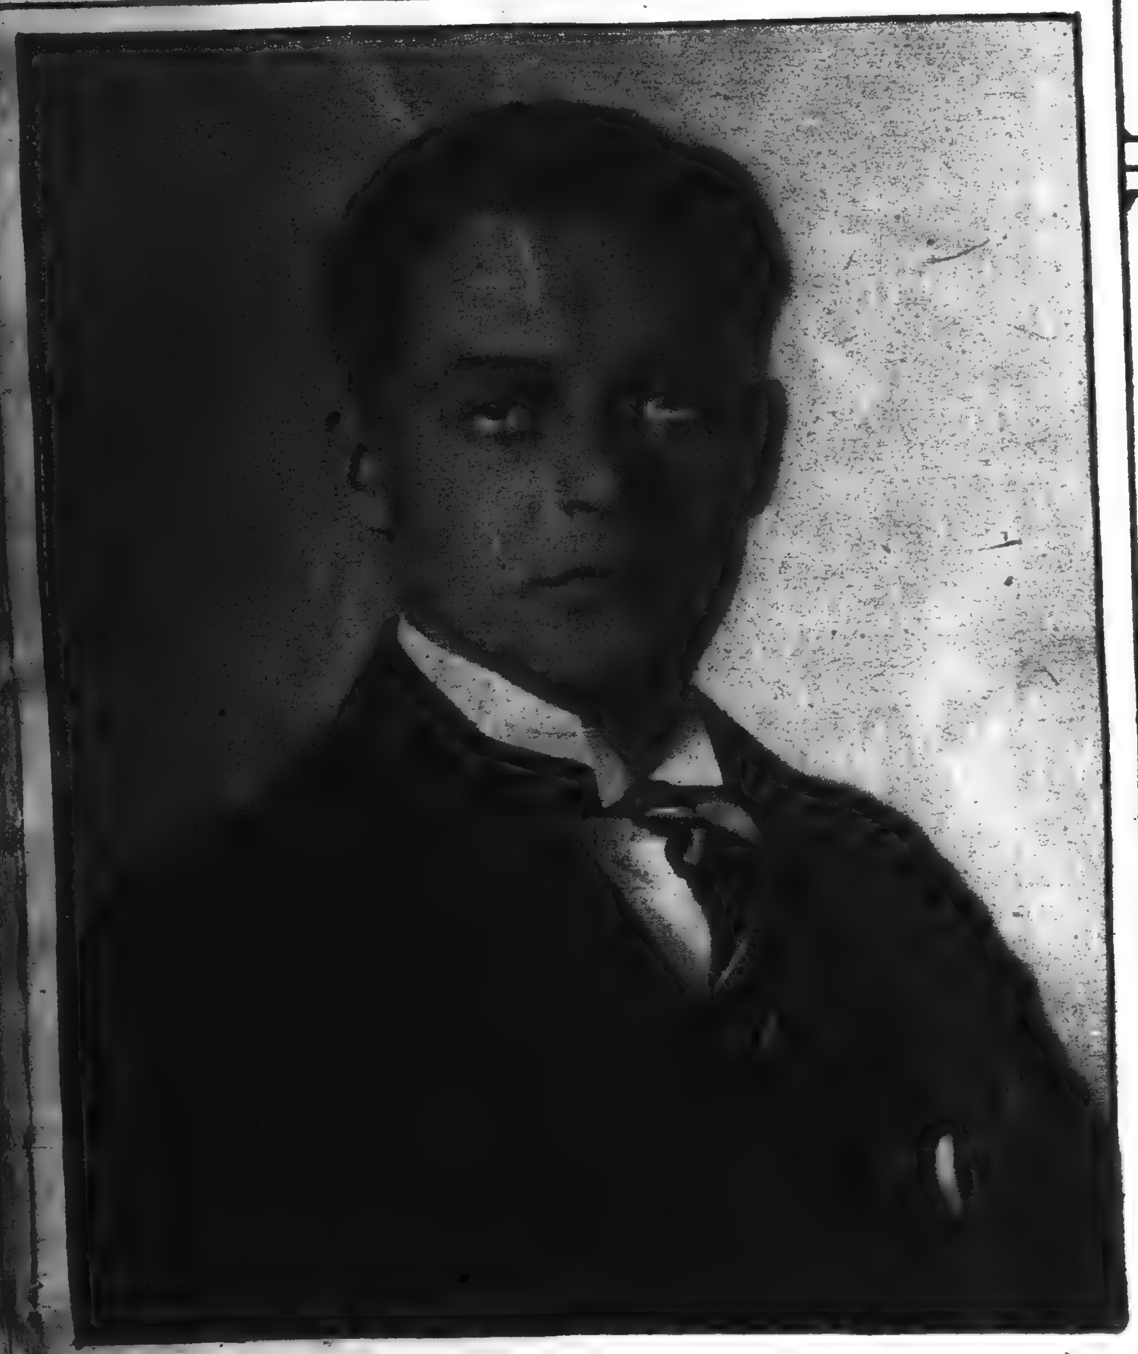
MORIZ ROSENTHAL

His Return to America After an Absence of 17 Years Is Expected to Create Much Interest in Musical Circles.



SIGRID ONEGIN, SWED

She Came to the United States [illegible] New York City, Appearing in [illegible] and with the Metropolitan Opera [illegible] Heard in Two Conce [illegible]



MITJA NIKISCH

In Recent Seasons He Has Been a Most Conspicuous Figure Among Pianists of Central Europe. He Is the Son of the Late Arthur Nikisch, former Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His Appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Mark the Beginning of His First American Tour.

EVA GAUTHIER, MEZZO-SOPRANO

She Is the Daughter of Louis Gauthier, Scientist and Explorer, and Niece of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Former Premier of Canada. She Is a Remarkable Interpreter and Leading Exponent of Modern Songs of Many Nationalities.

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

This Will Be His Third Season as Leader of the Boston Symphony O[illegible]tra [illegible] the Summer in France, England, Italy and Elsewhere, Conferring with Co[illegible] and Examining New Scores.

PABLO CASALS

[illegible] Patrons of the Symphony Concerts Will Remember This Great Spanish Violoncellist Who Appeared Here Several Years Ago.

CARL FLESCH

This Virtuoso Is a Hungarian. He Is Not Entirely a New Comer to America, for He Began a Tour of This Country in the Spring of 1914. The War Compelled Him to Return to Europe.

JACQUES THIBAUD

One of the Greatest Violinists of France. In the Past He Has Appeared Several Times as Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and His Return Will Be Welcomed by Many Boston Music Lovers.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor of Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts [illegible] seasons.

ELIZABETH RETHBERG, SOPRANO

This Will Be Her First Appearance in Boston. She Was Praised Highly in New York and Has Had Many Successful Seasons with the Dresden Opera.

HAROLD BAUER

A Well Known Pianist and a Favorite of Long Standing with the Patrons of Symphony Concerts. He Has Appeared as Soloist at These Concerts on Numerous Occasions, Contributing Much to Their Success.

MORIZ ROSENTHAL

His Return to America After an Absence of 17 Years Is Expected to Create Much Interest in Musical Circles

SIGRID ONEGIN, SWEDISH CO

She Came to the United States Last Se New York City, Appearing in Concerts and with the Metropolitan Opera Compan Heard in Two Concerts in B

MITJA NIKISCH

In Recent Seasons He Has Been a Most Conspicuous Figure Among Pianists of Central Europe. He Is the Son of the Late Arthur Nikisch, former Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His Appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Mark the Beginning of His First American Tour.

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN THE SERIES OF CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL BEGINNING OCTOBER 12

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

This Will Be His Third Season as Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Summer in France, England, Italy and Elsewhere, Conferring with Compose and Examining New Scores.

EVA GAUTHIER, MEZZO-SOPRANO

She Is the Daughter of Louis Gauthier, Scientist and Explorer, and Niece of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Former Premier of Canada. She Is a Remarkable Interpreter and Leading Exponent of Modern Songs of Many Nationalities.

Pablo Casals

PABLO CASALS

ular Patrons of the Symphony Concerts Wi Remember This Great Spanish Violon- elli Who Appeared Here Several Years Ago.

Carl Flesch

CARL FLESCH

This Virtuoso Is a Hungarian. He Is Not Entirely a New Comer to America, for He Began a Tour of This Country in the Spring of 1914. The War Compelled Him to Return to Europe.

JACQUES THIBAUD

One of the Greatest Violinists of France. In the Past He Has Appeared Several Times as Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and His Return Will Be Welcomed by Many Boston Music Lovers.

SIAN TO CONDUCT PHONY ORCHESTRA

[illegible] Will [illegible] ton Next Year

[illegible] Return to Paris at [illegible] This Season

[illegible] orchestra [illegible] only truly [illegible] ductor whom America has not [illegible]

ussevitzky will directly succeed Monteux, whose pending season ductor of the Boston Symphony stra will be his fifth, one of the ger terms in the succession of Bos- Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and en- emble in the Boston Symphony con- certs are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts ough four seasons.

SEPTEMBER 9, 1923

MORIZ ROSENTHAL

erica After an Absence of 17 Years Is Expected to te Much Interest in Musical Circles.

SIGRID ONEGIN, SWEDISH CONTRALTO

She Came to the United States Last Season and Sang in New York City, Appearing in Concerts in Carnegie Hall and with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Also She Was Heard in Two Concerts in Boston.

ISTS
WILL EAR
THE TON
HONY
ESTRA
THE
S OF
ERTS
T HONY
LL
NING
ER 12

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

This Will Be His Third Season as Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He Has Spent the Summer in France, England, Italy and Elsewhere, Conferring with Composers and Publishers, and Examining New Scores.

EVENTFUL SYMPHONY SEASON IS ASSURED

Noted Soloists Announced for Concerts Beginning on Oct. 12

Announcement is now made of particulars of the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including the soloists who will appear. These concerts, which will comprise the bulk of the 43d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin on Oct. 12 and 13, and extend through the following April.

This will be the fifth season in which Mr. Monteux has conducted the orchestra. He is expected to return from Europe late in September to begin rehearsing. His summer has been in part devoted to searching for and inspecting new scores by composers of various nations.

The orchestra will retain the same illustrious personnel as before, with the addition of new horn players, to make a complete double quartet. The leaders of various sections will be as before.

The demand for subscription seats for these concerts is even greater than last year, judging by the renewals. In fact, there will be no public sale of the seats for the Friday afternoon concerts, the increased waiting list of 300 having been more than sufficient to exhaust the few seats given up by former subscribers. A very limited number of seats for the Saturday evening concerts are now placed on public sale.

PIANISTS

Conspicuous among the pianists to appear with the orchestra is Moriz Rosenthal, the great European apostle of the romantic tradition of Liszt. This foremost living pupil of Liszt and Joseffy has long been eminently esteemed in Europe. His absence for 17 years from America will lend additional importance to his coming. A newcomer to this country will be Mitja Nikisch, the talented son of Arthur Nikisch, formerly the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This young man has made his mark on the European continent and in England as an artist of the first degree. It is particularly fitting that he should appear with this orchestra, once led brilliantly by his father. The other two pianists will be Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, both of whom are remembered from noteworthy previous appearances.

SINGERS

Prominent among the singers are two artists who came from Europe last autumn to join the Metropolitan Opera Company, Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg. The former, a Swedish contralto, is now regarded in New York as second to none in opera or in concert. This verdict was seconded here when she appeared at a pension fund concert here and in a concert of her own. Elisabeth Rethberg had long been leading soprano of the Dresden opera and had been chosen by Strauss and Nikisch for especially difficult interpretation. She has sung leading roles at the Metropolitan with the highest success. This will be her first appearance in Boston. A singer better known in Boston, by a number of recitals, is Eva Gauthier, the French Canadian mezzo-soprano, famed as the courageous exponent of modern songs.

Two singers, beter known in Europe than America, are Vera Janacopulos, the Greco-Brazilian soprano, and Marya Freund, the French soprano, the former known for her personal beauty, vocal charm and interpretation, has been giving recitals in France, Belgium and Spain. She has sung a few times in this country, but Marya Freund, a prominent singer in Paris, is to come here for the first time. The only tenor in the list of soloists will be Roland Hayes, the negro singer, who, born in America and trained in Boston, has won the adulation of Europe by the supreme beauty of his voice. He has given innumerable recitals in London, where Ernest Newman proclaimed him the finest tenor of the day. In Paris he has appeared with the Colonne orchestra in recitals, and he has also given recitals in Vienna.

VIOLINISTS, ETC.

The violinists will include Carl Flesch, Hungarian, and Jacques Thibaud, the greatest virtuoso of France. Mr. Flesch began a tour of this country in the spring of 1914 and was forced to return to Europe by the war. He then played here with the orchestra. The remaining soloists will be Pablo Casals, 'cellist, and Lionel Tertis, the English musician who has been likened to Casals as a creative interpreter upon the viola. Mr. Tertis is coming to this country for the first time. He is famous in England and continental Europe, particularly as a soloist with orchestra.

HERALD-SEPT. 9.

BO[illegible]N SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last acepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already reestablished their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussetvitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opera, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became professor of Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N.Y. TIMES-SEPT. 10

PIERRE MONTEUX, French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be succeeded after this season by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian leader, never heard in America.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Monteux to Bring New Scores

Mr Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct 12. His family has left Boston and is at home once more in Paris. Mr Monteux will rejoin his family there at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass. It was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new.

Traveled Throughout Russia

He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled throughout Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

Concerts in Paris and London

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." These he has given for the last three years.

In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris.

His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

GLOBE. SEPT. 10.

RUSSIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky Engaged for Autumn of 1924.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. HERALD-SEPT. 1

NEW LEADER FOR HUB ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux will be succeeded by Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the coming season.

Koussevitzky is the first Russian to be chosen leader of the Hub's famous orchestra. He came to this country in 1916, but on a social visit.
vitzky Concerts.

In Paris he became will-known as founder and leader of the Kousse-

This season he will fill engagements at the Paris Opera and make a long concert tour before coming to Boston.

ADVTSR. SEPT. 10

N.Y. AMERICAN SEPT

[12c]

MORIZ ROSENTHAL

erica After an Absence of 17 Years Is Expected to te Much Interest in Musical Circles.

SIGRID ONEGIN, SWEDISH CONTRALTO

She Came to the United States Last Season and Sang in New York City, Appearing in Concerts in Carnegie Hall and with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Also She Was Heard in Two Concerts in Boston.

ISTS
WILL EAR
THE TON
HONY
ESTRA
HE
S OF
ERTS
T HONY
LL
NING
ER 12

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

This Will Be His Third Season as Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He Has Spent the Summer in France, England, Italy and Elsewhere, Conferring with Composers and Publishers, and Examining New Scores.

EVENTFUL SYMPHONY SEASON IS ASSURED

Noted Soloists Announced for Concerts Beginning on Oct. 12

Announcement is now made of particulars of the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including the soloists who will appear. These concerts, which will comprise the bulk of the 43d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin on Oct. 12 and 13, and extend through the following April.

This will be the fifth season in which Mr. Monteux has conducted the orchestra. He is expected to return from Europe late in September to begin rehearsing. His summer has been in part devoted to searching for and inspecting new scores by composers of various nations.

The orchestra will retain the same illustrious personnel as before, with the addition of new horn players, to make a complete double quartet. The leaders of various sections will be as before.

The demand for subscription seats for these concerts is even greater than last year, judging by the renewals. In fact, there will be no public sale of the seats for the Friday afternoon concerts, the increased waiting list of 300 having been more than sufficient to exhaust the few seats given up by former subscribers. A very limited number of seats for the Saturday evening concerts are now placed on public sale.

PIANISTS

Conspicuous among the pianists to appear with the orchestra is Moriz Rosenthal, the great European apostle of the romantic tradition of Liszt. This foremost living pupil of Liszt and Joseffy has long been eminently esteemed in Europe. His absence for 17 years from America will lend additional importance to his coming. A newcomer to this country will be Mitja Nikisch, the talented son of Arthur Nikisch, formerly the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This young man has made his mark on the European continent and in England as an artist of the first degree. It is particularly fitting that he should appear with this orchestra, once led brilliantly by his father. The other two pianists will be Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, both of whom are remembered from noteworthy previous appearances.

SINGERS

Prominent among the singers are two artists who came from Europe last autumn to join the Metropolitan Opera Company, Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg. The former, a Swedish contralto, is now regarded in New York as second to none in opera or in concert. This verdict was seconded here when she appeared at a pension fund concert here and in a concert of her own. Elisabeth Rethberg had long been leading soprano of the Dresden opera and had been chosen by Strauss and Nikisch for especially difficult interpretation. She has sung leading roles at the Metropolitan with the highest success. This will be her first appearance in Boston. A singer better known in Boston, by a number of recitals, is Eva Gauthier, the French Canadian mezzo-soprano, famed as the courageous exponent of modern songs.

Two singers, beter known in Europe than America, are Vera Janacopulos, the Greco-Brazilian soprano, and Marya Freund, the French soprano, the former known for her personal beauty, vocal charm and interpretation, has been giving recitals in France, Belgium and Spain. She has sung a few times in this country, but Marya Freund, a prominent singer in Paris, is to come here for the first time. The only tenor in the list of soloists will be Roland Hayes, the negro singer, who, born in America and trained in Boston, has won the adulation of Europe by the supreme beauty of his voice. He has given innumerable recitals in London, where Ernest Newman proclaimed him the finest tenor of the day. In Paris he has appeared with the Colonne orchestra in recitals, and he has also given recitals in Vienna.

VIOLINISTS, ETC.

The violinists will include Carl Flesch, Hungarian, and Jacques Thibaud, the greatest virtuoso of France. Mr. Flesch began a tour of this country in the spring of 1914 and was forced to return to Europe by the war. He then played here with the orchestra. The remaining soloists will be Pablo Casals, 'cellist, and Lionel Tertis, the English musician who has been likened to Casals as a creative interpreter upon the viola. Mr. Tertis is coming to this country for the first time. He is famous in England and continental Europe, particularly as a soloist with orchestra.

HERALD-SEPT. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last acepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already reestablished their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussetvitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opera, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became professor of Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N.Y. TIMES. SEPT. 10

PIERRE MONTEUX, French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be succeeded after this season by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian leader, never heard in America.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Monteux to Bring New Scores

Mr Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct 12. His family has left Boston and is at home once more in Paris. Mr Monteux will rejoin his family there at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass. It was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new.

Traveled Throughout Russia

He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled throughout Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

Concerts in Paris and London

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." These he has given for the last three years.

In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris.

His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

GLOBE. SEPT. 10.

NEW LEADER FOR HUB ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux will be succeeded by Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the coming season.

Koussevitzky is the first Russian to be chosen leader of the Hub's famous orchestra. He came to this country in 1916, but on a social visit.

vitzsky Concerts.

In Paris he became will-known as founder and leader of the Kousse-

This season he will fill engagements at the Paris Opera and make a long concert tour before coming to Boston.

ADVTSR. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky Engaged for Autumn of 1924.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. HERALD. SEPT. 10

[12a]

N.Y. AMERICAN SEPT

MORIZ ROSENTHAL

America After an Absence of 17 Years Is Expected to Create Much Interest in Musical Circles.

SIGRID ONEGIN, SWEDISH CONTRALTO

She Came to the United States Last Season and Sang in New York City, Appearing in Concerts in Carnegie Hall and with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Also She Was Heard in Two Concerts in Boston.

LOISTS
WILL PEAR
H THE STON
PHONY
HESTRA
THE ES OF CERTS
AT PHONY
ALL NNING
BER 12

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

This Will Be His Third Season as Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He Has Spent the Summer in France, England, Italy and Elsewhere, Conferring with Composers and Publishers, and Examining New Scores.

EVENTFUL SYMPHONY SEASON IS ASSURED

Noted Soloists Announced for Concerts Beginning on Oct. 12

Announcement is now made of particulars of the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including the soloists who will appear. These concerts, which will comprise the bulk of the 43d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin on Oct. 12 and 13, and extend through the following April.

This will be the fifth season in which Mr. Monteux has conducted the orchestra. He is expected to return from Europe late in September to begin rehearsing. His summer has been in part devoted to searching for and inspecting new scores by composers of various nations.

The orchestra will retain the same illustrious personnel as before, with the addition of new horn players, to make a complete double quartet. The leaders of various sections will be as before.

The demand for subscription seats for these concerts is even greater than last year, judging by the renewals. In fact, there will be no public sale of the seats for the Friday afternoon concerts, the increased waiting list of 300 having been more than sufficient to exhaust the few seats given up by former subscribers. A very limited number of seats for the Saturday evening concerts are now placed on public sale.

PIANISTS

Conspicuous among the pianists to appear with the orchestra is Moriz Rosenthal, the great European apostle of the romantic tradition of Liszt. This foremost living pupil of Liszt and Joseffy has long been eminently esteemed in Europe. His absence for 17 years from America will lend additional importance to his coming. A newcomer to this country will be Mitja Nikisch, the talented son of Arthur Nikisch, formerly the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This young man has made his mark on the European continent and in England as an artist of the first degree. It is particularly fitting that he should appear with this orchestra, once led brilliantly by his father. The other two pianists will be Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, both of whom are remembered from noteworthy previous appearances.

SINGERS

Prominent among the singers are two artists who came from Europe last autumn to join the Metropolitan Opera Company, Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg. The former, a Swedish contralto, is now regarded in New York as second to none in opera or in concert. This verdict was seconded here when she appeared at a pension fund concert here and in a concert of her own. Elisabeth Rethberg had long been leading soprano of the Dresden opera and had been chosen by Strauss and Nikisch for especially difficult interpretation. She has sung leading roles at the Metropolitan with the highest success. This will be her first appearance in Boston. A singer better known in Boston, by a number of recitals, is Eva Gauthier, the French Canadian mezzo-soprano, famed as the courageous exponent of modern songs.

Two singers, beter known in Europe than America, are Vera Janacopulos, the Greco-Brazilian soprano, and Marya Freund, the French soprano, the former known for her personal beauty, vocal charm and interpretation, has been giving recitals in France, Belgium and Spain. She has sung a few times in this country, but Marya Freund, a prominent singer in Paris, is to come here for the first time. The only tencr in the list of soloists will be Roland Hayes, the negro singer, who, born in America and trained in Boston, has won the adulation of Europe by the supreme beauty of his voice. He has given innumerable recitals in London, where Ernest Newman proclaimed him the finest tenor of the day. In Paris he has appeared with the Colonne orchestra in recitals, and he has also given recitals in Vienna.

VIOLINISTS, ETC.

The violinists will include Carl Flesch, Hungarian, and Jacques Thibaud, the greatest virtuoso of France. Mr. Flesch began a tour of this country in the spring of 1914 and was forced to return to Europe by the war. He then played here with the orchestra. The remaining soloists will be Pablo Casals, 'cellist, and Lionel Tertis, the English musician who has been likened to Casals as a creative interpreter upon the viola. Mr. Tertis is coming to this country for the first time. He is famous in England and continental Europe, particularly as a soloist with orchestra.

HERALD-SEPT. 9.

SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last acepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already re-established their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussetvitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opera, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became professor of Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N.Y. TIMES SEPT. 10

PIERRE MONTEUX, French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be succeeded after this season by Serge Koussevitzky, Russian leader, never heard in America.

KOUSSEVITZKY NEW SYMPHONY LEADER

Russian to Conduct Boston Orchestra Beginning with Fall of 1924.

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to-day announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has never been heard in America.

Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be hih fifth. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with new scores from Europe.

Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. At twelve he conducted the orchestra in the municipal theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory and became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a more important one in Moscow. Here he assemlebd the best players Russia afforded, with which he traveled over Russia.

In 1920 he ebcame the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts. In London he was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and take him to England and Scotland.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Monteux to Bring New Scores

Mr Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct 12. His family has left Boston and is at home once more in Paris. Mr Monteux will rejoin his family there at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass. It was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new.

Traveled Throughout Russia

He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled throughout Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

Concerts in Paris and London

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." These he has given for the last three years.

In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris.

His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

GLOBE. SEPT. 10.

NEW LEADER FOR HUB ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux will be succeeded by Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the coming season.

Koussevitzky is the first Russian to be chosen leader of the Hub's famous orchestra. He came to this country in 1916, but on a social visit.

vitzsky Concerts.

In Paris he became will-known as founder and leader of the Kousse-

This season he will fill engagements at the Paris Opera and make a long concert tour before coming to Boston.

ADVTSR. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky Engaged for Autumn of 1924.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. HERALD. SEPT. 10

KOUSSEVITSKY FOR SYMPHONY

Russian to Succeed Pierre Monteux in Fall of 1924

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky of Russia as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924, has been announced by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, who with the completion this winter of his fifth season, will have filled one of the longest terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux has established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the coming season. He has spent the summer in Europe and is expected to return the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. Rehearsals for the season which opens on Oct. 12, will be begun upon his arrival.

FIRST RUSSIAN LEADER

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country, and during the last three years had made a name for himself in western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

Born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874, his early musical education was given him by his parents. At the age of 12 he conducted the orchestra in the Tver municipal theatre. He studied at the Philharmonic Music school in Moscow and was a professor there in 1900.

His particular study was of the double bass. He became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

CONCENTRATED ON CONDUCTING

His magnetic personality and constructive ability led him to concentrate on conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and another in Moscow in 1909. This organization gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and sailed the length of the Volga, giving concerts in the towns on its banks.

In spring festivals which he instituted, each concert was devoted to the works of a single composer, from Bach and Beethoven to the more modern.

In 1910 he founded a Russian musical edition to aid composers. He has written concerts for double bass and smaller pieces.

After the revolution in Russia, he was conductor of the Russian State Orchestra. During the coming season he has engagements in Berlin, Prague, and Paris, and in England and Scotland.

TRAV. SE

RUSSIAN MUSICIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most conspicuous conductors in Europe, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra beginning in the autumn of 1924, it was learned today.

M. Koussevitzky is described as a leader of rare magnetism. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, the present leader, to whom much credit is due for the high quality of music of the orchestra.

TELE. SEPT

[121]

After Monteux, Koussevitzky --- Art

TO BOSTON COMES KOUSSEVITZKY AS NOTED CONDUCTOR

TO SUCCEED MR. MONTEUX A YEAR HENCE

A Career Stretching from Russia Through Western Europe—Classicist and Modernist Both—Open Mind and Vitalizing Spirit—The New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra as Various Hearers Record Him

CONTRARY to much precedent, the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce a succeeding conductor a full year before the succession begins. Mr. Monteux's term as present director will end in May of next year. In the following autumn, Serge Koussevitzky, cosmopolitan Russian, will take over the band. Usually such tidings have been withheld until the spring in which the departing leader takes leave. In this instance "unavoidable circumstances" have altered cases. Engagements into which Mr. Koussevitzky long since entered in Paris will compel the speedy announcement there of his departure a year hence to Boston. Forthwith the news of his accession to the Symphony Orchestra would be broadspread. Wisely the powers of Symphony Hall preferred to do their own heralding in their own way. Hence the publishing in September, 1923, of an event of October, 1924. In their haste some will question the fairness to Mr. Monteux of such long anticipation of his successor. Yet the glamor of departure and the fervor of farewell may warm both him and his audiences. In Boston and in other familiar cities he will amply deserve them.

Whether Mr. Monteux wished another term as conductor at Symphony Hall, none but him may confidently say. As some of his friends began to repeat last winter, he is minded to return to Paris; to live at leisure for a while; ultimately to resume work in Parisian concert-halls or opera houses. As some of his more ardent and exclamatory partisans will aver, he should have been retained under all conditions and costs. Other points of view have prevailed in the councils of the trustees and similar "high quarters." Possibly, they counted five successive years sufficient term, as often in the past, for any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of that time, even under Dr. Muck, came audible decline in the reciprocal energies of conductor and players. Possibly again, it seemed advisable to mate the restored orchestra with the ablest and the most applauded of the middle generation of conductors in Europe.

After the quiet abilities and devotions of Mr. Monteux, wisdom may have pointed the way to a more vivid, vehement and generally more salient figure upon the stages of Symphony and Carnegie Halls. Above all, audiences in the United States court in conductors what they call "personality." Therein Mr. Koussevitzky abounds. It plays over his versions of the classics. It expands warmly upon the "modernists." It is stirred by much music betwixt and between. Furthermore: a certain disposition is discoverable in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and to count it as a dependency, henceforth and forever, of Parisian conductors. The cosmopolitan Monteux, free from every Gallic limitation, did much to dissipate this illusion. With the choice of the Russian, Koussevitzky, the last tatter vanishes. To Paris, as well as to Berlin, it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice.

Hereunder much is printed in description, in praise and in more reserved judgment of Mr. Koussevitzky. With allowance for every doubt and distaste, there is no questioning his high fitness for the new post. His reputation as a conductor of the first rank now runs the length and breadth of Europe. To general and particular plaudits he has exercised his powers upon many orchestras before many audiences. The more conservative and the more radical musicians and amateurs have joined hands and voices to extol him. Quickly he sways and moulds players. As swiftly hearers react to him. Beyond peradventure, he is vivid and vitalizing upon all things and all men that he touches. It is possible to question this or that intensity, but never the sincere energies that have heated and winged it. Beyond aught else, by every sign of his past, he will accept, continue and maintain the standards that Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux set for the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has ear and force. He knows both strength and sensibility. He is as eager for the newest and boldest modern piece as for the oldest and most venerated classic. He knows variety. He is aware of balance. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra enjoys a nearly perfect freedom. As free is Mr. Koussevitzky's musical mind. As freely will run the scope of his concerts. To a "modernist" in the best sense of the word succeeds another "modernist." There is no step backward.

H. T. P.

In Paris

In the desert of routine concerts in Paris [wrote Mr. Vergil Thomson to the Transcript] there sprang up in the winter of 1921-22 a tree bearing fruit—six "orchestral evenings" at the Opéra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Koussevitzky, known on the continent for many years as a virtuoso of the double-bass, founded in 1910 the Concerts Koussevitzky at Moscow and Petrograd, which brought him immediate recognition for able performances and catholic taste. In the spring of 1921 he gave a series in London and Paris, and the Concerts Koussevitzky are presumably a semi-annual event now in continental music, unless some enterprising American should induce the conductor to come over into Macedonia and let us help him make his fortune.

The orchestra was composed of musicians selected from the established orchestras of Paris, individually excellent players. Without unlimited rehearsals no orchestra can play unanimously. However, Koussevitzky in a few weeks' time prepared six programmes containing not a little novel music, and gave them a performance unequalled anywhere in Paris, for balance, precision and commanding force. When the soft chords of flutes and clarinets which introduce Weber's overture to "Oberon" opened the first concert, we knew that the evening was to contain not merely playing, but music. The threadbare old piece was something we had not heard before. The subtle arrangement of the woodwind chords, the mysterious horn notes, were Debussyan. We were in the shining dark greens of a German forest. When the strings played alone the balance was so perfect that each line disengaged itself and became audible by a difference in quality as slight as that between a violin and a viola. And the great swinging movement toward the close showed itself as something quite different from the finale of operetta it sometimes resembles. With a longer rhythmic sewep, it was dignified and noble, almost grand.

Down the Line

One would like to dwell on the vitality of the old pieces as Koussevitzky played them—pieces, many of them that we have grown to loathe, as children loathe the Bible through much clerical mouthing of it, and some of them pieces so lacking in romantic sensationalism that few conductors dare to play them at all nowadays. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G for string orchestra, as played by Koussevitzky, was so clear in outline and so lively in rhythm that the orchestral embellishments of modern music seemed effeminate and silly. The Symphony in E minor of Karl Philip Emmanuel Bach was even more moving, particularly the second movement with long lines of melancholy, a restrained and tender sadness. Haydn's Symphony in G was as honest and jovial as the composer himself and as fresh as a blooming cheek. Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" seemed more symphonic in sweep than many of his Symphonies, and the great Fifth became a sheer contrast in forces—the repeated chords at the end falling like blows from a pugilistic Prometheus, who cries to Fate, "Take that! and that! And that!!"

Wagner, too, came in for a resurrection at Koussevitzky's hands. Before the Prelude to "Parsifal" and the Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," to mention only two pieces, the sheer simplicity of the music and the grandeur of the effect made any quarreling about theories ridiculous. Modern French classics, like Debussy's "Nocturnes" and Ravell's songs of "Shéhérazade" received an equally clairvoyant reading. Everywhere, by expressing music in terms of rhythmic periods rather than of measures, the conductor reanimated and newly characterized the music. Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence," Honegger's "Horatius Tiumphant" (both remembered in Boston) and a tone-poem, "The Dream," by Florent Schmitt, were Koussevitzky's conspicuous numbers from the modernists.

Koussevitzky devoted one whole evening to Russian music, most of it unheard before, including the Prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantchina," and his "Defeat of Sennacherib," a piece with chorus, neither of them too thrilling; a war mass by Kastalsky called "Commémoration Fraternelle," effective choral writing in modal harmony but rather sugary like most Russian church music; several bits of fascinating orchestral virtuosity by Rimsky-Korsakov from his opera, "The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitiej and the Virgin Fevronia"; the infernally clever "Flight of the Drone Bee"; and some delicate arrangements of Russian folk-tunes under the title of "Doubinouchka." Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" was superbly played and delighted the high-brows. And a piece in four movements, about death, by Prokofiev, written at the age of twenty-three, surprised by the subtlety and daring of the color and by the sheer ecstasy of the final passage, in which three trumpets, very high, flash and conflict until the ear can scarcely bear it, as if blinding sunlight were become audible.

Brahms's "Song of Destiny," heard for the first time in Paris from Koussevitzky, fell flat. It was badly sung. The Concerts Koussevitzky closed with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Andante was taken slowly enough and the double basses in the Finale were as soft as a whisper. Even the sopranos of the chorus seemed to sustain their dangerous altitude without great difficulty. But criticism, either detailed or general, is of no avail before such music. As one musician said: "I never have an opinion about the Ninth Symphony, because I always forget myself before the introduction is over."

Taking His Own Way

Another American, Mr. Lawrence Gilman, the quick-eared and broad-minded reviewer of music and musicians for The New York Tribune, heard Mr. Koussevitzky in Paris as recently as last spring. He then wrote to that newspaper:

> The contrast [to the dull routine of mediocrity in the symphony concerts of Paris] was Mr. Koussevitzky, leading an orchestra assembled for his own concerts from various established bands. The Russian is incapable of dulness; nor has he the depressing habit of being invariably right. He is a man of impassioned convictions, erratic and capricious, and sometimes he is gloriously wrong. We heard his performance of the "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, during which Schubert, like General Sheridan on a certain occasion, was at least twenty miles away. Mr. Koussevitzky conceived this tender and wistful music, with its subdued undertone of tragic brooding, as the product of a Viennese Chaikovsky, full of violent dynamic contrasts, vehement, highly colored, unrestrained. It was exhilarating to hear; and a good case might be made out for the contention that Schubert, with his keen sense of the dramatic, would have liked it—after he got used to it. But it is not easy to believe that he intended it to sound that way. Undoubtedly, though, it sounds that way to Mr. Koussevitzky, whose artistic sincerity is unimpeachable. This brilliant Russian is a conductor of singular magnetism. Some of his confrères dismiss him as an amateur. But to anyone who has watched him at close range as he conducts through a score like Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol" (which now, in its third incarnation, exists as a concert-piece that aspersion will seem merely stupid. His judgment is sometimes questionable, but he is a technican of skill and resource, and in such music as Musorgsky's, Stravinsky's, or Honegger's, he is exceedingly persuasive.

To a Parisian

Again, in Le Figaro, Monsieur Brussel, its reviewer of concerts sang the praises a few months ago of Koussevitzky as orchestral conductor: "He is virtuoso in all that he undertakes. He courts overmuch strokes that surprise his hearers; yet at every turn he vitalizes the music in hand. He may transport or he may vex; but not for a moment does he leave the listener indifferent or bored. His every power, from temperamental energy downward, he lavishes upon the music of the moment, whatever if may be, from wherever it may come—if only there be life in it. Usually he chooses wisely, but if his choice is mistaken he cloaks his misjudgments with his skill. He may be over-elaborate or over-ornate; his eagerness for 'new finds' may lead him astray; but he moves forward so quickly to the next thing that the hearer forgets these accidents. Equally he cultivates all music from the oldest to the newest. His programmes do not seem heavy, yet invariably they are substantial. . . ." The footnote to these sayings of Monsieur Brussel may be the programme of Mr. Koussevitzky's final spring concert in Paris, viz.: Mozart's "Little Night Music"; Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont"; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin; Stravinsky's "Rite of the Spring" as tone-poem.

Praise—and Doubt

When Mr. Koussevitzky has visited England, his hearers in London and in Manchester have been similarly impressed. No longer ago than last March the discerning and discreet Mr. Langford wrote of him in The Manchester Guardian:

> When we are asked to regard Mr. Koussevitzky as the greatest of continental conductors, we may at least in that regard speak freely of him. If we are to judge by his actions and directions as a conductor, his demands are that almost all music should be made intense, vivid and vibrant. It might be said of the late Mr. Nikisch that almost all music in his hands had intensity. Mr. Koussevitzky appears to carry this intensity a stage further and insist that it shall be of the vibrant kind. In such music as the "Francesca da Rimini" of Chaikovsky we feel this vibrancy to be essentially right. . . . That Mr. Koussevitzky did stimulate the player to a mood of intensity and virtuosity in the concert generally is beyond question. He himself, we think, was enraptured with the results in the little scherzo movement from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan"—a movement which represents "the flight of a bumble bee." In England we have learned that the smile never dies wholly from the heart of Hans Sachs, but Mr. Koussevitzky, in the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers," intensifies the music to the point of pure solemnity. A little slowness crept in and infected, too, the solemn opening of the Overture to "Tannhäuser," which took on an absolute success only with the Venusberg section. A lovely close was that of the prelude from the opera, "Khovantchina," by Musorgsky, where Mr. Koussevitzky procured from the horns and wood-wind instruments, as also in the opening of the "Oberon" Overture, a softness of half-tones to which we are unaccustomed. These were much admired by the general public, but for our own part we questioned their validity in Weber's overture, as the contrasts became, as we thought, unnatural.

Vigor and Vehemence

A few days earlier, watching Mr. Koussevitzky as visiting conductor to the London Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wortham of The Morning Post sketched him vividly, as a year hence Bostonian audiences will see and hear him. "Queen's Hall at eight o'clock," the reviewer begins. "For once in a way the stalls and grand circle are the best filled parts of the house. The tightly wedged ring of humanity in the upper circle which usually marks a 'gala night' is absent. The many are not interested in conductors. A pianist is their god. All sorts of distinguished persons below make up for this apathy. Three, four noted conductors, many composers, and virtuosi season an audience that has a strong Russian tinge.

"The orchestra are in their seats. A minute elapses, in which latecomers wrestle with refractory coats and tread on your toes without so much as a word of apology. Then you are aware that a man of middle height and age, with a deliberate and slightly stooping walk, is making his way past the desks of the first violins to the conductor's platform. He mounts it leisurely, and acknowledges with grave bows the plaudits of audience and orchestra. You notice the strongly marked features, the straight hair of the Slav, now turning slightly gray, the well-knit but unathletic figure. A sedate and reserved man, you would say, with nothing in his dress or appearance, except, perhaps, the expression about the eyes, which business men do not have, to show the artist and the musician.

"The clapping ceases. He looks round the orchestra, then slowly lifts up his stick, lightly poised between his forefinger and thumb. Some conductors, like speakers who clear their throats to give themselves courage, rap the desk. Koussevitzky seems to think this too much trouble. At this moment of silence, when he is ready to loose more thunders than Jove ever had in his armory, he stands without any attitude to indicate the fires that are ready to burst forth. Mr. Coates on such occasions is Michael-Angelesque. Not so Koussevitzky; he is quiet and subdued, giving the impression of a musical Bonar Law, occupying a position of responsibility against his own predilection. You know he is a Russian, and therefore has imponderable qualities. But a Russian in a white tie and a tailcoat is much like anybody else—a mere man with a tailor.

"Then suddenly the transformation comes, as he plunges into the seething unrest of Chaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' The real Koussevitzky has emerged from its corporeal case, and become an elemental force inspiring the will of every one of the hundred or so musicians who are known collectively as the London Symphony Orchestra Or rather he stands there, the incarnation of forceful energy, urging, driving, encouraging, and arguing with every muscle of his body and every line of his face. His gestures are extraordinary. At one moment he will lift his upturned palms in a pose that is Hellenic in everything except its passion; at another with a sweeping motion of the shoulders he will raise his arms high above his head for some great climax. Not that he is all Sturm und Drang. But even when flute and clarinet are engaged in some tranquil conversation, and the rest of the orchestra is acting up to the precept that 'seul

Russian Savior

(Photograph by Manuel)

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra From the Autumn of 1924 Onward [illegible] concentrated strength of will which has raised Koussevitzky to eminence amongst conductors is always there

"Thus it was that he breathed a new note of tragedy into the wild passages of the strings, and made rather a second-rate music pulsate with a new passion, until at the end he had widened the sum of our experience and made even those who do not read Dante, or sympathize, as a rule, with Chaikovsky, realize more clearly the grandeur of human despair. Before the audience had had time to free itself from the grip of this tour-de-force, but not before Koussevitzky had relapsed into a bland passivity, and was mopping his brow to reassure us of his common humanity. A lady behind me, with a touch that Mr Shaw would have envied, remarked sweetly to her companion 'What an amazing contortionist!'"

TRANS. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Announce the Engagement of Serge Koussevitzky for 1924.

CONDUCTOR NOW IN FRANCE

Previous to War Was a Great Patron of Composers in Native Country.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons bee nactive in Western Surope. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Will Return From France.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as virtnoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded: he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer.

Encouraged Composers.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies; he wa sappointed for a sonciderable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and then take him to England and Scotland.

What shall be done with that irreverent conductor on Hun [illegible] avenue cars who announces our temple of music as "Some-funny hall"?

TRAVELER - SEPT. 20

NY. TELE. SEPT. 10

KOUSSEVITZKY FOR SYMPHONY

Russian Conductor Will Succeed Pierre Monteux with Orchestra

WILL TAKE CHARGE IN FALL OF 1924

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky of Russia as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924, has been announced by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, who with the completion this winter of his fifth season, will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux has established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the coming season. He has spent the summer in Europe and is expected to return the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. Rehearsals for the season which opens on Oct. 12, will be begun upon his arrival.

FIRST RUSSIAN LEADER

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country, and during the last three years had made a name for himself in western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

Born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874, his early musical education was given him by his parents. At the age of 12 he conducted the orchestra in the Tver municipal theatre. He studied at the Philharmonic Music school in Moscow and was a professor there in 1900.

His particular study was of the double bass. He became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

CONCENTRATED ON CONDUCTING

His magnetic personality and constructive ability led him to concentrate on conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and another in Moscow in 1909. This organization gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and sailed the length of the Volga, giving concerts in the towns on its banks.

In spring festivals which he instituted, each concert was devoted to the works of a single composer, from Bach and Beethoven to the more modern.

In 1910 he founded a Russian musical edition to aid composers. He has written concerts for double bass and smaller pieces.

After the revolution in, Russia, he was conductor of the Russian State Orchestra. During the coming season he has engagements in Berlin, Prague, and Paris, and in England and Scotland.

HERALD' SEPT.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Monteux to Bring New Scores

Mr Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct 12. His family has left Boston and is at home once more in Paris. Mr Monteux will rejoin his family there at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass. It was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new.

Traveled Throughout Russia

He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled throughout Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern. and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

Concerts in Paris and London

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." These he has given for the last three years.

In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris.

His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

GLOBE. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN TO DIRECT THE SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Engaged —Succeeds Monteux in 1924

OPERA CONDUCTOR

Won Renown in Europe as Director of Moscow Band

Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated leader of the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, who stirred the capitals of Europe with his music following the Russian revolution, will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, last night announced the engagement of the famed Russian orchestra leader, whose engagements for the coming season will take him to Berlin, Prague, Paris, London and other European musical centres before he makes his first American appearance in this city.

Mr. Monteaux is expected to return from France within a few weeks to immediately begin rehearsals for the season's opening at Symphony Hall Columbus Day. His family has left this city and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

A Double Bass Virtuoso

The newly engaged leader of the Symphony orchestra has had a colorful career. Born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874, he was given his first music lessons by his parents and at the age of 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his birthplace.

Having made a particular study of the double bass, Mr. Koussevitzky was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory to become a virtuoso of this instrument in the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra. He toured the concert stages of Europe and organized an orchestra in Berlin.

Later, in 1909, he assembled the best players in Russia, and subsidized them so that he might have freedom in his great experiment as a conductor. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and then to promulgate the best music, old and new, among rich and poor, he chartered a special steamer and sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial orchestra of the old regime.

In 1920 he became a leading figure in Paris and London orchestral concerts. In the French capital he established three years ago what came to be popularly known as the Koussevitzky concerts. Occasionally he has conducted opera in Paris with such success that he has been engaged to officiate there for the coming season. After which he will go to England and Scotland previous to his arrival here next year.

POST. SEPT. 10.

THE FIRST RUSSIAN

From Russia—from the new Russia, it is to be observed—is coming next year the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to hail from that land of fire and flame in the musical art.

It may be thought curious that we have had no Russian director of the great band before. Russian composers' names have abounded on our programmes: Borodin, Tschaikowsky, Mussorgsky, Rachmaninoff and others, but the conductors of their music have been German, Austrian, Hungarian and French. For years it was a sort of gospel to believe that none but a German was capable of leading the orchestra in right and proper ways. The several seasons past have shattered that fiction. The brilliant and temperamental Nikisch, a Magyar, was the nearest approach in race to the Slav, Serge Koussevitzky, who is to take up the Symphony baton when the competent hand of Pierre Monteux has laid it down.

Koussevitzky has won a great reputation abroad as a conductor of genius and solid attainments. His coming to Boston will be a notable event in our musical annals.

POST - SEPT. 11.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

So Mr. Kussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1924-25. Many will be interested in the exact pronunciation of his name.

When Arthur Nikisch appeared at the first rehearsal of his first season he expressed his delight at the technical proficiency and euphony of the orchestra. "Why, all I'll have to do will be to poetize," he exclaimed. Mr. Kussevitsky will be equally, if not more, fortunate, for he will have for his instrument the superb orchestra that is wholly the work of Mr. Pierre Monteux.

[illegible] vic. He is said to be rather sensational in the concert hall, a man of now imposing, now wild gestures. If this is so, he will surely please all those who attend concerts to see a conductor and incidentally to hear his interpretations. His programs in London and Paris have been of a catholic and interesting nature. As was to be expected, he favors Stravinsky and other ultra-modern composers, but not exclusively.

The list of soloists is a strong one. Moriz Rosenthal will return, the witty Moriz, bringing no doubt his dazzling technic with him. Some of his witticisms have passed into history. When a Vienna pianist returned from a concert tour, he told a group in a cafe how he had triumphed gloriously. "How much do you think I made on the trip, Rosenthal? To which Moriz answered: "Half."

We remember Rosenthal and the late Henry Wolfsohn, his manager, talking together in Symphony hall after a recital. The audience was a comparatively small one.

"I suppose, Moriz, you were counting the house during that slow movement of Chopin's Sonata."

"No, I did that in the grim, frolic scherzo."

Mr. Rosenthal is a man of wide reading and original views. When he was last in Boston he complained of the translations of Nietsche as inadequate.

The name of Vladimir de Pachmann is not on the list. He is not to be trusted in a Symphony concert. To him it would be a recital with the assistance of the orchestra.

Mr. Leon Henry Zach, the son of the late Max Zach, writes: "Was my father's unfortunate tiff with De Pachmann at a St. Louis Symphony concert of more than local interest? After 'rendering' his solo and his one permitted encore with his more or less customary concomitant comments to the audience during the playing, De Pachmann was quite unsatisfied. He kept returning to bow and to amuse the audience, doubtless in the hope that he might be given opportunity, not to say permission, to give one more exhibition of his admitted talent. Father finally gave the signal for the orchestra to leave the stage, and the last number of the program was not played. He was, of course, backed up by the Symphony society. I've forgotten whether this happened at a Friday afternoon concert, and if it did, I have forgotten what happened Saturday night. At any rate, I believe De Pachmann has not played with the St. Louis orchestra since."

We remember De Pachmann playing additional pieces after a concerto at a Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the old Music Hall. Arthur Nikisch was then conducting, if we are not mistaken. The breaking of the rule was not wholly De Pachmann's fault. The audience was wildly enthusiastic. It called him out again and again. Nor was it satisfied with one "encore."

We also remember when Chickering hall on Tremont street was crowded at his recitals. Two staid Boston ladies were anxious to meet him. They were taken to the "artist's room." There stood the pianist, mopping his neck and brow with a handkerchief. The ladies expressed their rapture. When they paused, De Pachmann said: "Yes. It's terribly hot. My shirt is all wet."

This singular man and most accomplished pianist—one of the few to whom we listened gladly—carried in his pocket a box of precious stones. He said they suggested colors to him while he was playing Chopin's music. He was interested in philosophy and liked to discuss the theories of various metaphysicians. His wife, a pianiste, who once played in Boston, was formerly his pupil. An attractive woman, she left him, obtained a divorce and married M. Labori, the distinguished French lawyer, who was conspicuous as the defender of Dreyfus. The three were good friends until the death of Labori. When he and Madame Labori were in this country some years ago they asked many questions about De Pachmann's reputation in the United States. M. Labori said that he had only recently heard him play—it was in London—and that to him he was the most pleasing of pianists. De Pachmann's two sons were cared for by the Laboris, and the father was in the habit of sending them large sums of money. One became a lawyer of no mean repute.

Marya Freund, the singer, unknown here, is recommended by M. Monteux. Vera Janacopulos has been applauded of late years in Paris. We have a vague recollection of her singing here. Was it at one of Mrs. Hall McAllister's morning concerts? She is said to be very beautiful, and that is half the battle. Carl Flesch has fiddled at a Symphony concert. A serious fiddler, delighting in the long-winded concertos of Beethoven and Brahms. He is a great

HERALD - SEPT. 11

[122]

...concentrated strength of will which has raised Koussevitzy to eminence amongst conductors is always there

"Thus it was that he breathed a new note of tragedy into the wild passages of the strings, and made rather a second-rate music pulsate with a new passion, until at the end he had widened the sum of our experience and made even those who do not read Dante, or sympathize, as a rule, with Chaikovsky, realize more clearly the grandeur of human despair Before the audience had had time to free itself from the grip of this tour-de-force, but not before Koussevitzky had relapsed into a bland passivity, and was mopping his brow to reassure us of his common humanity. A lady behind me, with a touch that Mr Shaw would have envied, remarked sweetly to her companion 'What an amazing contortionist!'"

TRANS. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Trustees Announce the Engagement of Serge Koussevitzky for 1924.

CONDUCTOR NOW IN FRANCE

Previous to War Was a Great Patron of Composers in Native Country.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons bee nactive in Western Surope. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Will Return From France.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe. At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded: he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic. It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer.

Encouraged Composers.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies; he wa sappointed for a sonciderable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony...

What shall be done with that irreverent conductor on Huntington avenue cars who announces our temple of music as "Some-funny hall"?

TRAVELER - SEPT. 20

---

phony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and then take him to England and Scotland.

NY. TELE. SEPT. 1

KOUSSEVITZKY FOR SYMPHONY

Russian Conductor Will Succeed Pierre Monteux with Orchestra

WILL TAKE CHARGE IN FALL OF 1924

The engagement of Serge Koussevitzky of Russia as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924, has been announced by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, who with the completion this winter of his fifth season, will have filled one of the longer terms in the succession of conductors of the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux has established his family in Paris where he will join them at the end of the coming season. He has spent the summer in Europe and is expected to return the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. Rehearsals for the season which opens on Oct. 12, will be begun upon his arrival.

FIRST RUSSIAN LEADER

Mr. Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been an outstanding figure in his native country, and during the last three years had made a name for himself in western Europe. He has never been seen nor heard in America.

Born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874, his early musical education was given him by his parents. At the age of 12 he conducted the orchestra in the Tver municipal theatre. He studied at the Philharmonic Music school in Moscow and was a professor there in 1900.

His particular study was of the double bass. He became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

CONCENTRATED ON CONDUCTING

His magnetic personality and constructive ability led him to concentrate on conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and another in Moscow in 1909. This organization gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and sailed the length of the Volga, giving concerts in the towns on its banks.

In spring festivals which he instituted, each concert was devoted to the works of a single composer, from Bach and Beethoven to the more modern.

In 1910 he founded a Russian musical edition to aid composers. He has written concerts for double bass and smaller pieces.

After the revolution in, Russia, he was conductor of the Russian State Orchestra. During the coming season he has engagements in Berlin, Prague, and Paris, and in England and Scotland.

HERALD. SEPT.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky Will Come to Boston Next Year

Monteux to Return to Paris at End of This Season

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the Autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

---

Mr Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr Monteux' abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Monteux to Bring New Scores

Mr Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the Summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct 12. His family has left Boston and is at home once more in Paris. Mr Monteux will rejoin his family there at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in Northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass. It was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra, and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin and, in 1909, a far more important one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr Koussevitzky first extensively revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new.

Traveled Throughout Russia

He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled throughout Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

Each Spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern, and in one series included the complete orchestral works of Beethoven. Koussevitzky here first acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

Concerts in Paris and London

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts." These he has given for the last three years.

In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris.

His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

GLOBE. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN TO DIRECT THE SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Engaged —Succeeds Monteux in 1924

OPERA CONDUCTOR

Won Renown in Europe as Director of Moscow Band

Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated leader of the Moscow Imperial Orchestra, who stirred the capitals of Europe with his music following the Russian revolution, will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, last night announced the engagement of the famed Russian orchestra leader, whose engagements for the coming season will take him to Berlin, Prague, Paris, London and other European musical centres before he makes his first American appearance in this city.

Mr. Monteaux is expected to return from France within a few weeks to immediately begin rehearsals for the season's opening at Symphony Hall Columbus Day. His family has left this city and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

A Double Bass Virtuoso

The newly engaged leader of the Symphony orchestra has had a colorful career. Born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874, he was given his first music lessons by his parents and at the age of 12 conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theatre of his birthplace.

Having made a particular study of the double bass, Mr. Koussevitzky was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory to become a virtuoso of this instrument in the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra. He toured the concert stages of Europe and organized an orchestra in Berlin.

Later, in 1909, he assembled the best players in Russia, and subsidized them so that he might have freedom in his great experiment as a conductor. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and then to promulgate the best music, old and new, among rich and poor, he chartered a special steamer and sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra, but he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial orchestra of the old regime.

In 1920 he became a leading figure in Paris and London orchestral concerts. In the French capital he established three years ago what came to be popularly known as the Koussevitzky concerts. Occasionally he has conducted opera in Paris with such success that he has been engaged to officiate there for the coming season. After which he will go to England and Scotland previous to his arrival here next year.

POST. SEPT. 10.

THE FIRST RUSSIAN

From Russia—from the new Russia, it is to be observed—is coming next year the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to hail from that land of fire and flame in the musical art.

It may be thought curious that we have had no Russian director of the great band before. Russian composers' names have abounded on our programmes: Borodin, Tschaikowsky, Mussorgsky, Rachmaninoff and others, but the conductors of their music have been German, Austrian, Hungarian and French. For years it was a sort of gospel to believe that none but a German was capable of leading the orchestra in right and proper ways. The several seasons past have shattered that fiction. The brilliant and temperamental Nikisch, a Magyar, was the nearest approach in race to the Slav, Serge Koussevitzky, who is to take up the Symphony baton when the competent hand of Pierre Monteux has laid it down.

Koussevitzky has won a great reputation abroad as a conductor of genius and solid attainments. His coming to Boston will be a notable event in our musical annals.

POST-SEPT. 11.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

So Mr. Kussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1924-25. Many will be interested in the exact pronunciation of his name.

When Arthur Nikisch appeared at the first rehearsal of his first season he expressed his delight at the technical proficiency and euphony of the orchestra. "Why, all I'll have to do will be to poetize," he exclaimed. Mr. Kussevitsky will be equally, if not more, fortunate, for he will have for his instrument the superb orchestra that is wholly the work of Mr. Pierre Monteux.

---

whether Mr. Kussevitzky is a ...vik. He is said to be rather sensational in the concert hall, a man of now imposing, now wild gestures. If this is so, he will surely please all those who attend concerts to see a conductor and incidentally to hear his interpretations. His programs in London and Paris have been of a catholic and interesting nature. As was to be expected, he favors Stravinsky and other ultra-modern composers, but not exclusively.

The list of soloists is a strong one. Moriz Rosenthal will return, the witty Moriz, bringing no doubt his dazzling technic with him. Some of his witticisms have passed into history. When a Vienna pianist returned from a concert tour, he told a group in a cafe how he had triumphed gloriously. "How much do you think I made on the trip, Rosenthal? To which Moriz answered: "Half."

We remember Rosenthal and the late Henry Wolfsohn, his manager, talking together in Symphony hall after a recital. The audience was a comparatively small one.

"I suppose, Moriz, you were counting the house during that slow movement of Chopin's Sonata."

"No, I did that in the grim, ironic scherzo."

Mr. Rosenthal is a man of wide reading and original views. When he was last in Boston he complained of the translations of Nietsche as inadequate.

The name of Vladimir de Pachmann is not on the list. He is not to be trusted in a Symphony concert. To him it would be a recital with the assistance of the orchestra.

Mr. Leon Henry Zach, the son of the late Max Zach, writes: "Was my father's unfortunate tiff with De Pachmann at a St. Louis Symphony concert of more than local interest? After 'rendering' his solo and his one permitted encore with his more or less customary concomitant comments to the audience during the playing, De Pachmann was quite unsatisfied. He kept returning to bow and to amuse the audience, doubtless in the hope that he might be given opportunity, not to say permission, to give one more exhibition of his admitted talent. Father finally gave the signal for the orchestra to leave the stage, and the last number of the program was not played. He was, of course, backed up by the Symphony society. I've forgotten whether this happened at a Friday afternoon concert, and if it did, I have forgotten what happened Saturday night. At any rate, I believe De Pachmann has not played with the St. Louis orchestra since."

We remember De Pachmann playing additional pieces after a concerto at a Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the old Music Hall. Arthur Nikisch was then conducting, if we are not mistaken. The breaking of the rule was not wholly De Pachmann's fault. The audience was wildly enthusiastic. It called him out again and again. Nor was it satisfied with one "encore."

We also remember when Chickering hall on Tremont street was crowded at his recitals. Two staid Boston ladies were anxious to meet him. They were taken to the "artist's room." There stood the pianist, mopping his neck and brow with a handkerchief. The ladies expressed their rapture. When they paused, De Pachmann said: "Yes. It's terribly hot. My shirt is all wet."

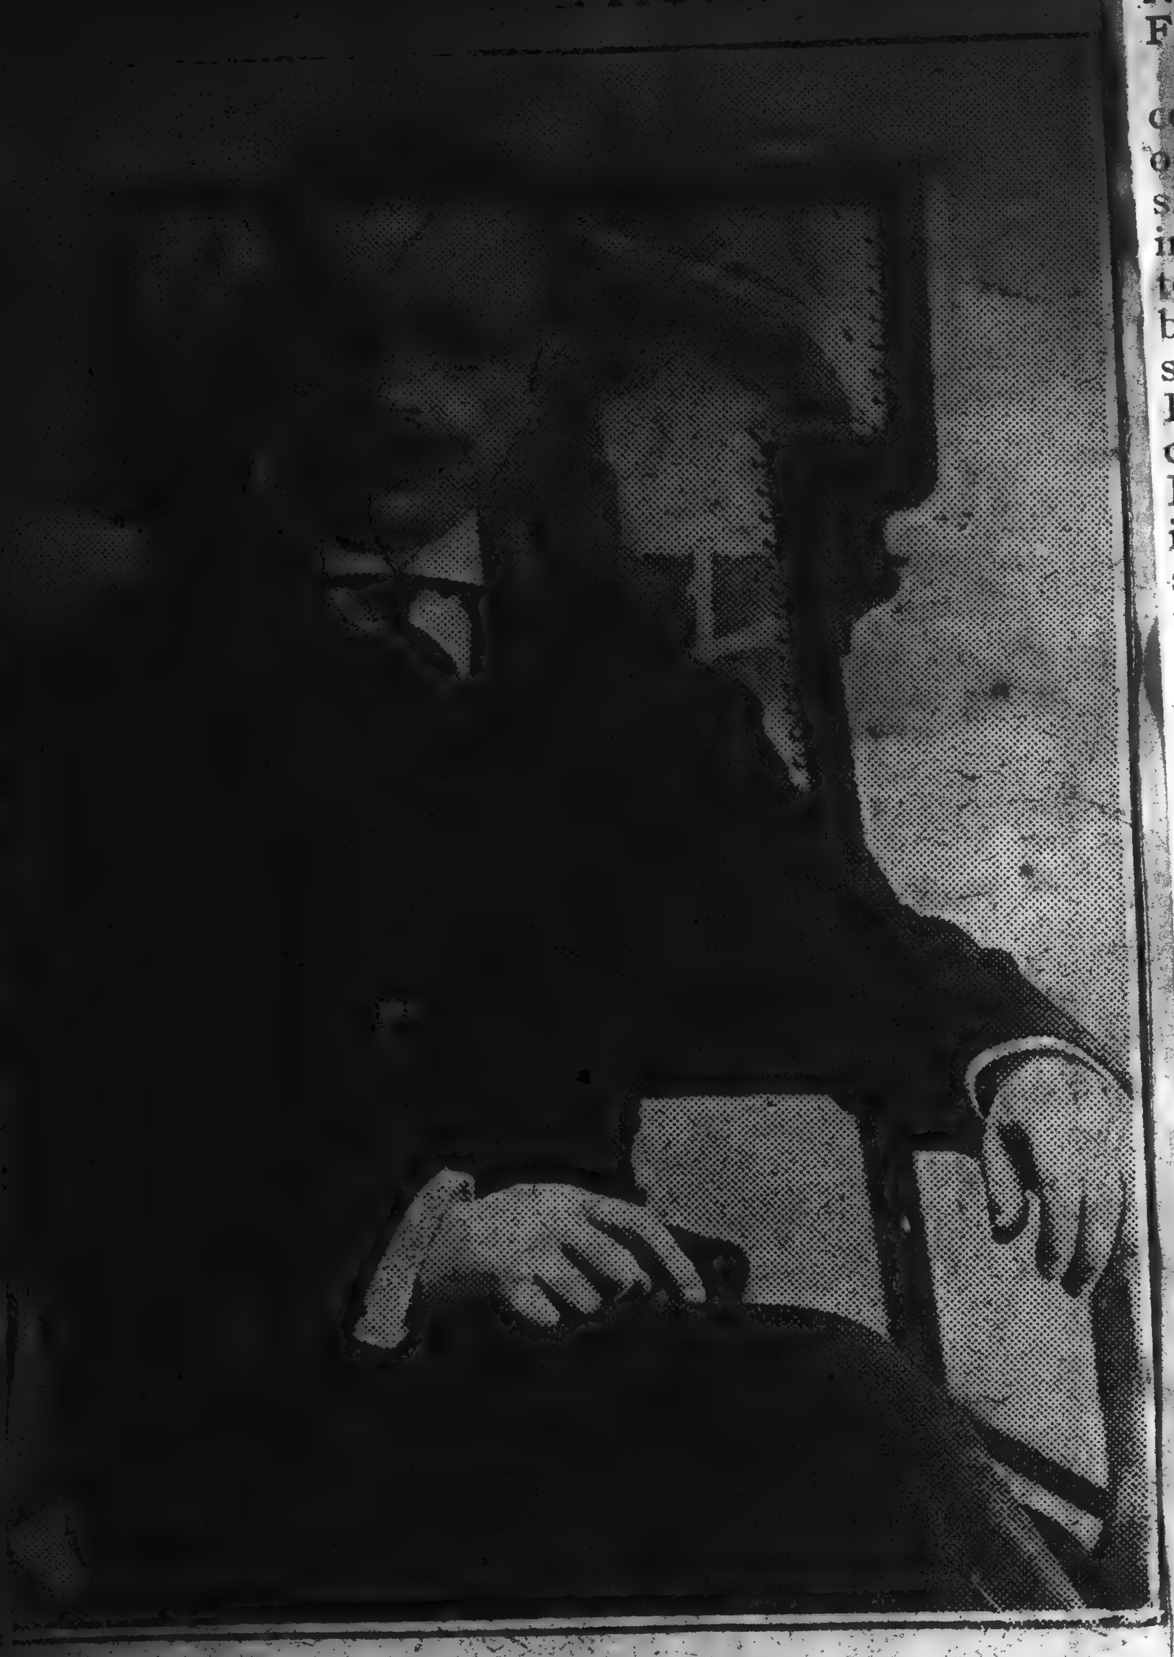
This singular man and most accomplished pianist—one of the few to whom we listened gladly—carried in his pocket a box of precious stones. He said they suggested colors to him while he was playing Chopin's music. He was interested in philosophy and liked to discuss the theories of various metaphysicians. His wife, a pianiste, who once played in Boston, was formerly his pupil. An attractive woman, she left him, obtained a divorce and married M. Labori, the distinguished French lawyer, who was conspicuous as the defender of Dreyfus. The three were good friends until the death of Labori. When he and Madame Labori were in this country some years ago they asked many questions about De Pachmann's reputation in the United States. M. Labori said that he had only recently heard him play—it was in London—and that to him he was the most pleasing of pianists. De Pachmann's two sons were cared for by the Laboris, and the father was in the habit of sending them large sums of money. One became a lawyer of no mean repute.

Marya Freund, the singer, unknown here, is recommended by M. Monteux. Vera Janacopulos has been applauded of late years in Paris. We have a vague recollection of her singing here. Was it at one of Mrs. Hall McAllister's morning concerts? She is said to be very beautiful, and that is half the battle. Carl Flesch has fiddled at a Symphony concert. A serious fiddler, delighting in the long-winded concertos of Beethoven and Brahms. It is a great

HERALD - SEPT. 11

[122]

PHONY LEADER



(Photo by Bains News Service)
SERGEI KOUSSEWITSKY

HERALD - SEPT. 12.

A well deserved "croix" of the Legion of Honor was that awarded to Pierre Monteux. He began his career of chef d'orchestre at Paris in creating at the Ballets Russes the difficult "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps." He directed the French repertory at the Metropolitan Opéra of New York and then became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. French masters have found in Pierre Monteux a brilliant interpreter of their works, and everybody rejoices at the honor which has been conferred upon him.

MONITOR. SEPT. 12

WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Who Will Come to Boston in Autumn of 1924.

GLOBE - SEPT. 13

---

oussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in [illegible] was taught music by his parents, [illegible] the age of twelve conducted [illegible] orchestra of the Municipal Theatre [illegible] native town. Then he attended [illegible] Moscow Conservatory, where he [illegible] the double bass, which he [illegible] the Moscow Imperial [illegible] 1909 he organized an [illegible] Moscow and travelled [illegible] After the revolu- [illegible] conductor of the [illegible]

POST - SEPT

NEW CONDUCTOR FOR BOSTON

Announcement that Mr. Cabot had engaged Sergei Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasioned no surprise. The report that he was slated for the position was published recently in these columns. Mr. Koussevitzky is known to Americans principally as a contra-bass player, but there is not sufficient literature for this instrument to warrant specialization as a soloist. In Europe the Russian artist is well known as a conductor, and he should justify his engagement. Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of colossal musical intelligence, and routine should make him persona grata with the musicians of the orchestra, which is not at all the same personnel as that of a decade ago. There was a time when the Boston Symphony was the most famous orchestral organization in America, but the disclosures of 1917, when the conductor and twenty-seven of the men were dismissed, almost led to disintegration. The way since has not been easy, for the several conductors could not please everyone. Despite handicaps, however, the manager, William Brennam, has contrived to bring the orchestra again to a foremost position. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction it should regain all its old-time prestige. Mr. Cabot, from all accounts, has made a very wise choice.

MUSICAL-LEADER. SEPT. 13.

KOUSSEWITZKY

A modest paragraph of stop-press news, tucked in the corner of page 17 of last week's issue, stated, in the form of a cable from our Paris correspondent, that Serge Koussewitzky had been chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in the fall of 1924; and this week the exclusive bit of news is confirmed by the official announcement of the orchestra's trustees. Once again the MUSICAL COURIER hit the nail on the head in advance of all other papers. Nothing is easier than to publish "rumors," and the name of Koussewitzky has been bandied about in connection with the Boston position for a year or more, as well as several other names. But the accuracy and promptness of the MUSICAL COURIER's information is shown by the fact that it preceded the official announcement by five days. The story was published in this paper on September 6 and the official announcement issued on September 11.

Koussewitzky is entirely an unknown quantity here, as he has never visited this country. In the ante-revolution days in Russia he had his own orchestra, but it was as a virtuoso on the double bass that he was known throughout Europe. The last few years he has made his headquarters in Paris conducting there and in London and various other places gaining a decided reputation for himself, especially in London. His coming will be awaited with great interest.

The passing of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for an appraisal of his work. Granted that his qualities as a conductor did not excite the general admiration that was the lot of leaders like Gericke, Nikisch and Muck—to name the most illustrious of his predecessors—Mr. Monteux's contribution to the musical history of Boston was nevertheless significant. When he came to Boston he found the symphony orchestra disrupted by the war and he spared no pains to reorganize it. No sooner, however, did the new orchestra begin to function smoothly, than it was again disorganized by a strike which resulted in the elimination of a third of the personnel. Again Mr. Monteux set to work to rebuild the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was the consensus of critical opinion that the early glories of the famous symphony orchestra had been restored, and there were not a few who claimed for it the leadership among orchestras that it enjoyed for many years.

Of Mr. Monteux's abilities it may fairly be said that he has made decided strides as a conductor and that as a program maker he might well serve as a model for many other orchestral leaders. His departure from Boston next spring will be regretted by a considerable part of the orchestra's following in Boston. On the other hand, the time was ripe for a change and the coming of Mr. Koussewitzky will be welcomed by the orchestra's well wishers not only in Boston, but also in New York and the other cities visited by this organization.

MUSICAL-COURIER.

---

gladly agreed to, with the result that the usual summer inactivity (barring the annual Music Festival) was relieved by an evening of musical enjoyment.

Edward Johnson will sing here under the auspices of the Asheville Kiwanis Club.

Weekly concerts have been given in the music room of the Battery Park Hotel. Many well known Southern artists have appeared on programs made up principally of American compositions. Some of the most successful American compositions have had their premiére at the Battery Park,

SERGE ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Koussevitzky was born at Vishny Volotchk, northern Russia, on June 30, 1874. He studied at the conservatory at Moscow, his specialty being the double bass. In 1900 he was appointed a professor of that school and at the same time was a member of the Imperial Theater Orchestra. Becoming possessed of great means he went to Berlin, founding there in 1910 a Union for the Advancement of Russian Composers. He also travelled extensively throughout Europe giving recitals on the double bass. With his own private means he maintained a symphony orchestra in Russia and did pioneer work by travelling with it through various districts of the great land that knew nothing of symphonic music.

Koussevitzky remained in Russia during the war and revolution and, like all other prominent figures, was lost to the sight of the outside world for a long time. Then there came the report that he had been elected conductor of the orchestra which was formerly the Czar's private string

MUSICAL-COURIER - SEPT. 13

Pierre Monteux's Successor

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, or some other Russian, was perhaps the inevitable choice of those who had the duty of appointing a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in 1924. For the man selected to head the organization which Henry L. Higginson founded forty years ago would, without doubt, require to have something to recommend him besides mere technical capacity and professional standing. He would need, in truth, to belong to the land that enjoyed the highest artistic repute of any; or at least he would be picked, in all logic and necessity, from that country which, on musical considerations, ranked first in the world.

To put the case the other way around, Bostonians, in fixing upon Mr. Koussevitzky as the director of their Symphony Concerts, may be said to have expressed the opinion that Russia, rather than any other European nation, is the orchestral hope of the present generation. Then, to regard matters from a historic standpoint, Bostonians have already tested the value of British, German, Austrian, and French ideals, and must, to make their æsthetic experimentation complete, put the Russian ideal to the test. When they established their famous Handel and Haydn Society chorus early in the nineteenth century, they began the pursuit of the beautiful after a manner that had been the vogue of London for decades. When they set up their great organ in Music Hall in the sixties, they affected the aspirations of the people of Leipzig. When they took the Higginson orchestra to their bosom in the eighties, they palpitated, in turn, with a Viennese enthusiasm. Not long after building Symphony Hall, they sought to realize the emotions of the twentieth century, and accordingly tuned their ears to the song of the superman, as sung in Berlin. Upon the conclusion of the war, they yearned for the artificial pipings of Paris and the morbid overtones of the Salle Gaveau. Now, seeking an elemental basis for appreciation, they are fain to listen to the airs, in minor keys, that represent the heart of Moscow.

On the strength of their preferences, Bostonians have been able, in times gone, to make their musical institutions the foremost of the United States. They saw their orchestra under Muck, the great authority on Strauss, hold unquestioned pre-eminence; and they may, for all anybody can tell, see it under Koussevitzky, the great interpreter of Scriabine, come back into renown.

MONITOR. - SEPT. 15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

A Boston Symphony Orchestra season of unusual interest and high artistic importance is anticipated. This will be the 43d year of the orchestra, and the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will open on Oct. 12 and 13. The sale of subscription tickets now being held shows a greater demand than ever before: all of the Friday afternoon seats were re-engaged, and only a few for the Saturday evenings are still available. This season will be the fifth and last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts will be as follows:

The singers: Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of Metropolitan Opera Company; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo soprano; Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos [illegible] celebrated in [illegible] Hayes, the colored tenor, whose European fame is now of the very highest.

The pianists will include Moriz Rosenthal, the great pupil of Liszt, who has not been in this country for some seasons; Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, the former conductor of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, and E. Robert Schmitz.

Other instrumentalists will be Pablo Casals, the great 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

POST - SEPT. 16.

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

(Photo by Bains News Service)
SERGEI KOUSSEWITSKY

HERALD - SEPT

A well-deserved "croix" of the Legion of Honor was that awarded to Pierre Monteux. He began his career of chef d'orchestre at Paris in creating at the Ballets Russes the difficult "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps." He directed the French repertory at the Metropolitan Opéra of New York and then became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. French masters have found in Pierre Monteux a brilliant interpreter of their works, and everybody rejoices at the honor which has been conferred upon him.

MONITOR

WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

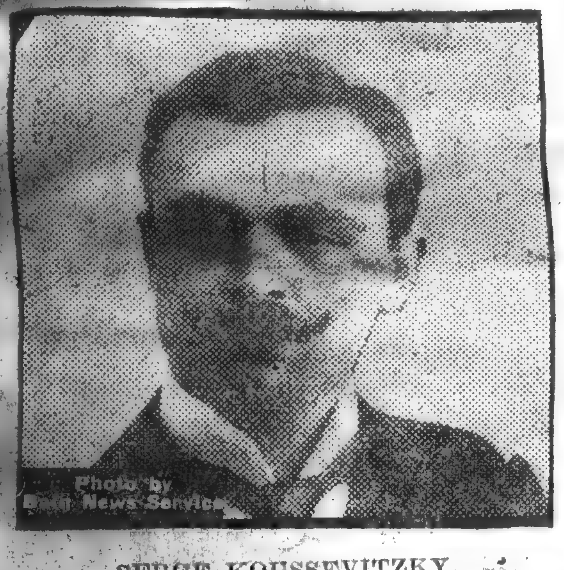


Photo by Bain News Service

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Who Will Come to Boston in Autumn of 1924.

GLOBE SEPT. 13

Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in 1874, was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra of the Municipal Theatre in his native town. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, where he studied the double bass, which he played in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra. In 1909 he organized an orchestra in Moscow and travelled over Russia with it. After the revolution he was made conductor of the [illegible] State Orchestra and in 1920 [illegible] in Paris and London, and [illegible] Grand Opera in

N.Y. EV. POST. SEPT 10

NEW CONDUCTOR FOR BOSTON

Announcement that Mr. Cabot had engaged Sergei Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasioned no surprise. The report that he was slated for the position was published recently in these columns. Mr. Koussevitzky is known to Americans principally as a contra-bass player, but there is not sufficient literature for this instrument to warrant specialization as a soloist. In Europe the Russian artist is well known as a conductor, and he should justify his engagement. Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of colossal musical intelligence, and routine should make him persona grata with the musicians of the orchestra, which is not at all the same personnel as that of a decade ago. There was a time when the Boston Symphony was the most famous orchestral organization in America, but the disclosures of 1917, when the conductor and twenty-seven of the men were dismissed, almost led to disintegration. The way since has not been easy, for the several conductors could not please everyone. Despite handicaps, however, the manager, William Brennam, has contrived to bring the orchestra again to a foremost position. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction it should regain all its old-time prestige. Mr. Cabot, from all accounts, has made a very wise choice.

MUSICAL LEADER. SEPT. 13.

KOUSSEVITZKY

gladly agreed to, with the result that the usual summer inactivity (barring the annual Music Festival) was relieved by an evening of musical enjoyment.

Edward Johnson will sing here under the auspices of the Asheville Kiwanis Club.

Weekly concerts have been given in the music room of the Battery Park Hotel. Many well known Southern artists have appeared on programs made up principally of American compositions. Some of the most successful American compositions have had their premiére at the Battery Park.

SERGE ALEXANDROVITCH KOUSSEVITZKY

of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Koussevitzky was born at Vishny Volotchk, northern Russia, on June 30, 1874. He studied at the conservatory at Moscow, his specialty being the double bass. In 1900 he was appointed a professor of that school and at the same time was a member of the Imperial Theater Orchestra. Becoming possessed of great means he went to Berlin, founding there in 1910 a Union for the Advancement of Russian Composers. He also travelled extensively throughout Europe giving recitals on the double bass. With his own private means he maintained a symphony orchestra in Russia and did pioneer work by travelling with it through various districts of the great land that knew nothing of symphonic music.

Koussevitzky remained in Russia during the war and revolution and, like all other prominent figures, was lost to the sight of the outside world for a long time. Then there came the report that he had been elected conductor of the orchestra which was formerly the Czar's private [illegible]

MUSICAL [illegible] - SEPT

KOUSSEWITZKY

A modest paragraph of stop-press news, tucked in the corner of page 17 of last week's issue, stated, in the form of a cable from our Paris correspondent, that Serge Koussewitzky had been chosen conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in the fall of 1924; and this week the exclusive bit of news is confirmed by the official announcement of the orchestra's trustees. Once again the Musical Courier hit the nail on the head in advance of all other papers. Nothing is easier than to publish "rumors," and the name of Koussewitzky has been bandied about in connection with the Boston position for a year or more, as well as several other names. But the accuracy and promptness of the Musical Courier's information is shown by the fact that it preceded the official announcement by five days. The story was published in this paper on September 6 and the official announcement issued on September 11.

Koussewitzky is entirely an unknown quantity here, as he has never visited this country. In the ante-revolution days in Russia he had his own orchestra, but it was as a virtuoso on the double bass that he was known throughout Europe. The last few years he has made his headquarters in Paris conducting there and in London and various other places gaining a decided reputation for himself, especially in London. His coming will be awaited with great interest.

The passing of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra calls for an appraisal of his work. Granted that his qualities as a conductor did not excite the general admiration that was the lot of leaders like Gericke, Nikisch and Muck—to name the most illustrious of his predecessors—Mr. Monteux's contribution to the musical history of Boston was nevertheless significant. When he came to Boston he found the symphony orchestra disrupted by the war and he spared no pains to reorganize it. No sooner, however, did the new orchestra begin to function smoothly, than it was again disorganized by a strike which resulted in the elimination of a third of the personnel. Again Mr. Monteux set to work to rebuild the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was the consensus of critical opinion that the early glories of the famous symphony orchestra had been restored, and there were not a few who claimed for it the leadership among orchestras that it enjoyed for many years.

Of Mr. Monteux's abilities it may fairly be said that he has made decided strides as a conductor and that as a program maker he might well serve as a model for many other orchestral leaders. His departure from Boston next spring will be regretted by a considerable part of the orchestra's following in Boston. On the other hand, the time was ripe for a change and the coming of Mr. Koussewitzky will be welcomed by the orchestra's well wishers not only in Boston, but also in New York and the other cities visited by this organization.

MUSICAL COURIER.

Pierre Monteux's Successor

Sergei Koussevitzky, or some other Russian, ~~was~~ perhaps the inevitable choice of those who had the duty of appointing a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in 1924. For the man selected to head the organization which Henry L. Higginson founded forty years ago would, without doubt, require to have something to recommend him besides mere technical capacity and professional standing. He would need, in truth, to belong to the land that enjoyed the highest artistic repute of any; or at least he would be picked, in all logic and necessity, from that country which, on musical considerations, ranked first in the world.

To put the case the other way around, Bostonians, in fixing upon Mr. Koussevitzky as the director of their Symphony Concerts, may be said to have expressed the opinion that Russia, rather than any other European nation, is the orchestral hope of the present generation. Then, to regard matters from a historic standpoint, Bostonians have already tested the value of British, German, Austrian, and French ideals, and must, to make their æsthetic experimentation complete, put the Russian ideal to the test. When they established their famous Handel and Haydn Society chorus early in the nineteenth century, they began the pursuit of the beautiful after a manner that had been the vogue of London for decades. When they set up their great organ in Music Hall in the sixties, they affected the aspirations of the people of Leipzig. When they took the Higginson orchestra to their bosom in the eighties, they palpitated, in turn, with a Viennese enthusiasm. Not long after building Symphony Hall, they sought to realize the emotions of the twentieth century, and accordingly tuned their ears to the song of the superman, as sung in Berlin. Upon the conclusion of the war, they yearned for the artificial pipings of Paris and the morbid overtones of the Salle Gaveau. Now, seeking an elemental basis for appreciation, they are fain to listen to the airs, in minor keys, that represent the heart of Moscow.

On the strength of their preferences, Bostonians have been able, in times gone, to make their musical institutions the foremost of the United States. They saw their orchestra under Muck, the great authority on Strauss, hold unquestioned pre-eminence; and they may, for all anybody can tell, see it under Koussevitzky, the great interpreter of Scriabine, come back into renown.

MONITOR. - SEPT. 13.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

A Boston Symphony Orchestra season of unusual interest and high artistic importance is anticipated. This will be the 43d year of the orchestra, and the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will open on Oct. 12 and 13. The sale of subscription tickets now being held shows a greater demand than ever before: all of the Friday afternoon seats were re-engaged, and only a few for the Saturday evenings are still available. This season will be the fifth and last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts will be as follows:

The singers: Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of Metropolitan Opera Company; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo soprano; Marya Freund and Vera Janacopules, sopranos widely known and celebrated in Europe, and Roland Hayes, the colored tenor, whose European fame is now of the very highest.

The pianists will include Moriz Rosenthal, the great pupil of Liszt, who has not been in this country for some seasons; Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, the former conductor of the orchestra; Harold Bauer, and E. Robert Schmitz.

Other instrumentalists will be Pablo Casals, the great 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

POST-SEPT. 16.

[123]

KOUSSEVITZKY SUCCEDERA A PIERRE MONTEUX

Boston, 9 septembre. — Le Juge Frederick P. Cabot, président du bureau de régie de la Boston Symphony, vient d'annoncer l'engagement de Serge Koussevitzky comme successeur de Pierre Monteux à partir de l'automne 1924. Assez singulièrement, personne n'avait eu vent des démarches qui ont abouti à cet événement imprévu et la nouvelle a créé toute une sensation parmi les habitués de l'orchestre.

Pierre Monteux est attendu de France au cours du mois, apportant plusieurs nouveautés ; il commencera aussitôt ses répétitions pour la saison qui sera la cinquième consécutive de sa direction musicale ici et qui commencera le 12 octobre à Symphony Hall. Sa famille est de nouveau établie à Paris et il l'y rejoindra au printemps prochain.

M. Koussevitzky naquit à Tver, dans le nord de la Russie en 1874. Ses premières leçons de musique lui furent données par ses parents ; à douze ans il dirigea l'orchestre du Théâtre Municipal de sa ville natale. Il obtint ses diplômes au Conservatoire de Moscou où il étudia principalement la contrebasse dont il devint un virtuose, ce qui lui valut d'entrer à l'orchestre de l'Opéra Impérial de Moscou.

Il forma un orchestre à Berlin et un autre, plus important, à Moscou en 1909. Il donna des concerts dans cette dernière ville, à Petrograd et à travers la Russie. C'est à cette époque que Koussevitzky loua un bateau et parcourut la Volga pour faire entendre les oeuvres symphoniques à toute la population riveraine qui n'avait jamais entendu rien de pareil.

Depuis 1920, Paris et Londres l'ont vu presque sans interruption, dirigeant le London Symphony Orchestra, des concerts symphoniques à l'Opéra et des représentations lyriques au palais Garnier. Pendant l'hiver qui s'en vient, M. Koussevitzky sera occupé à Berlin et à Prague, puis il conduira une série d'opéras au Théâtre National de l'Opéra à Paris : Pique Dame, le Prince Igor, Boris Godunov et la Khovantchina. Eusuite il fera une tournée de l'Angleterre et de l'Ecosse à la tête d'un orchestre.

LE CANADA-MOSGL. SEPT. 15

The Star from the East

By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kusevitsky, for a term beginning in 1924 and continuing thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concert-goers in America. This singular virtuoso of the bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travellers who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming in the flesh next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski—to name but two recent eminences of the baton. [The New York Times

It is most welcome news that Kusevitsky is to conduct the Boston Symphony. We heard him at a single concert in Paris last May in a curiously mixed programme of classic and modern music. From a single hearing, we felt he is the leading conductor of today—a great conductor, the like of which has not been heard since Nikisch. We may be wrong, but there is no doubt he is head and shoulders above anyone now in America. [In a Private Letter from An Amateur

TRANS. SEPT. 17

SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux has just sailed from France and will begin rehearsals immediately on arriving in preparation for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which is to take place Oct. 12.

The string section of the orchestra will retain the same personnel as last year save for the addition of Paul Cherkassy, a Russian virtuoso, who has recently arrived from Russia to join the first violins. Mr. Cherkassy has been concert master of the orchestra at Helsingfors, Finland, since Richard Burgin left that post to be concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is a cousin of Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist, who is shortly to give a recital here.

TRAV. SEPT. 22

KOUSSEVITZKY APPOINTED CONDUCTOR

The most important item of musical news in Boston during the entire season now beginning will probably turn out in the end to have been the announcement last Monday that Serge Koussevitzky is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning in October, 1924. Of course, if some philanthropist were to establish a permanent opera company here that fact would be bigger musical news. But otherwise the simple statement from the trustees that they have already settled what would otherwise have been the much-vexed question of the new conductor is about the only "front-page stuff," in newspaper office language, likely to come in 1923-24.

It was understood a year ago, when Mr Monteux was reappointed for two more seasons, that this year was to be the last of his conductorship. No official statement has been made, or in all probability will be made, as to whether he would have liked to remain permanently here.

It is reasonable, as well as courteous, to assume that, like most Frenchmen, he prefers to pass most of his life in his native land. Mme Monteux was in bad health last Winter here. This year the conductor has left his family in Paris, which doubtless indicates a well-founded fear of the New England climate, something few foreigners enjoy.

Since he is to conduct the concerts this season, it is too soon to indulge in polite farewells to Mr Monteux. But it is in season to repeat what has so often been urged by this department of the Globe, that every one who cares at all about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is deeply indebted to Mr Monteux's patient and painstaking endeavors for the rebuilding of an intrument more nearly shattered by the two crushing blows of war and strike than most of us cared to admit at the time. The past two seasons have made the Boston Symphony again an orchestra of the first rank, and to Mr Monteux must go the lion's share of the credit.

What Boston Owes to Monteux

There has been not infrequent occasion to differ with Mr Monteux on questions of interpretation of music played under his direction. Some things he has done well, others less well, in the opinion of the Globe reviewer. But no thinking person can fail to see that both as conductor and as a man Mr Monteux deserves respect. During this season the audiences will enjoy the benefits of his unusually broad and fair-minded program making and of his always honest, sometimes brilliant, interpretations. Mr Koussevitzky will owe Mr Monteux a greater debt than he may realize for the state in which he will doubtless find the orchestra.

Mr Koussevitzky will come to Boston with a great reputation in Europe as a vivid interpreter of modern and ancient music. Except Dr Muck, no other leader the orchestra has had has come to it with such conspicuous renown already won. Nikisch, of course, won an astonishing reputation after he left us.

This is the impression Mr Koussevitzky made on one interviewer last Summer, as recorded in The Musical Digest of July 24. When met at his home the conductor "was simple, approachable, with the charm of most cultured Russians. Specifically we noticed dark, graying hair, a florid complexion, compelling green eyes, a somewhat ascetic mouth. But the outstanding impression was of character rather than of appearance; of unmistakable sincerity and an immense courage."

He will need all his courage if he intends, as he doubtless does, to make Boston audiences sit through programs featuring works of Honegger, Milhaud, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Bartok.

Something About Koussevitzky

Asked to define good music he said "I can only answer, music which speaks to the heart. Many people make the superficial mistake of classifying modern music as all intellect and no emotion. Yet what could be more thrilling than Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" or Honegger's "Horace Victorieux." The latter work elicited many letter of protest from subscribers when Mr Monteux played it last season. It got an icy reception from all but a few of the audience.

Mr Koussevitzky remarked of "Sacre du Printemps" that he first played it from manuscript 10 years ago in Paris. "And the audience laughed from the very first bar to the closing chord! So you may judge how pleased I was at the reception it got the other night" (speaking of one of his highly successful series of symphony concerts at the Opera in Paris.)

Koussevitzky's programs always contain a due proportion of classics. He seems to play chiefly the great masterpieces and the fairly recent novelties, without very much of the Grieg-MacDowell period. Yet he often plays Tchaikovsky!

His career has won him European reputation first as a soloist on the double bass, for which he wrote a concerto, and then as conductor in Russia and as a visitor everywhere else in Europe. He is a Russian, born in 1874.

He does not know American music, except jazz. Ernest Bloch's name was the only one among American living composers that caught his attention, and he was quite naturally amused at hearing a Swiss Jew proudly claimed as an American. He remarked that he would not come to America, where he has never conducted, "for a few show concerts. Too many visiting conductors turn orchestras into circuses." The last sentence might well be taken to heart in New York. He was careful not to hint that overtures had then been made to him from Boston, as they must have been by last July.

There will be keen and anxious curiosity at the first few concerts Koussevitzky conducts here. The audience has bought a pig in a poke, for all most of it knows. One hopes that the trustees have chosen wisely. At any rate it is hard to see where they could have chosen any one likely to prove a better conductor here, and induced him to come.

GLOBE. SEPT. 16

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A Boston Symphony Orchestra season of unusual interest and high artistic importance is anticipated. This will be the 43d year of the orchestra, and the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will open on Oct. 12 and 13. The sale of subscription tickets now being held shows a greater demand than ever before: all of the Friday afternoon seats were re-engaged, and only a few for the Saturday evenings are still available. This season will be the fifth and last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts will be as follows:

The singers: Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo soprano; Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos widely known and celebrated in Europe, and Roland Hayes, the colored tenor, whose European fame is now of the very highest.

The pianists will include Moriz Rosenthal, the great pupil of Liszt, who has not been in this country for some seasons; Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, the former conductor of the orchestra; Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz.

Other instrumentalists will be Pablo Casals, the great 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

HERALD-SEPT. 16.

Mr Monteux is on his way here from Paris, to begin rehearsals for the last season of his conductorship here. He is planning, as usual, a number of interesting novelties for the programs.

"By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers, who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski, to name but two recent stars of the baton."—Richard Al-

GLOBE. SEPT. 23.

MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER

SEP 23 1923

Cabot-Koussevitzky.

Consider these two names: Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky. They outline the current musical situation in America as well as it can be outlined. The first is president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and announced recently the appointment of the second to the conductorship of that orchestra commencing 1924.

The Cabots, than which there is no purer American stock, on the one hand; the Koussevitzkys, born in Vishny Volotchk, one the other. The two names are symbolic of where the old world meets the new, musically. The Cabots hire the Koussevitzkys. America has the money and the inclination. Europe has the talent. We supply the audience; for genius we look abroad. It would be lamentable were it not that the Koussevitzkys always have so much genius.

SIX FAMOUS SINGE

By MARGARET BELL

SIGRID ONEGIN

SIGRID ONEGIN.

SYMPHONY HALL was gathering its audience within its decorous doors. No great excitement was evident in the vestibule, nor in the auditorium. Up in the gallery women in ones and twos scrutinized their programs and watched the other arrivals.

One of these leaned over and spoke to another, "How is it that there is not a greater crowd? Out in Minneapolis, where I come from, we've been just wild to hear Onegin." The other answered, with an eloquent smile, "O, you know Boston never takes anyone's word for anything; she must see and hear for herself."

Then lights faded, doors flew shut. A moment's tension, a fluttering of youthful hearts . . . another bell, a straining forward by those in the balconies . . . and the opening of the side stage door.

All in white came the vision that Boston was waiting to see, white and shimmering silver, which made her black hair glow even blacker. The seeing was so blended with the feeling that no definite feature could be analyzed.

Straight From the Gods

The moment Sigrid Onegin stood on the stage she had her audience absolutely with her. Something swooped across the place, some force which knit each individual to each other individual and made of all the diverse personalities a single unit, a thousand times more alive than in its individual parts, alert, eager, pulsating.

A fugitive sigh went out unconsciously, the tribute to grace and graciousness, beauty and magnetism. Then followed applause, the only outlet for all the suddenly conceived emotion. . . .

At her first note Boston sighed again and settled back in its seats. A teacher of singing in the first row of the balcony turned to the woman next to her, "That's a voice straight from the gods!"

Someone else along the line whispered, "She recalls Schuman-Heink in her beginning days. But dear old Schuman-Heink never had such beauty as this."

Well—Boston heard. And Boston responded to the great modesty of the new singer, who showed her appreciation more graciously and more humbly than any one could remember for a long time.

Then the questions that flew around during the intermission. Was she really Scandanavian? She looked so Spanish. That hair and those wonderful dark eyes. Why had we never heard more about her? Where had she been hiding herself? Etc, etc, etc.

There were those who knew that she had arrived Oct 25 and had sung with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall six days later; that Gatti-Casazza had found her at the Royal Opera House in Munich while he was over combing Europe for new singers.

Learning English Now

New York really did wake up when she sang Amneris in the Metropolitan Opera House on Nov 22, and a little later on, in her own recital, New York humbly laid its flowers at her feet. We here in Boston waited, and on Feb 8 she came—and we laid more than our flowers at her feet.

Yes, in spite of her dark beauty, Madame Onegin is Swedish. Stockholm had the privilege of being her birthplace, not so many years ago, and then Paris listened to her first efforts to bring her wonderful voice under control. That is why her French is so good. Her German came a little later when she went to that country. Italian she learned as a matter of musical course.

"And I hope to add English to the list. I have made a little progress with the language since coming to America, and whatever I have learned is the result of hard work. I am much interested in American songs and if you could see my piano at this moment you would see it heaped with them."

By the way, her name is pronounced On-yeh-gin, with the accent on the second syllable.

GLOBE. SEPT. 28

The World of Music

Competition in Music, Movie Accompaniments, Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Koussevitzky

Consider these two names: Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky. They outline the current musical situation in America as well as it can be outlined. The first is president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and announced recently the appointment of the second to the conductorship of that orchestra commencing 1924.

The Cabots, than which there is no purer American stock, on the one hand; the Koussevitzky's, born in Vishny Volotchk, on the other. The two names are symbolic of where the old world meets the new, musically. The Cabots hire the Koussevitzkys. America has the money and the inclination. Europe has the talent. We supply the audience; for genius we look abroad. It would be lamentable, were it not [illegible] always have so [illegible]

[124]

KOUSSEVITZKY SUCCEDERA A PIERRE MONTEUX

Boston, 9 septembre. — Le Juge Frederick P. Cabot, président du bureau de régie de la Boston Symphony, vient d'annoncer l'engagement de Serge Koussevitzky comme successeur de Pierre Monteux à partir de l'automne 1924. Assez singulièrement, personne n'avait eu vent des démarches qui ont abouti à cet événement imprévu et la nouvelle a créé toute une sensation parmi les habitués de l'orchestre.

Pierre Monteux est attendu de France au cours du mois, apportant plusieurs nouveautés ; il commencera aussitôt ses répétitions pour la saison qui sera la cinquième consécutive de sa direction musicale ici et qui commencera le 12 octobre à Symphony Hall. Sa famille est de nouveau établie à Paris et il l'y rejoindra au printemps prochain.

M. Koussevitzky naquit à Tver, dans le nord de la Russie en 1874. Ses premières leçons de musique lui furent données par ses parents ; à douze ans il dirigea l'orchestre du Théâtre Municipal de sa ville natale. Il obtint ses diplômes au Conservatoire de Moscou où il étudia principalement la contrebasse dont il devint un virtuose, ce qui lui valut d'entrer à l'orchestre de l'Opéra Impérial de Moscou.

Il forma un orchestre à Berlin et un autre, plus important, à Moscou en 1909. Il donna des concerts dans cette dernière ville, à Petrograd et à travers la Russie. C'est à cette époque que Koussevitzky loua un bateau et parcourut la Volga pour faire entendre les oeuvres symphoniques à toute la population riveraine qui n'avait jamais entendu rien de pareil.

Depuis 1920, Paris et Londres l'ont vu presque sans interruption, dirigeant le London Symphony Orchestra, des concerts symphoniques à l'Opéra et des représentations lyriques au palais Garnier. Pendant l'hiver qui s'en vient, M. Koussevitzky sera occupé à Berlin et à Prague, puis il conduira une série d'opéras au Théâtre National de l'Opéra à Paris : Pique Dame, le Prince Igor, Boris Godunov et la Khovantchina. Eusuite il fera une tournée de l'Angleterre et de l'Ecosse à la tête d'un orchestre.

LE CANADA-MOSGL. SEPT. 15.

KOUSSEVITZKY APPOINTED CONDUCTOR

The most important item of musical news in Boston during the entire season now beginning will probably turn out in the end to have been the announcement last Monday that Serge Koussevitzky is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning in October, 1924. Of course, if some philanthropist were to establish a permanent opera company here that fact would be bigger musical news. But otherwise the simple statement from the trustees that they have already settled what would otherwise have been the much-vexed question of the new conductor is about the only "front-page stuff," in newspaper office language, likely to come in 1923-24.

It was understood a year ago, when Mr Monteux was reappointed for two more seasons, that this year was to be the last of his conductorship. No official statement has been made, or in all probability will be made, as to whether he would have liked to remain permanently here.

It is reasonable, as well as courteous, to assume that, like most Frenchmen, he prefers to pass most of his life in his native land. Mme Monteux was in bad health last Winter here. This year the conductor has left his family in Paris, which doubtless indicates a well-founded fear of the New England climate, something few foreigners enjoy.

Since he is to conduct the concerts this season, it is too soon to indulge in polite farewells to Mr Monteux. But it is in season to repeat what has so often been urged by this department of the Globe, that every one who cares at all about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is deeply indebted to Mr Monteux's patient and painstaking endeavors for the rebuilding of an intrument more nearly shattered by the two crushing blows of war and strike than most of us cared to admit at the time. The past two seasons have made the Boston Symphony again an orchestra of the first rank, and to Mr Monteux must go the lion's share of the credit.

What Boston Owes to Monteux

There has been not infrequent occasion to differ with Mr Monteux on questions of interpretation of music played under his direction. Some things he has done well, others less well, in the opinion of the Globe reviewer. But no thinking person can fail to see that both as conductor and as a man Mr Monteux deserves respect. During this season the audiences will enjoy the benefits of his unusually broad and fair-minded program making and of his always honest, sometimes brilliant, interpretations. Mr Koussevitzky will owe Mr Monteux a greater debt than he may realize for the state in which he will doubtless find the orchestra.

Mr Koussevitzky will come to Boston with a great reputation in Europe as a vivid interpreter of modern and ancient music. Except Dr Muck, no other leader the orchestra has had has come to it with such conspicuous renown already won. Nikisch, of course, won an astonishing reputation after he left us.

This is the impression Mr Koussevitzky made on one interviewer last Summer, as recorded in The Musical Digest of July 24. When met at his home the conductor "was simple, approachable, with the charm of most cultured Russians. Specifically we noticed dark, graying hair, a florid complexion, compelling green eyes, a somewhat ascetic mouth. But the outstanding impression was of character rather than of appearance; of unmistakable sincerity and an immense courage."

He will need all his courage if he intends, as he doubtless does, to make Boston audiences sit through programs featuring works of Honegger, Milhaud, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Bartok.

Something About Koussevitzky

Asked to define good music he said "I can only answer, music which speaks to the heart. Many people make the superficial mistake of classifying modern music as all intellect and no emotion. Yet what could be more thrilling than Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" or Honegger's "Horace Victorieux." The latter work elicited many letter of protest from subscribers when Mr Monteux played it last season. It got an icy reception from all but a few of the audience.

Mr Koussevitzky remarked of "Sacre du Printemps" that he first played it from manuscript 10 years ago in Paris, "And the audience laughed from the very first bar to the closing chord! So you may judge how pleased I was at the reception it got the other night" (speaking of one of his highly successful series of symphony concerts at the Opera in Paris.)

Koussevitzky's programs always contain a due proportion of classics. He seems to play chiefly the great masterpieces and the fairly recent novelties, without very much of the Grieg-MacDowell period. Yet he often plays Tchaikovsky!

His career has won him European reputation first as a soloist on the double bass, for which he wrote a concerto, and then as conductor in Russia and as a visitor everywhere else in Europe. He is a Russian, born in 1874.

He does not know American music, except jazz. Ernest Bloch's name was the only one among American living composers that caught his attention, and he was quite naturally amused at hearing a Swiss Jew proudly claimed as an American. He remarked that he would not come to America, where he has never conducted, "for a few show concerts. Too many visiting conductors turn orchestras into circuses." The last sentence might well be taken to heart in New York. He was careful not to hint that overtures had then been made to him from Boston, as they must have been by last July.

There will be keen and anxious curiosity at the first few concerts Koussevitzky conducts here. The audience has bought a pig in a poke, for all most of it knows. One hopes that the trustees have chosen wisely. At any rate it is hard to see where they could have chosen any one likely to prove a better conductor here, and induced him to come.

GLOBE. SEPT. 16

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A Boston Symphony Orchestra season of unusual interest and high artistic importance is anticipated. This will be the 43d year of the orchestra, and the regular series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will open on Oct. 12 and 13. The sale of subscription tickets now being held shows a greater demand than ever before: all of the Friday afternoon seats were re-engaged, and only a few for the Saturday evenings are still available. This season will be the fifth and last under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor, who is shortly expected to return from Europe.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts will be as follows:

The singers: Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo soprano; Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos widely known and celebrated in Europe, and Roland Hayes, the colored tenor, whose European fame is now of the very highest.

The pianists will include Moriz Rosenthal, the great pupil of Liszt, who has not been in this country for some seasons; Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, the former conductor of the orchestra; Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz.

Other instrumentalists will be Pablo Casals, the great 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

HERALD-SEPT. 16.

The Star from the East

By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kusevitsky, for a term beginning in 1924 and continuing thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concert-goers in America. This singular virtuoso of the bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travellers who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming in the flesh next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski—to name but two recent eminences of the baton. [The New York Times

It is most welcome news that Kusevitsky is to conduct the Boston Symphony. We heard him at a single concert in Paris last May in a curiously mixed programme of classic and modern music. From a single hearing, we felt he is the leading conductor of today—a great conductor, the like of which has not been heard since Nikisch. We may be wrong, but there is no doubt he is head and shoulders above anyone now in America. [In a Private Letter from An Amateur

TRANS. SEPT. 17.

SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux has just sailed from France and will begin rehearsals immediately on arriving in preparation for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which is to take place Oct. 12.

The string section of the orchestra will retain the same personnel as last year save for the addition of Paul Cherkassy, a Russian virtuoso, who has recently arrived from Russia to join the first violins. Mr. Cherkassy has been concert master of the orchestra at Helsingfors, Finland, since Richard Burgin left that post to be concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is a cousin of Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist, who is shortly to give a recital here.

TRAV. SEPT. 22.

Mr Monteux is on his way here from Paris, to begin rehearsals for the last season of his conductorship here. He is planning, as usual, a number of interesting novelties for the programs.

"By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been 'heard,' or his performances have been heard, by American travelers, who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski, to name but two recent stars of the baton."—Richard Al-

GLOBE. SEPT. 23.

MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER

EP23

Cabot-Koussevitzky.

Consider these two names: Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky. They outline the current musical situation in America as well as it can be outlined. The first is president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and announced recently the appointment of the second to the conductorship of that orchestra commencing 1924.

The Cabots, than which there is no purer American stock, on the one hand; the Koussevitzkys, born in Vishny Volotchk, one the other. The two names are symbolic of where the old world meets the new, musically. The Cabots hire the Koussevitzkys. America has the money and the inclination. Europe has the talent. We supply the audience; for genius we look abroad. It would be lamentable were it not that the Koussevitzkys always have so much genius.

SIX FAMOUS SINGERS

By MARGARET BELL

SIGRID ONEGIN

SIGRID ONEGIN.

SYMPHONY HALL was gathering its audience within its decorous doors. No great excitement was evident in the vestibule, nor in the auditorium. Up in the gallery women in ones and twos scrutinized their programs and watched the other arrivals.

One of these leaned over and spoke to another, "How is it that there is not a greater crowd? Out in Minneapolis, where I come from, we've been just wild to hear Onegin." The other answered, with an eloquent smile, "O, you know Boston never takes anyone's word for anything; she must see and hear for herself."

Then lights faded, doors flew shut. A moment's tension, a fluttering of youthful hearts . . . another bell, a straining forward by those in the balconies . . . and the opening of the side stage door.

All in white came the vision that Boston was waiting to see, white and shimmering silver, which made her black hair glow even blacker. The seeing was so blended with the feeling that no defiite feature could be analyzed.

Straight From the Gods

The moment Sigrid Onegin stood on the stage she had her audience absolutely with her. Something swooped across the place, some force which knit each individual to each other individual and made of all the diverse personalities a single unit, a thousand times more alive than in its individual parts, alert, eager, pulsating.

A fugitive sigh went out unconsciously, the tribute to grace and graciousness, beauty and magnetism. Then followed applause, the only outlet for all the suddenly conceived emotion. . . .

At her first note Boston sighed again and settled back in its seats. A teacher of singing in the first row of the balcony turned to the woman next to her, "That's a voice straight from the gods!"

Someone else along the line whispered, "She recalls Schuman-Heink in her beginning days. But dear old Schuman-Heink never had such beauty as this."

Well—Boston heard. And Boston responded to the great modesty of the new singer, who showed her appreciation more graciously and more humbly than any one could remember for a long time.

Then the questions that flew around during the intermission. Was she really Scandanavian? She looked so Spanish. That hair and those wonderful dark eyes. Why had we never heard more about her? Where had she been hiding herself? Etc, etc, etc.

There were those who knew that she had arrived Oct 25 and had sung with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall six days later; that Gatti-Casazza had found her at the Royal Opera House in Munich while he was over combing Europe for new singers.

Learning English Now

New York really did wake up when she sang Amneris in the Metropolitan Opera House on Nov 22, and a little later on, in her own recital, New York humbly laid its flowers at her feet. We here in Boston waited, and on Feb 8 she came—and we laid more than our flowers at her feet.

Yes, in spite of her dark beauty, Madame Onegin is Swedish. Stockholm had the privilege of being her birthplace, not so many years ago, and then Paris listened to her first efforts to bring her wonderful voice under control. That is why her French is so good. Her German came a little later when she went to that country. Italian she learned as a matter of musical course.

"And I hope to add English to the list. I have made a little progress with the language since coming to America, and whatever I have learned is the result of hard work. I am much interested in American songs and if you could see my piano at this moment you would see it heaped with them."

By the way, her name is pronounced On-yeh-gin, with the accent on the second syllable.

GLOBE. SEPT. 28

The World of Music

Competition in Music, Movie Accompaniments, Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Koussevitzky

Consider these two names: Frederick P. Cabot and Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky. They outline the current musical situation in America as well as it can be outlined. The first is president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and announced recently the appointment of the second to the conductorship of that orchestra commencing 1924.

The Cabots, than which there is no purer American stock, on the one hand; the Koussevitzky's, born in Vishny Volotchk, on the other. The two names are symbolic of where the old world meets the new, musically. The Cabots hire the Koussevitzkys. America has the money and the inclination. Europe has the talent. We supply the audience; for genius we look abroad. It would be lamentable, were it not that the Koussevitzkys always have so much genius.

N.Y. MAIL. ?

[124]

FILMED AS BOUND

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Rose From Bull-Fiddle to Baton

How You Pronounce Kussewitsky

Long u—w as v—accent on "wit" so that name sounds like this: Koo-se-VIT-skee.

BY OLIN DOWNES

Precedent will be broken when Sergei Alexandrovitch Kussewitsky, the first Russian conductor to lead concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrives here next season. And Kussewitsky himself is a man contemptuous of precedent.

Of medium height, powerfully built, a dramatic figure on the concert platform, Kussewitsky, a man of 49, with a most brilliant future before him, can look back on a singularly variegated career.

He was born poor, as all great musicians are his art, acquired such a mastery of the double-bass, otherwise called by the irreverent the bull-fiddle, one of the humblest, though by no means the least important instruments of the orchestra.

Ordinarily the double-bass player pumps along on such salary as he can command and dies leaving a large and penniless family behind him, and a few debts to commemorate his departure. Kussewitsky, instead, with an intense passion for his art, acquired such a master of the double-bass that he left the ranks of the orchestra and very soon made a remarkable reputation for himself as player of an instrument seldom heard alone on the concert platform.

But his real leap into fame occurred after his marriage to a very wealthy girl, Natalie Oushkoff by name, the daughter of a famous Russian merchant, who dearly loved her husband and whose fortune made possible, or at least, much more rapid her husband's rise to fame.

Finding himself in the possession of means, Kussewitsky, instead of turning into an idler, as too many musicians in such circumstances have done, worked the harder at his art.

He knew the double-bass. He wanted to master other instruments of the orchestra. "I shall know this and this and this one," he said, "if it takes me a year or ten years or a lifetime. I have now the opportunity and I shall use it."

Then came the idea of orchestral conducting, the dream of most musicians of personality and imagination, who think in terms of more than a single instrument.

Kussewitsky's methods were characteristic of himself and to the point. He began studying his scores. Then he would place empty chairs before him, in the positions occupied by players of the orchestra, raise his baton and, with score before him, go through a complete performance with his invisible band.

Again, he said, "I have time to learn these scores thoroughly before I conduct them. Most musicians don't. I shall take my time till I understand my music."

He hired the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to rehearse once a week with him, and after actual acquaintance with the practical problems of directing an orchestra, announced that he would give concerts.

Kussewitsky notified the foremost concert managers of Berlin, important and experienced gentlemen, ready to laugh at the wealthy amateur of the baton, of his intentions. He summoned the foremost concert manager of Berlin. "I want my concert well advertised," he said; "very well advertised. I want billboards on every corner."

"Very pretty, Mr. Kussewitsky," said the manager, "but who is going to read these billboards?"

"Who?" replied the prospective conductor, promptly. "I am going to read them.

"I am going to get up every morning at 8, tramp round the whole town and read word by word all my advertisements!"

The first concert was given in Berlin in 1907, when Kussewitsky made his initial appearance as conductor. At the same time Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, now in this country, made his first appearance in Berlin, with orchestra, playing his own concerto in C minor, under Kussewitsky's baton. The concert was an unqualified success, and Kussewitsky had fairly started on a great conductor's career.

His musical activities were not confined to conducting, nor to his personal interest. He helped innumerable Russian musicians, great and small, to come into their own. Both Scriabine and Gliere were indebted to Kussewitsky for material and artistic assistance.

Then came the institution of the music publishing society which Kussewitsky founded. This society, when it discovered a composer of talent, made with him arrangements which included putting the composer immediately on salary, also giving him a handsome royalty on the sale of his works.

Not only this: The publishing venture, for which certain ruin was, of course, predicted by reactionaries and rival interests—those who boasted of being "practical" men—flourished and later established important combinations with other leading Russian houses of the kind.

One of these was the house of Gutheil, which published many of Rachmaninoff's compositions. Kussewitsky bought of Gutheil the rights to the Rachmaninoff compositions which Gutheil had published. He took the contracts to Rachmaninoff.

"To my mind,'" he said, "these are very poor contracts. With your leave I shall tear them up." Suiting action to the word, he tore up the contracts in Rachmaninoff's presence, then gave that composer, who had sold his celebrated Prelude in C-sharp minor for the sum of $20, better terms than he had ever received.

Kussewitsky, a man of a generosity and idealism which dismissed precedent and disdained petty interests, made as a condition of music published by his firm that the composition must first pass muster by a board of some of the most distinguished musicians in Russia. This board, which embraced musicians of the most widely varying tendencies, included in its membership Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Medtner and Struve as judges.

Sergei Alexandrovitch Kussewitsky, at the beginning of his career (left and insert), as a player on the "bull-fiddle," and (right) as he is today. He is considered one of the most fiery and energetic of the great modern conductors. Kussewitsky has been retained by the trustees of the Symphony to be the next leader of that noted orchestra. (Photos by Bain News Service.)

OTHER SYMPHONY CONDUCTORS

Sergei Kussewitsky will be the 9th conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His predecessors have been the following:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Pierre Monteux and Henri Robaud	1918-1919

In the fall of 1918, Mr. Monteux conducted several concerts of the orchestra until Mr. Rabaud arrived here from Paris to take the position for which he had been belatedly engaged, and in the fall of 1919, Mr. Monteux was appointed conductor the position he will hold until the end of the season of 1923-24, next May.

Kussewitsky himself composes, and it was predicted, not unnaturally, that the new publishing house would regularly issue his compositions. On the contrary, he never submitted a single one of his compositions for consideration, and rigorously kept away as a composer from the institution which could so easily have furthered his success in this field.

In 1909 came the extraordinary concerts given in a four months' tour at the cities that border on the Volga River.

For this purpose, Kussewitsky secured a large boat, with a raised concert platform in the stern. He took with him 75 selected orchestra players and at each landing they gave performances. The concerts were so successful that they became a yearly institution until the outbreak of the World war.

During the war, intensely patriotic so far as the success of the Russian cause was concerned, Kussewitsky nevertheless drew a clear and complete distinction between art and fighting. Hearing suggestions that German music should be disbarred from performances in Russia, he promptly organized concerts of the music of Beethoven and Wagner.

In his musical tastes, Kussewitsky has always been extremely broad. Music of all countries appeals to him. It is said today that his firm has not only exclusive rights to the compositions of the Russian Strawinsky, but also to the later works of the Frenchman, Maurice Ravel. No nation, no period or style of worthwhile musical compositions has escaped the curiosity and the sympathetic interpretation of this musician.

Hans Ebell, the Russian pianist of this city, speaks of Kussewitsky in the highest terms. "I cannot imagine a conductor better fitted," he said. "by experience and temperament for the position of leader of the Boston Symphony. Kussewitsky is a man of a most striking musical personality, with strong convictions of his own, and a manner native to him of impressing his convictions powerfully on those who follow his baton. As an artist he is afraid of nothing. He is always eager to understand and to reveal to his audiences the qualities of music, no matter how strange or revolutionary its content. At the same time he has profound admiration for the great classics."

Alexander Steinert, the young Boston composer, has heard Kussewitsky conduct in Paris. He describes him as a highly dramatic interpreter whose personal force and imagination are felt the instant he appears.

As Seen by Mr. Steinert

Mr. Steinert's impression of Kussevitzky as conductor are borne out by the account of Mr. Wortham, of the London Morning Post, o one of his concerts in Queen's Hall.

"Queen's Hall at eight o'clock. For once in a way the stalls and grand circle are the best filled parts of the house. That tightly wedged ring of humanity in the upper circle which usually marks a 'gala night' is absent. The many are not interested in conductors. A pianist is their god. All sorts of distinguished persons below make up for this apathy. Three, four noted conductors, many composers, and virtuosi season an audience that has a strong Russian tinge.

"The orchestra are in their seats. A minute elapses, in which latecomers wrestle with refractory coats and tread on your toes without so much as a word of apology. Then you ar aware that a man of middle height and ag with a deliberate and slightly stooping walk is making his way past the desks of the firs violins to the conductor's platform. He mount it leisurely, and acknowledges with grave bow the plaudits of audience and orchestra. You notice the strongly marked features, the straight hair of the Slav, now turning slightly gray, the well-knit but unathletic figure. A sedate and reserved man, you would say, with nothing in his dress or appearance, except, perhaps, the expression about the eyes, which business men do not have, to show the artist and the musician.

"The clapping ceases. He looks round the orchestra, then slowly lifts up his stick, lightly poised between his forefinger and thumb. Some conductors, like speakers who clear their throats to give themselves courage, rap the desk. Kussevitzky seems to think this to much trouble. At this moment of silence, whe he is ready to loose more thunders than Jove ever had in his armory, he stands without an attitude to indicate the fires that are ready to burst forth. Mr. Coates on such occasions is Michael-Angelesque. Not so Kussevitzky; he is quiet and subdued, giving the impression of a musical Bonar Law, occupying a position o responsibility against his own predilection. You know he is a Russian and therefore has imponderable qualities. But a Russian in a white tie and a tailcoat is much like anybody else—a mere man with a tailor.

The Incarnation of Energy

"Then suddenly the transformation come as he plunges into the seething unrest o Chaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini'. The rea Kussevitzky has emerged from its corporea case, and becomes an elemental force inspiring the will of every one of the hundred or so musicians who are known collectively as the London Symphony Orchestra or rather stands there, the incarnation of forceful energ urging, driving, encouraging, and arguing w every muscle of his body and every line his face. His gestures are extraordinary. one moment he will lift his upturned pal in a pose that is Hellenic in everything exce its passion; at another with a sweeping moti of the shoulders he will raise his arms hi above his head for some great climax. N that he is all Sturm und Drang. But eve when flute and clarinet are engaged in so tranquil conversation, and the rest of the o chestra is acting up to the precept that 'seul silence est grand,' that concentrated streng of will which has raised Kussevitzky to em nence amongst conductors is always there.

"Thus it was that he breathed a new n of tragedy into the wild passages of strings, and made rather a second-rate mu pulsate with a new passion, until at the e he had widened the sum of our experien and made even those who do not read Da or sympathise, as a rule, with Chaikovsk realize more clearly the grandeur of hu despair. Before the audience had had time free itself from the grip of this tour-de-fo but not before Kussevitzky had relapsed a bland passivity, and was mopping his b to reassure us of his common humanity, a lady behind me, with a touch that Mr. Shaw would have envied, remarked sweetly to her companion, 'What an amazing contortionist!'"

Appointment Marks New Era

There is another reason why the appointment of Kussevitsky as leader of the Boston Symphony is welcome to music lovers of this city. His coming marks the end of a period in which the musical destines of the orchestra were dominated first by Germans, and then the French.

the Hungarian Nikisch, all the Symphony conductors were German. Since the war they have been French. It is even stated, in reliable quarters, that Paris had much to do in 1919 with stopping negotiations begun with a view of bringing the great Italian, Arturo Toscanini, to Symphony Hall. It was intimated from Paris, it seems, that it would be a shame to injure by ever so little the "cordiale entente" between France and America through bringing an Italian to lead the celebrated orchestra.

It is true that the Frenchmen, Rabaud and Monteux, have shown themselves as musicians and men infinitely broader in their point of view, infinitely less chauvinistic, than [illegible] it is time that no nation [illegible] color, musical affairs at Symph[illegible] in native breadth of view, enthu[illegible] receptivity to new ideas, from wherever they spring, the Russian is most like the American.

There are not lacking good grounds for the belief that artistically he is the man of the future, while European nations tend far more to the spirit of the past. In a period when Russian art of every kind, Russian literature, drama, painting, dancing are coming into their own here by strides and leaps, a musician of Mr. Kussevitsky's nationality and personal powers should find a particularly sympathetic public and prove at least a leader of striking characteristics and excitements.

POST - SEPT. 16

SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux has just sailed from France and immediately upon his arrival in Boston will start rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season on Oct. 12th.

A new violin virtuoso from Russia, Paul Cherkassky, has arrived in Boston to be one of the first violins, and his engagement will be the only change from last year in the string section of the orchestra. Paul Cherkassky succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster of the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra in Finland and has held that post until his Boston engagement. Born in Odessa in 1891, he graduated from Petrograd Conservatory, has toured as soloist in a number of cities, conducted opera in Saratoff and Helsingfors. Sibelius has dedicated to him six impromptus for the violin. Mr. Cherkassky is the cousin of Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist, who is soon to play here.

The soloists for the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall will include, as singers, Sigrid Onegin, Elisabeth Rethberg, Eva Gauthier, Marya Freund, Vera Janacopulos, and Roland Hayes. The pianist are to be Moriz Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Mitja Nikisch, and E. Robert Schmitz. Pablo Casals, the 'cellist, and Lionel Tertis, the English master of the viola, will also appear; and, as violinists, Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch.

POST. SEPT. 23

SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux has just sailed from France and immediately upon his arrival in Boston, will start rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season on Oct. 12.

A new violin virtuoso from Russia, Paul Cherkassky, has arrived in Boston to be one of the first violins, and his engagement will be the only change from last year in the string section of the orchestra. Paul Cherkassky succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster of the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra in Finland and has held that post until his Boston engagement. Born in Odessa in 1891, he graduated from Petrograd Conservatory, has toured as soloist in a number of cities and conducted opera in Saratoff and Helsingfors. Sibelius has dedicated to him six impromptus for the violin. Mr. Cherkassky is the cousin of Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist, who is soon to play here.

The soloists for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts, at Symphony hall, include as singers Sigrid Onegin, Elisabeth Rethberg, Eva Gauthier, Marya Freund, Vera Janacopulos, and Roland Hayes. The pianists are to be Moriz Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Mitja Nikisch and E. Robert Schmitz. Pablo Casals, the 'cellist, and Lionel Tertis, the English master of the viola, will also appear; and, as violinists, Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch.

HERALD. SEPT. 23

Monteux Coming for Symphony Season

PIERRE MONTEUX has sailed from France and will soon be in Boston to start rehearsals for the opening of the Symphony season on October 12.

A new violin virtuoso from Russia, Paul Cherkassky, has arrived in Boston to be one of the first violins. This will be the only change from last year in the string section of the orchestra. Cherkassky succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster of the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra and has held that post until now. He is a cousin of Shura Cherkassky, the boy pianist, who is soon to play here.

The soloists for the coming Symphony season will include Sigrid Onegin, Elisabeth Rethberg, Eva Gauthier, Marya Freund, Vera Janacopulos, Roland Hayes, Moriz Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Mitja Nikisch, E. Robert Schmitz, Pablo Casals, Lionel Tertis, Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch.

NITJA NIKISCH, pi[illegible] one of the soloists [illegible]gaged for the coming [illegible]phony season.

ADVTSR. SEPT. 23.

A sensitive and practised amateur of symphonic music heard Mr. Kusevitzky conduct in Paris last spring through a concert including Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival;" Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony;" a rearranged fragment of Stravinsky's opera, "The Nightingale;" and Musorgsky's "Picture-Show" as lately scored for orchestra by Ravel. The amateur recalls his impressions as follows:

Berlioz's overture was played with all the freshness and spirit of a composition just off the press, a buoyancy and life that were cheering. And we who love Schubert were delighted that the conductor played Schubert, not himself, and this does not mean that he was afraid to make Schubert joyous, clear and free of pedantry. It was as though Schubert were siging today. Kusevitzky had regard for detail without destroying the symmetrical balance of the whole. We had heard Stravinsky's "Rossignol" in London before the war and found it again mildly interesting, but the Musorgsky number in Ravel's arrangement sounded most important—under Kusevitzky's baton.

Mr. Monteux took ship last Saturday on his way from Paris to New York and is expected in Boston at the end of the current week. Before long, he will make known the novel numbers with which he is likely to sprinkle his programmes in the free hand of a final year. Among them should surely be Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of the Spring" as tone-poem. Even the Philharmonic Society of New York is risking it.

TRANS. SEPT. 24.

ROLAND HAYES, COLORED SINGER, FIRST OF RACE TO SING IN SYMPHONY

For the first time a colored singer is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Roland Hayes, a Boston boy, has won his way to honor by this distinguished organization which extends engagements only to those artists who have "arrived."

And his mother was a slave.

Today she tells for the Sunday Post the story of her son's rise to fame, in which she makes light of her struggle against adversity that Roland might bring honor to the race.

By Olin Downes

They say that every man's life has material for at least one good book. There is certainly a drama in the career of the colored tenor singer, Roland Hayes.

He returns in a few days to this city from his third and most successful European tour to new honors.

Roland Hayes, Boston Tenor, who sang before Royalty. (C) Bachrach

He has sung, not only Negro folk-songs, but classics of Schumann, Brahms, Wolf and other masters, before immense and distinguished audiences in many countries, including an appearance by royal command before the English King and Queen.

His first appearance here will be as soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a distinction never before achieved by a colored musician.

When Hayes reaches Boston he will hurry to the home of his mother, Fanny Hayes, who, much against the wishes of the son, takes in washing and ironing at her house on Arnold street, owns through her own labor a 10-acre lot in Georgia, fears only God, and remembers well the brutal beatings given her by her master when she was a slave.

Doesn't Want to Loaf

"I'm helping him," she said to her visitor, "that's what I'm doing right here. I don't want to loaf and I'm ready any day the Lord calls me.

"If I went over there with him, same's he wants me, I should be idle and no happier than I am right here."

The Mother's Message

And when her son wrote her of the royal "command" to appear at Buckingham Palace, Fanny Hayes replied, "Remember where you are and where you came from and give credit where it belongs."

She stopped her ironing to show some new photographs of Roland whom she calls "Rollin'" and a picture of a bust just done of him by a sculptress in Dublin.

"The only thing, I don't want him to worry," she said. "He's always asking about my health. My health's all right. I haven't been feeling so awful good lately, but I'm not going to doctors about it, though I do laundry for several of them.

"The only thing the trouble with my health is old age, and I haven't heard yet of any cure for that. I've passed the 'three score and ten' the Good Book says is man's life-time, and I'm going to get every day and hour that is intended for me. I'm not worrying and I don't want him to.

Wants Him to Marry

"I do wish Roland would get married. When a man's young and successful he's popular, and if he's popular he's going to have temptations. The Lord says to increase and multiply. When I said that to Roland he said he thought the Lord intended him to remain single and do his work.

"Reckon he was fooling. Don't know, though. Anyway, his life's his own. Everybody's life is meant just especially for them, and they've got to live it.

"Of course, the good Lord made us women just especially worried about our own particular children. I've lost five, and don't see why they should go and me stay as long as I have. But that's the Plan. The more I see Roland getting along, the more pleased I'll be.

"But if he'll just believe half as much as I do, I won't have one mortal worry when I go."

She stood erect. Her eyes flashed and glistened.

That is the mother of Roland Hayes.

Early Days

Roland and his brother Robert, who also lives in Boston today, went to school three or four months in a year, between harvesting and planting time, in Curryville, Ga.

That was their birthplace. At Chattanooga they alternated in studying and working, one working a year and earning money, while the other studied, then turn about, as is the manner of fair play.

Robert remembers that at school Roland, when called on to get up and speak his piece, used to get so nervous beforehand that he would put his head down on his desk and cry.

"And it was the same thing at Sunday school," said his sister-in-law, Margaret Hayes. "It's funny to think of, isn't it? Roland stands up now to any audience without a quiver, but in those days I guess you'd have said he could never hope to stand up to an audience anywhere."

At the Chattanooga school a certain number of the pupils were trained each year to sing. The brother of one of the teachers was Arthur Calhoun of Oberlin Conservatory. Roland accepted his offer to teach him singing with a degree of indifference, but—he began to sing.

Foreman in Foundry

He became foreman in an iron foundry, read at night school and continued his singing lessons. After nine months had gone by he became "aroused," to use his own word, about singing.

With $50 in his pocket he set out for Oberlin, planning to pay his way by singing. In Nashua every concert he gave was a flat failure. His $50 was gone, but meanwhile he had learned about Fiske University in Nashua. He presented himself there, sang "Beyond the Gates of Paradise," a song he now sings as an encore after practically all of his programmes, to the woman who questioned him there, and was given a month's probation as a student, to find out whether he was serious, at the university.

No one showed any particular interest or favoritism, but he was given his chance. He waited on table for board and lodging and sang whenever the university required it, in return for tuition in literature and music. He was accepted as a student and remained at Fiske four years. Then he went to Louisville, where he became a waiter at a rich man's club, and was heard there by H. H. Putnam of Boston.

A band of Fiske University singers brought Hayes to Boston with them to take part in a spectacle, "The World in Boston," given in Mechanics Hall in 1911. When the other singers left Boston Hayes remained.

An audution was arranged for him, when he sang before Arthur Foote, Morris Parker and Arthur Hubbard.

After this test Mr. Putnam told Hayes that he would pay for his singing lessons.

Symphony Hall Debut

Hayes became a pupil of Arthur Hubbard, and worked at the Republican Club as a messenger while studying. He gained employment in the office of the late D. H. Sutherland and brought his mother from the South the next year. It was while he was technically on leave of absence as messenger from Sutherland's office that he gave his first concert, attended by 900 of the officers and clerks of his company, in Symphony Hall, Nov. 15, 1917.

"I cannot tell to save my life," Mr. Hayes has said, describing that event, "how I felt that night. The only thing I remember is that as the usher opened the door to me and I saw that vast audience, the stage absolutely jammed, aisles, everything, and I was told 500 people were turned away—I felt like nothing.

"I didn't realize the effect of anything I did. I was so enveloped, taken away with the magnitude of the whole thing that when I saw the reports the next day in the papers I could hardly believe them to be true, for I felt I had actually failed, miserably.

"I have never forgotten. That was my first real shove-off. From that time things have gone very, very well. It might be called the end of the first epoch."

First European Tour

Nevertheless, it was not wholly smooth running.

In 1920 Hayes went to Europe. At first in London, he had poor luck. The critics had not expected serious things of a colored singer and it was a time before they would take him as an artist of substantial aims. Hayes had invested all his available funds in his trip and his concerts. He faced not only failure but absolute need.

Everything depended on the success of a last concert for which he had engaged Wigmore Hall.

On this he had wagered everything, even shortening his food supply and giving up every luxury, and mortally in fear of a deficit when the concert was over. As a final blow, there was a coal shortage—a matter which New Englanders will understand—because the Welsh coal miners, and city authorities had ordered that public halls should be closed. What would become of Hayes' concert?

He was sitting brooding over all this in his hotel room, fairly sick with physical strain and worry, when the telephone rang. He feared he was being dunned, but picked up the receiver. It was a summons, a "command" to sing for the King and Queen.

This put heart into the singer. To add to this encouragement, Lloyd George succeeded in ending the coal miners' strike, so that the concert took place as per schedule in Wigmore Hall. That night Hayes finally persuaded the London critics of his worth and his musical position was well secured in the capital, although at that time no one knew of the command to sing to royalty.

Arriving at Buckingham Palace, where he was to appear for exactly 30 minutes before the King and Queen, Mr. Hayes and his accompanist, a colored boy named Lawrence Brown, had an amusing experience in being instructed, according to the official custom and precaution, in their behavior before the royal pair. Questions were to be answered, "Yes, Your Majesty," and "No, Your Majesty," and "Would it please Your Majesty," and when Majecty entered they were to bow as low as possible from the waist down, "like the English soldiers."

At 5:30 to the minute Their Majesties were announced. Hayes and company began bowing like mad. What did the British monarch do? He glanced at them in a worried manner and said: "That isn't necessary!"

The half hour went into two hours. Hayes says that the King seemed more interested in what he had to say in conversation than in his singing! He told the King then, as he has told it since to others, of his desire to express the serious music and illustrate the creative genius of his race in the musical art.

At Home

"When Roland comes back to Boston," said his sister-in-law, Mrs. Robert Hayes, "he'll come in here the same old way, just like brother and sister. If I'm washing dishes he'll get a towel and wipe them. If I've to go down cellar for coal he'll grab the bucket himself. If I try to get him up a good meal he'll get mad and say, 'Sis,'—I call him 'Buddy' and he calls me 'Sis'—'if you make one mite of fuss about me, I'll be going.'

"And he'll mean it. He won't do all that for show. And if he goes to the cupboard to get a glass to fill with water he'll likely as not take a jelly glass instead of one of the fine glasses he'll say, 'Jelly glass is just as good, isnt it?'

"That's Roland. Reason we're so proud of him isn't just his singing. It's the fact that he's never got a swelled head. A little success is hard to stand, you know, especially with a fellow like him who hasn't had many advantages growing up. But Roland's got a head on him, and—well, you better go over and talk to Roland's mother."

POST SEPT 23

Does Monteux Fear Radicals in Music?

Will Mr. Monteux allow Mr. Kussewitsky to take from him the reclame—laudatory or condemnatory as it may be—of producing for the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts the very "ultra" music of Strawinsky's "Sacre de printemps" and the still more ultra score of the same composer's ballet, "Noces," given last summer by the Ballet Russe at the Gaite Lyrique in Paris?

For seasons Mr. Monteux has hesitated about the score of "Sacre de printemps" (Rites of Spring). He conducted the premiere of this work at Paris, where it raised a riot between conservatives and radicals in the theatre. Perhaps Mr. Monteux, remembering the hisses of outraged Bostonians at the time of the Fradkin episode in Symphony Hall, fears a still more outraged expression when the music of "Sacre de printemps" falls upon their ears. But it is well that there should be hot discussion and disagreement in matters of art, and we in Boston are far behind the times as concerns this music.

As for "Noces," the "scenario of the ballet depicts in symbolic style a Russian marriage ceremony, the dressing of the hair of the bride, the benediction of the bridegroom, the adieux of the girl to her home and the marriage supper . . . The revolutionary composer has scored his work for a group of pianos, a battery of kettle-drums, xylophone, rattle, tympani, tambourine, triangle and a metal tube, to which are added a chorus and vocal soloists." At the Paris performance Mr. Ansermet, who conducted for the first season of the Ballet Russe in this country, led an orchestra which included as principal performers a number of "ultra" composers. Among them was Georges Auric, of the Satie "Groupe des Sixes." Was Satie present? He would have laughed in reminiscence of the outcries of the orthodox when Debussy and Ravel made known to the public the composer of the "Gymopedies."

POST SEPT 23

[126]

GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last accepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already re-established their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussevitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opéra, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became a professor of Moscow Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N.Y. TIMES SEPT. 10.

Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in 1874, was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra of the Municipal Theatre in his native town. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory where he studied the double bass, which he played in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra. In 1909 he organized an orchestra in Moscow and travelled over Russia with it. After the revolution he was made conductor of the Russian State Orchestra and in 1920 conducted in Paris and London, and also opera at the Grand Opéra in Paris.

N.Y. EV. POST. SEPT. 10

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT IN BOSTON.

He Will Be First Russian to Lead Symphony Orchestra There—Begins Next Year.

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924, so announced Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the organization to-day.

Mr. Koussevitzky, long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, has, in the last three years, become the dominant figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the only great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, who, at the end of the pending season, will have conducted the Boston Symphony Or-

N.Y. WORLD. SEPT. 10

Koussevitzky First Russian To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day that Serge Koussevitzky had been engaged as conductor for the season beginning with the fall of 1924. He will succeed Pierre Monteux and will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in northern Russia) in 1874. He was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, where he made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra.

N.Y. TRIBUNE SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky Engaged for Autumn of 1924.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. HERALD. SEPT. 10.

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. EV. SUN. SEPT. 10.

[127]

BOSTON
MASS.
~~EVENING~~ GLOBE
SEP 19 1923

...ired an apartment at the capital.

Have you advanced so that you can pronounce and spell the name of Sergei Koussevitzky, appointed conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in 1924?

PHILADELPHIA
PA.
RECORD
SEP 23 1923

—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924. Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

—Public lecture-recitals will be given by C. Ferdinand Jackson, assisted by Helen Hunt Jackson, at No. 1708 Chestnut street each Tuesday and Friday evening. The lectures will include exposition of the schools of bel-canto, Porpora, Manuel Garcia and of the present day. No cards are required for admission.

BOSTON
MASS.
~~EVENING~~ GLOBE
23 1923

"By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers, who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski, to name but two recent stars of the baton."

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
P 23 1923

Boston Symphony Starts Oct. 12

The Boston Symphony starts its regular series of Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts in Boston, Oct. 12 and 13. This is the orchestra's 43rd year. The soloists engaged for the season number Sigrid Onegin, Eva Gauthier, Elisabeth Rothberg, Marya Freund, Vera Janacopulos and Roland Hayes, for singers. For instrumentalists there will be Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikish, Harold Bauer, Robert Schmitz, Paplo Casals, Jacques Thibaud, Carl Fresch and Lionel Tertis.

OPENING SYMPHONY

The season of regular Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will open a week from next Friday and Saturday, (Oct. 12 and 13). Pierre Monteux is expected to arrive from Europe Monday and will start rehearsals for the opening.

TRAV. SEPT. 29.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux will arrive from Europe on the Paris tomorrow morning and later in the week will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the opening of the symphony season in Symphony Hall a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 and 13. The opening programme will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, "La Peri," by Eukas, and Solome's Dance from Richard Strauss' opera, "Salome."

POST. SEPT. 30.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought with him from Europe many new scores of interest from which a number will be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra. Other scores to be featured on the programs of the season are Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the First Spmphony of Maher, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica".

The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. The opening program will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" of Dukas, and the dances from Richard Strauss's opera, "Salome."

TRAV. OCT. 10

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Pierre Monteux will arrive from Europe tomorrow and assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal later in the week. The opening Symphony concerts will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Bethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Variation on a Theme, by Haydn," Dukas' "La Peri" and the Dances from Richard Strauss' opera "Salome."

This season will be the fifth and last under Mr. Monteux's leadership. Among the soloists engaged are Sigrid Onegin, Eva Gauthier, Roland Hayes, Moriz Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Mitja Nikisch, E. Robert Schmitz, Pablo Casals and Jacques Thibaud.

October 8 the Russian dance star will open her American tour. On October 29 Pavlowa and her Ballet Russe will come to the Boston Opera House for eight performances, the repertoire to include her most popular ballets and divertissements.

JACQUES THIBAUD, French violinist, to appear as Symphony soloist.

ADVTSR. SEPT. 30.

Symphony Rush Seats

The recent advertisements of the coming Boston Symphony season announce the price of admission to the rush seats in the second balcony for Friday afternoons as 50 cents instead of a quarter. The hundreds of people who wait patiently on the Huntington av steps of Symphony Hall every Friday of the season will no doubt regret the increase, which to not a few of them represents a real hardship.

The trustees and the management of the orchestra are, of course, more than justified in asking a higher price. They could easily sell everyone of the 505 seats now unreserved for the entire season at a price much greater than $12. Last May but 200 seats for Friday were available for new subscribers and these were absorbed by persons who had applied for them far in advance and gotten their names on a waiting list.

The Symphony Orchestra is not, has never been, and in the nature of things can never be a money-making organization. There has been a deficit of thousands of dollars in every one of the 41 seasons. This deficit has always been met by the generosity of a very few wealthy and public spirited citizens.

The late Maj Higginson, who for 36 years bore most of the burden, spent over a million on the Symphony. His successors, the present trustees and guarantors, have in a single season paid out of their own pockets $130,000. It is a standing reproach to the civic spirit of Boston that the burden of founding and sustaining our great orchestra has been left to so few people.

If, therefore, even the many among the "Symphony Line," to whom a quarter is a sum to be spent only after anxious consideration of ways and means, are now asked to contribute more largely, the request cannot be held unwarranted or unfair by any thinking person.

It seems to the present writer, who remembers five seasons as a needy student not so many years ago, when he could spent but $5 a month on what the budgets call "incidentals," (which include most of the things that make life worth living), that the management might have been more generous to the occupants of the "rush seats." A quarter apiece, $251.25 per concert, is not a great item in the annual accounts, though the aggregate for 24 concerts is a considerable sum, even to the management of a Symphony Orchestra. But the writer knows from his own experience the petty deprivations the increase in price will cause among some of those transient occupants of second balcony seats whom it is true as well as trite to call "the real music lovers."

An Educational Institution

But what about the people who come and sit on the steps in their fur coats, and imported ulsters? Many in the line are too well dressed for a quarter to mean all that to them. So run some of the objections sure to be raised to any appeal for the occupants of the rush seats. It is true that not all, perhaps not half the people in the line on Fridays, are really impecunious. It is also quite certain that almost none of them wish, whatever their needs, to be held as objects of charity.

Maj Higginson once said in a public speech that when he har found the financial burden of the orchestra almost more than he could bear, and when he felt that the concerts were not always appreciated by the audience as purely musical events, he would think of the people in the second balcony, to many of whom, as their faces showed during the concerts, their Friday afternoons were the deepest and highest pleasure their lives afforded, and go on with the battle.

He had founded the orchestra because on the whole he cared more about music than about anything else in life. He [illegible] to be a com- [illegible] studied abroad in his [illegible] but saw that he lacked creative genius. Perhaps he felt that the proportion of genuine musical enthusiasts in the second balcony was higher than elsewhere in the audience.

The rush seats certainly train up devotees of orchestral music, many of whom later on buy season tickets. The orchestra is and has been the greatest musical educational institution in America. Might it not be good civic economy to keep the price at the purely nominal figure of 25 cents for these 505 seats to make certain that nobody who really wants to come is kept away because of the price of admission? This would be generosity, not justice. On business principles it is nonsense. But then, on business principles is it not also nonsense to spend money on so hopelessly unprofitable an institution as the Symphony?

Another point: the people in rush seats are being asked a percentage of increase much greater than that demanded a few seasons ago from the regular subscribers. The $15 seats then went to $18, and so on. For this discrepancy there is no obvious reason.

Rush Seats Saturdays?

From the point of view of the management it would seem better to offer the rush seats at the series of concerts for which there is the least public demand. Now that is always the Saturday evening series. The reason Friday was originally chosen was that the Friday concert was at first in fact a public rehearsal; and always so called for many years after it had become distinguished from the Saturday concert solely by the greater size and the reputed greater social distinction of the Friday audience downstairs.

If something was to be done about the rush seats, why not have arranged matters so as to offer them Saturday night instead of Friday afternoon? It is of course only possible to do this at the time when subscription books have not been opened. It would, equally of course, be highly desirable from the point of view of people interested in securing a wider public for the Symphony and for the best in music, to offer rush seats at both series.

The great advantage from a public point of view in offering seats Saturday unreserved would be that on that evening men would be free to attend.

On Friday most men are either in college classes or at work at hours which make it very difficult for them to attend. The writer when in college refused to take any course that came at hours which conflicted with the rush seats for the Symphony, something possible only under a complete elective system.

The management doubtless assumes that few men want to go to Symphony concerts. Personal knowledge of students in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, gained as an instructor there, has convinced the writer of something of which he was hitherto also sceptical. There are really a good many young men not musicians or students of music; and not "highbrow" about anything to all appearances; who will go to and enjoy Symphony concerts, opera, and so on, without or with their feminine acquaintances.

They don't gush about it, these masculine attendants at concerts. But they take the music seriously and try to get what they can out of it without posing as aspirants for "Culture." This is the most encouraging symptom for the musical future of America the writer has yet found anywhere; this appearance of many young men at concert after concert without ulterior motives.

Now, to buy a whole Symphony ticket, is rather beyond the means of most young men not fanatics about music. But to give up many evenings to it at the price of a quarter plus a long wait is for many young men a perfectly possible form of entertainment, provided nobody accuses them of doing it for effect. Saturday night rush seats at the Symphony would be even better missionary work than the Friday ones have been.—"If I were a Trustee."

GLOBE. SEPT. 30

One more departure from old custom is announced for the impending series of Symphony Concerts. Since the beginnings of the eighties, the price of unreserved seats in the upper balcony on Friday afternoons has stood at twenty-five cents. Now, and for the future, it has been doubled. Well worth fifty cents are the concerts and well able to pay that sum are many frequenters of this gallery. Often it is a costly "soloist" that brings them thither.

As usual the Symphony Orchestra will go to Cambridge for nine concerts on Thursday evenings in Sanders Theatre. Mr. Monteux will conduct through the series and the band will be as large as the stage permits. The concerts and the "assisting artists" are listed as follows:

Oct. 18—Kathryn Meisle, mezzo-soprano.
Nov. 15—Roland Hayes, tenor.
Dec. 6—Harold Bauer, pianist.
Jan. 10—Robert Schmitz, pianist.
Feb. 7—Jean Bedetti, violoncellist.
Feb. 28—Vera Janacopulos, soprano.
March 20—Carl Flesch, violinist.
April 10—Constance McGlinchee, pianist.
May 1—Closing programme.

Of these singers and virtuosi all but Miss Meisle and Miss McGlinchee will be heard also at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. The two exceptions are young women of promise and performance; while Mr. Bedetti—almost needless to say—is the master-violoncellist of the orchestra. Present subscribers may renew their subscriptions through Saturday, Oct. 6; new subscribers will have their turn from Oct. 18; both at the University Book Store.

The good word comes that [illegible] the pianist, long unheard in Boston outside the Symphony Concerts, will play in a recital of his own at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 20. His ripened abilities speak for themselves. He has also [illegible] the habit of catholic programmes. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, though conductor now of an orchestra—in St. Louis—he does not [illegible] put by his other career.

TRANS. OCT. [illegible]

SYMPHONY GETS KUSSEVITZKY

Russia's Most Famous Orchestra Director Engaged to Succeed Monteux Next Spring.

Compatriot of Chaliapin, some of whose early adventures he shared, and himself unique as a bass viol virtuoso before he became Russia's most celebrated orchestra director, Serge Kussevitzky has at last accepted a contract to come to America. Judge Frederick P. Cabot announced from Boston yesterday the engagement of Mr. Kussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season beginning in 1924. Unlike many such long-distance negotiations, this was the first intimation in Kussevitzky's case to reach those who will be among his future audiences both in New England and New York.

Pierre Monteux, due this month from France, will complete with the coming season a full term of five years in Boston. His family have already re-established their home in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them next Spring.

Serge Kussevitzky, who directly succeeds him then, will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Orchestra, and, as Manager W. H. Brennan believes, the only great European conductor whose performances as yet Americans have not heard, save on tours abroad.

Kussevitzky, long conspicuous in Russia, has since the war been active in Western Europe. His engagements this Winter will begin in Berlin and Prague, then a series at the Paris Opéra, where he directs "Pique Dame," "Prince Igor," "Boris Godunov" and "Khovantchina," and finally an orchestra tour of England and Scotland.

Born June 30, 1874, at Vyshny-Volotchok, Province of Tver, Russia, he went as a musical prodigy to Moscow Conservatory where, the only free scholarship then open being one for double-bass, he accepted it and made both the instrument and himself famous.

He played in the Imperial Opera, became a professor of Moscow Conservatory in 1900, and later, at Berlin, founded the Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. He also gave the first symphony concerts heard in many towns to which he sailed with his orchestra on the Volga River.

N.Y. TIMES SEPT. 10.

Koussevitzky to Lead Boston Symphony

First Russian to Conduct That Orchestra—To Come Next Season

Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1924. Monteux will return from Paris the latter part of this month for his fifth and last season with the orchestra, bringing with him a number of new scores, and will begin at once rehearsals for the opening concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 12.

Koussevitzky, who is the first Russian to lead this orchestra, has been active in western Europe the last three seasons. He was born in Tver in 1874, was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra of the Municipal Theatre in his native town. Then he attended the Moscow Conservatory, where he studied the double bass, which he played in the Moscow Imperial Orchestra. In 1909 he organized an orchestra in Moscow and travelled over Russia with it. After the revolution he was made conductor of the Russian State Orchestra and in 1920 conducted in Paris and London, and also opera at the Grand Opéra in Paris.

N.Y. EV. POST. SEPT. 10

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT IN BOSTON.

He Will Be First Russian to Lead Symphony Orchestra There—Begins Next Year.

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924, so announced Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the organization to-day.

Mr. Koussevitzky, long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, has, in the last three years, become the dominant figure in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the only great conductor whom America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, who, at the end of the pending season, will have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra

N.Y. WORLD. SEPT. 10

Koussevitzky First Russian To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Sept. 9.—Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced to-day that Serge Koussevitzky had been engaged as conductor for the season beginning with the fall of 1924. He will succeed Pierre Monteux and will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in northern Russia) in 1874. He was taught music by his parents, and at the age of twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, where he made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra.

N.Y. TRIBUNE SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN WILL LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky Engaged for Autumn of 1924.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. HERALD. SEPT. 10

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, beginning with the autum of 1924. Mr. Koussevitzky, who has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe, will be the first Russian to lead this orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteux, whose coming season as conductor will be his fifth.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores. He will immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and toured Europe.

He organized an orchestra in Berlin and in 1909 a more important one in Moscow. He gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, and he was appointed conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, which superseded the Imperial Orchestra.

In 1920 he went westward, and became an important figure in orchestral concerts in Paris and London. He was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

N.Y. EV. SUN. SEPT. 10.

BOSTON
MASS.
~~EVENING~~ GLOBE
SEP 19 1923

hired an apartment at the capital.

Have you advanced so that you can pronounce and spell the name of Sergei Koussevitzky, appointed conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to succeed Pierre Monteux in 1924?

PHILADELPHIA
PA.
RECORD
SEP 23 1923

—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the autumn of 1924. Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in Western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

—Public lecture recitals will be given by C. Ferdinand Jackson, assisted by Helen Hunt Jackson, at No. 1708 Chestnut street each Tuesday and Friday evening. The lectures will include exposition of the schools of bel-canto, Porpora, Manuel Garcia and of the present day. No cards are required for admission.

BOSTON
MASS.
~~EVENING~~ GLOBE
23 1923

"By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest-conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers, who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski, to name but two recent stars of the baton."

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 23 1923

Boston Symphony Starts Oct. 12

The Boston Symphony starts its regular series of Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts in Boston, Oct. 12 and 13. This is the orchestra's 43rd year. The soloists engaged for the season number Sigrid Onegin, Eva Gauthier, Elisabeth Rothberg, Marya Freund, Vera Janacopulos and Roland Hayes, for singers. For instrumentalists there will be Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikish, Harold Bauer, Robert Schmitz, Paplo Casals, Jacques Thibaud, Carl Fresch and Lionel Tertis.

OPENING SYMPHONY

The season of regular Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will open a week from next Friday and Saturday, (Oct. 12 and 13). Pierre Monteaux is expected to arrive from Europe Monday and will start rehearsals for the opening.

TRAV. SEPT. 29.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux will arrive from Europe on the Paris tomorrow morning and later in the week will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the opening of the symphony season in Symphony Hall a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 and 13. The opening programme will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, "La Peri," by Eukas, and Solome's Dance from Richard Strauss' opera, "Salome."

POST. SEPT. 30.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has brought with him from Europe many new scores of interest from which a number will be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra. Other scores to be featured on the programs of the season are Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the First Symphony of Maher, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica".

The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. The opening program will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" of Dukas, and the dances from Richard Strauss's opera, "Salome."

TRAV. OCT. 10

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Pierre Monteux will arrive from Europe tomorrow and assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal later in the week. The opening Symphony concerts will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will include Bethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Variation on a Theme, by Haydn," Dukas' "La Peri" and the Dances from Richard Strauss' opera "Salome."

This season will be the fifth and last under Mr. Monteux's leadership. Among the soloists engaged are Sigrid Onegin, Eva Gauthier, Roland Hayes, Moriz Rosenthal, Harold Bauer, Mitja Nikisch, E. Robert Schmitz, Pablo Casals and Jacques Thibaud.

October 8 the Russian dance star will open her American tour. On October 29 Pavlowa and her Ballet Russe will come to the Boston Opera House for eight performances, the repertoire to include her most popular ballets and divertissements.

JACQUES THIBAUD, French violinist, to appear as Symphony soloist.

ADVER. SEPT. 30.

Symphony Rush Seats

The recent advertisements of the coming Boston Symphony season announce the price of admission to the rush seats in the second balcony for Friday afternoons as 50 cents instead of a quarter. The hundreds of people who wait patiently on the Huntington av steps of Symphony Hall every Friday of the season will no doubt regret the increase, which to not a few of them represents a real hardship.

The trustees and the management of the orchestra are, of course, more than justified in asking a higher price. They could easily sell everyone of the 505 seats now unreserved for the entire season at a price much greater than $12. Last May but 200 seats for Friday were available for new subscribers and these were absorbed by persons who had applied for them far in advance and gotten their names on a waiting list.

The Symphony Orchestra is not, has never been, and in the nature of things can never be a money-making organization. There has been a deficit of thousands of dollars in every one of the 41 seasons. This deficit has always been met by the generosity of a very few wealthy and public spirited citizens.

The late Maj Higginson, who for 36 years bore most of the burden, spent over a million on the Symphony. His successors, the present trustees and guarantors, have in a single season paid out of their own pockets $130,000. It is a standing reproach to the civic spirit of Boston that the burden of founding and sustaining our great orchestra has been left to so few people.

If, therefore, even the many among the "Symphony Line," to whom a quarter is a sum to be spent only after anxious consideration of ways and means, are now asked to contribute more largely, the request cannot be held unwarranted or unfair by any thinking person.

It seems to the present writer, who remembers five seasons as a needy student not so many years ago, when he could spent but $5 a month on what the budgets call "incidentals," (which include most of the things that make life worth living), that the management might have been more generous to the occupants of the "rush seats." A quarter apiece, $251.25 per concert, is not a great item in the annual accounts, though the aggregate for 24 concerts is a considerable sum, even to the management of a Symphony Orchestra. But the writer knows from his own experience the petty deprivations the increase in price will cause among some of those transient occupants of second balcony seats whom it is true as well as trite to call "the real music lovers."

An Educational Institution

But what about the people who come and sit on the steps in their fur coats, and imported ulsters? Many in the line are too well dressed for a quarter to mean all that to them. So run some of the objections sure to be raised to any appeal for the occupants of the rush seats. It is true that not all, perhaps not half the people in the line on Fridays, are really impecunious. It is also quite certain that almost none of them wish, whatever their needs, to be held as objects of charity.

Maj Higginson once said in a public speech that when he har found the financial burden of the orchestra almost more than he could bear, and when he felt that the concerts were not always appreciated by the audience as purely musical events, he would think of the people in the second balcony, to many of whom, as their faces showed during the concerts, their Friday afternoons were the deepest and highest pleasure their lives afforded, and go on with the battle.

He had founded the orchestra because on the whole, he cared more about music than about anything else in life. He had [illegible] to be a com- [illegible] studied abroad in his youth, but [illegible] that he lacked creative genius. Perhaps he felt that the proportion of genuine musical enthusiasts in the second balcony was higher than elsewhere in the audience.

The rush seats certainly train up devotees of orchestral music, many of whom later on buy season tickets. The orchestra is and has been the greatest musical educational institution in America. Might it not be good civic economy to keep the price at the purely nominal figure of 25 cents for these 505 seats, to make certain that nobody who really wants to come is kept away because of the price of admission? This would be generosity, not justice. On business principles it is nonsense. But then, on business principles is it not also nonsense to spend money on so hopelessly unprofitable an institution as the Symphony?

Another point: the people in rush seats are being asked a percentage of increase much greater than that demanded a few seasons ago from the regular subscribers. The $15 seats then went to $18, and so on. For this discrepancy there is no obvious reason.

Rush Seats Saturdays?

From the point of view of the management it would seem better to offer the rush seats at the series of concerts for which there is the least public demand. Now that is always the Saturday evening series. The reason Friday was originally chosen was that the Friday concert was at first in fact a public rehearsal; and always so called for many years after it had become distinguished from the Saturday concert solely by the greater size and the reputed greater social distinction of the Friday audience downstairs.

If something was to be done about the rush seats, why not have arranged matters so as to offer them Saturday night instead of Friday afternoon? It is of course only possible to do this at the time when subscription books have not been opened. It would, equally of course, be highly desirable from the point of view of people interested in securing a wider public for the Symphony and for the best in music, to offer rush seats at both series.

The great advantage from a public point of view in offering seats Saturday unreserved would be that on that evening men would be free to attend.

On Friday most men are either in college classes or at work at hours which make it very difficult for them to attend. The writer when in college refused to take any course that came at hours which conflicted with the rush seats for the Symphony, something possible only under a complete elective system.

The management doubtless assumes that few men want to go to Symphony concerts. Personal knowledge of students in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, gained as an instructor there, has convinced the writer of something of which he was hitherto also sceptical. There are really a good many young men not musicians or students of music; and not "highbrow" about anything to all appearances; who will go to and enjoy Symphony concerts, opera, and so on, without or with their feminine acquaintances.

They don't gush about it, these masculine attendants at concerts. But they take the music seriously and try to get what they can out of it without posing as aspirants for "Culture." This is the most encouraging symptom for the musical future of America the writer has yet found anywhere; this appearance of many young men at concert after concert without ulterior motives.

Now, to buy a whole Symphony ticket, is rather beyond the means of most young men not fanatics about music. But to give up many evenings to it at the price of a quarter plus a long wait is for many young men a perfectly possible form of entertainment, provided nobody accuses them of doing it for effect. Saturday night rush seats at the Symphony would be even better missionary work than the Friday ones have been.—"If I were a Trustee."

GLOBE SEPT. 30

One more departure from old custom is announced for the impending series of Symphony Concerts. Since the beginnings of the eighties, the price of unreserved seats in the upper balcony on Friday afternoon has stood at twenty-five cents. Now, and for the future, it has been doubled. Well worth fifty cents are the concerts and well able to pay that sum are many frequenters of this gallery. Often it is a costly "soloist" that brings them thither.

As usual the Symphony Orchestra will go to Cambridge for nine concerts on Thursday evenings in Sanders Theatre. Mr. Monteux will conduct through the series and the band will be as large as the stage permits. The concerts and the "assisting artists" are listed as follows:

Oct. 18—Kathryn Meisle, mezzo-soprano.
Nov. 15—Roland Hayes, tenor.
Dec. 6—Harold Bauer, pianist.
Jan. 10—Robert Schmitz, pianist.
Feb. 7—Jean Bedetti, violoncellist.
Feb. 28—Vera Janacopulos, soprano.
March 20—Carl Flesch, violinist.
April 10—Constance McGlinchee, pianist.
May 1—Closing programme.

Of these singers and virtuosi all but Miss Meisle and Miss McGlinchee will be heard also at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. The two exceptions are young women of promise and performance; while Mr. Bedetti—almost needless to say—is the master-violoncellist of the orchestra. Present subscribers may renew their subscriptions through Saturday, Oct. 6; new subscribers will have their turn from Oct. 12; both at the University Book Store.

The good word comes that Mr. [illegible] the pianist, long unheard in Boston outside the Symphony Concerts, will play in a recital of his own at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 20. His ripened abilities speak for themselves. He has also the habit of catholic programmes. Now Mr. Gabrilowitsch, though conductor of an orchestra—in St. Louis—he does not put by his other career.

TRANS. OCT. 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES FROM ABROAD

Members of the orchestra on board the S. S. Paris arriving in New York Harbor from tour abroad. In the group are: M. Fourel, first viola; P. Monteaux, conductor; Mr. and Mrs. G. Tony Hautbois, soloists; Mr. and Mrs. J. Bedetti, first cello; Mr. and Mrs. George Mayer, first trumpet; Mr. and Mrs. L. Wurmser, harpist soloist, and H. Rudlinger, second violin. (C) Keystone.

POST. Oct. 3.

PIERRE MONTEUX RETURNS AFTER SUMMER ABROAD

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Europe yesterday morning on the Paris. The steamer docked in New York and the conductor came to Boston on the afternoon train.

He has brought in his trunk a number of new scores of interest, some in manuscript, which he found in Europe in the course of the Summer.

The conductor has ordered the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to assemble on Friday morning for the first rehearsal in preparation for the opening on the following Friday of what will be his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

Madame Monteux and the young son and daughter of the conductor went to France with him at the beginning of the Summer and they will remain there until he joins them at the conclusion of the symphony season.

GLOBE-Oct. 2.

LEADER OF SYMPHONY RETURNS

Says Orchestra Is Larger and Better Than Ever

BY OLIN DOWNES

Arriving in Boston last night from Europe, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outlined certain features of the programmes of the coming season, which will open next Friday in Symphony Hall, and stated that the Boston Symphony was a bigger orchestra today, and in finer condition because of the personnel which has been steadily augmented and improved, than ever before in his acquaintance with the organization.

NO EQUAL IN EUROPE

He spoke highly of Sergei Kussewitsky, who will succeed Mr. Monteux in the season of 1923-24 as leader of the Boston Symphony, and said that no orchestra in Europe came near the quality of the Boston Symphony or indeed of other of the best American orchestras.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a larger personnel this season than in any of the four years during which I have had the honor of conducting it," he said. "We now have all the extra brass—8 horns, 5 trumpets, etc., required to play the fullest modern scores.

Strawinsky in the Works

"Among the other works, therefore, I shall perform several which call for exceptional instrumental forces, such as Mahler's First Symphony; Scriabine's Third Symphony; the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus. I also expect to play Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps," which has not been heard yet in Boston."

When Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of this work in Paris the music caused hisses and cat-calls in the theatre, and nearly precipitated a riot.

Asked to compare the present technical state of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the leading symphony orchestras of Europe, Mr. Monteux said, "There is no comparison. There are no orchestras in Europe today which come near the tonal quality and the technical capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or a number of the bigger orchestras of America—none. European orchestras are crippled, and it is doubtful if in many years one will be able to hear in any European city such performances as audiences in a number of American cities enjoy."

POST. Oct. 2.

Mr. Monteux tells us that he will not bring out many new French works at the Symphony concerts this season. "When you hear French music, you should hear the best." He speaks highly of Louis Aubert's "Habanera," which will be performed at the second concert. (Aubert's opera, "La foret bleue," was produced at the Boston Opera House in March, 1913, and his Fantaisie for piano and orchestra has been played at a New England Conservatory concert.) Mahler's first symphony will be played here for the first time at the third concert.

Mr. Arthur Brooke, who has filled admirably the position of second flute for many years, now leaves at his own request. He will be replaced by a French artist. There will be a double quartet of horns. The two newcomers are Germans. Mr. Monteux says that a horn quartet should be composed of Germans or Frenchmen; for when the players are of two nations, the tonal quality is not homogeneous; not at all from racial feeling, but because the instruments differ, as does the manner of tonal production. When Mr. Damrosch imported a French horn player, he found it necessary to play a German horn.

Mr. Monteux heard little or no music in Paris, for he was there out of season. He thinks that the orchestra at the Opera-Comique has shown a certain lack of discipline since M. Ruhlmann, formerly the conductor, returned to Belgium. Mr. Monteux has many works of various nationalities which he received last season, but he thinks that no audience wishes to hear more than one unfamiliar piece at a concert. Certainly the reactionaries can attend the first concert without suspicion or trepidation, for the program, while it is interesting, contains nothing that should distress the poker-backed conservatives. This program includes Beethoven's 7th symphony; Brahms's St. Anthony variations; "La Peri," a danced poem by Dukas, and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

HERALD-Oct. 4,

Symphony Concerts to Begin Next Friday Night

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe many new scores of interest from which a number will be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. The opening program will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" of Dukas, and the dances from Richard Strauss' Opera, "Salome."

AMER. Oct. 6.

MUCH NEW MUSIC FOR SYMPHONY

Old Masterpieces to Have Place With New Scores

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe a number of new scores of interest, which, together with notable older masterpieces, will be included in the programmes of the symphony concerts in the course of the season.

Of the music now in the library, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be mentioned, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps") Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honneger, and Ropartz, likewise Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schonberg, Schreker, and Pfitzner; English composers, Eugene Goosens, Arnold Bax and Frank Bridge; likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok and the Spaniard de Falla.

Mr. Monteux will open his fifth and last season a week from tomorrow.

The subscription sale, which is now closing for the series of 24 Saturday evening concerts, will virtually exhaust the seats available, of which there are considerably fewer than at this time last year. For the Friday afternoon concerts there has been no public sale.

POST-Oct. 4.

Thursday evening, Oct. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the first of a new series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss Meisle of the younger generation for assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting; Miss Rethberg of the new German generation at the Metropolitan Opera House for assisting singer and Aubert's "Habanera" for novel piece. An ingratiating voice in young prime, skill and sensibility distinguish the singer.

Saturday evening, Oct. 20, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, Miss Rethberg for singer and Aubert's piece as already noted.

TRANS. Oct. 6.

NEW YORK
TIMES

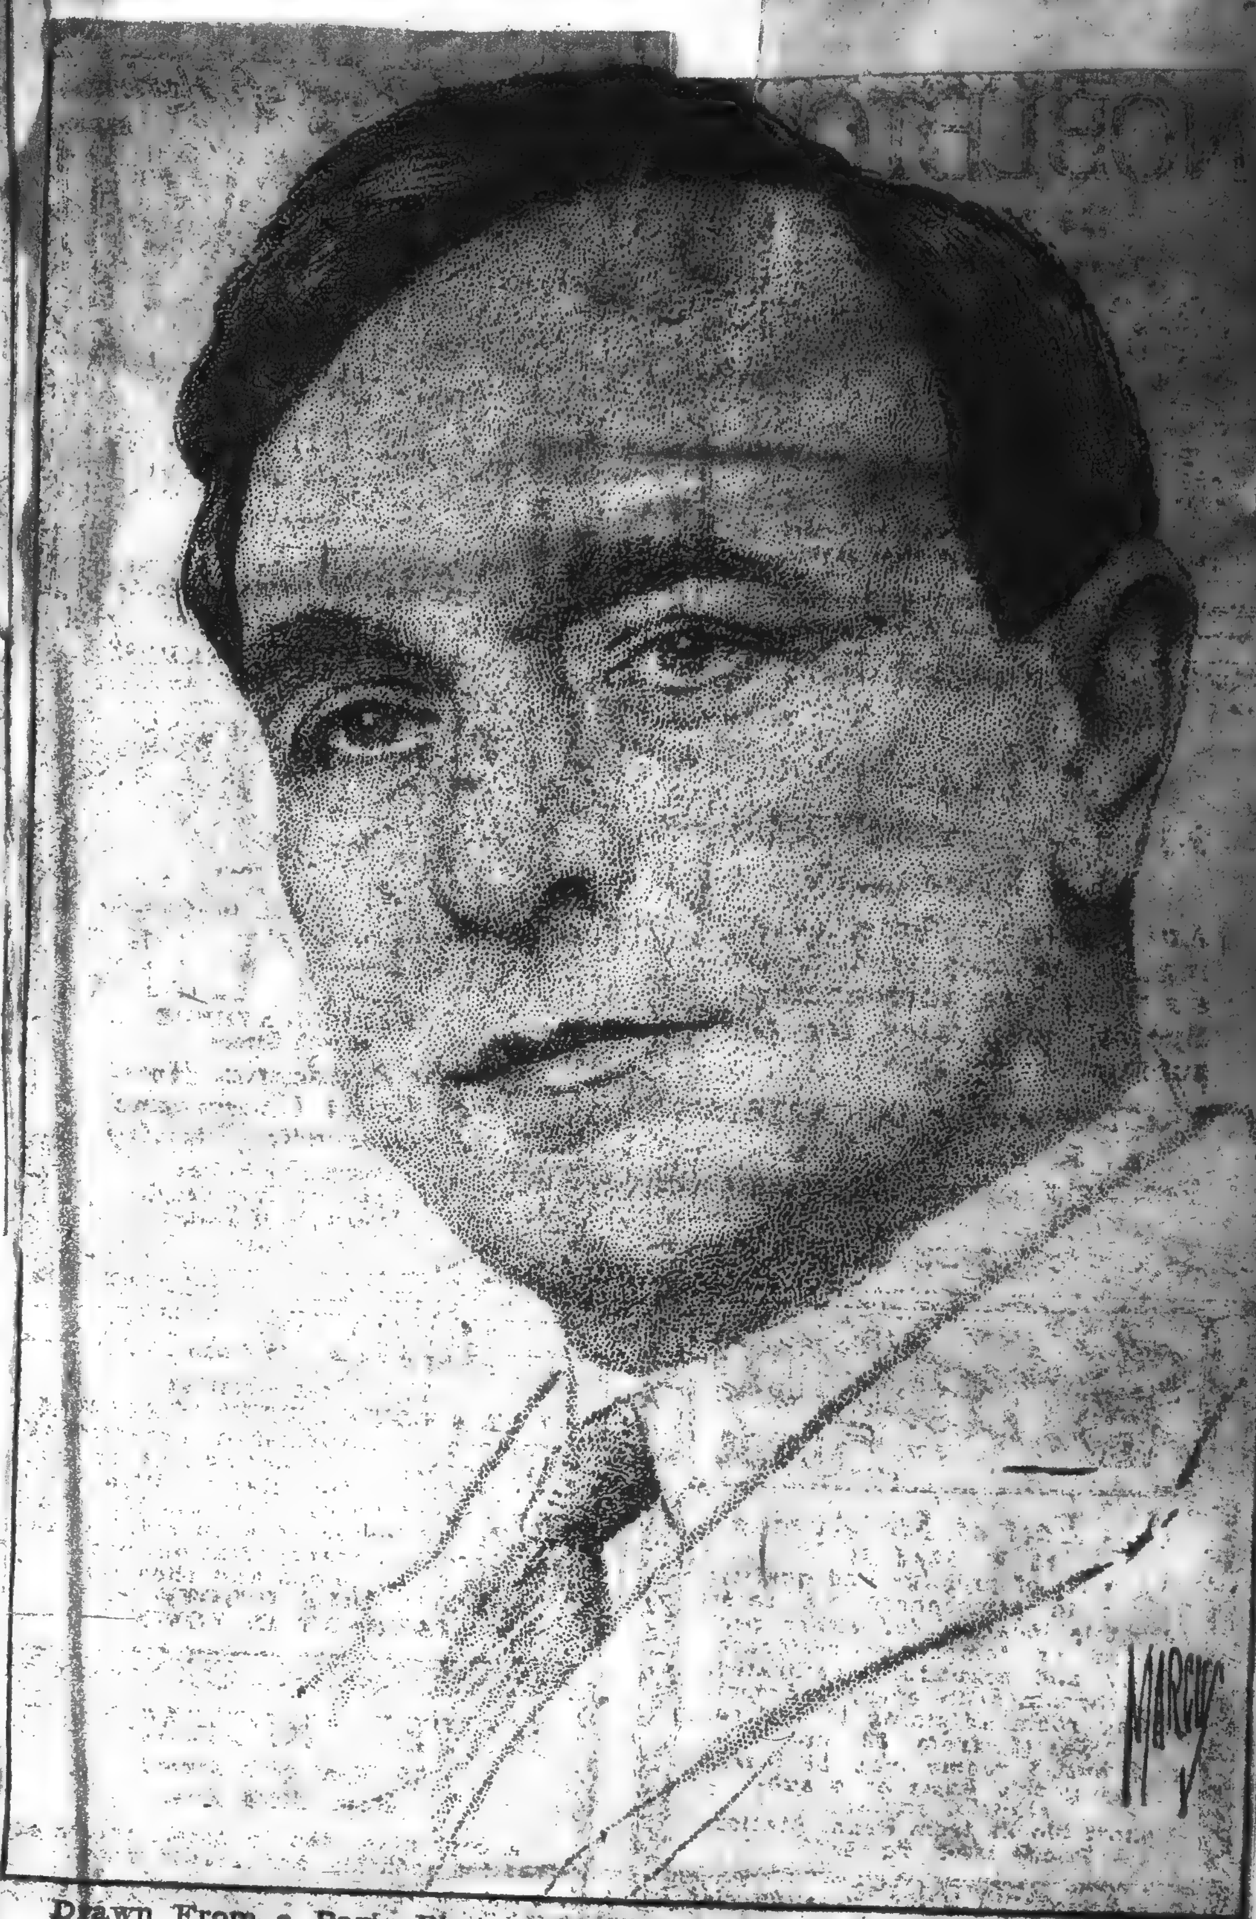
EP 16 1923

Pierre Monteux has been decorated by France with the ribbon of a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, in token of his work for French art in America. Mr. Monteux is returning to Boston this month with much new music, to prepare for the season's opening in Symphony Hall on Oct. 12, as well as here in Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy at the end of November. To Monteux's four years of tireless effort an official note ascribes the present high qualities of tone and ensemble of the Boston Orchestra. It adds that in serving now for a fifth season he will complete one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony conductors.

[128]

NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 16 1923



Drawn From a Paris Photograph. Courtesy of the Musical Digest.
Serge Kussevitzky, Coming in 1924 to Boston Orchestra.

By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski to name but two recent stars of the baton.

Kussevitzky, born in 1874 near Tver, between Novgorod and Moscow, was as a youth in Berlin the founder of Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. His orchestra gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd. Each Spring he instituted festivals. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

When the revolution scattered his men he became leader briefly of the Russian State Orchestra, and since 1920 has been in Western Europe as guest conductor with the London Symphony and for three years at the Concerts Kussevitzky and the Opéra in Paris.

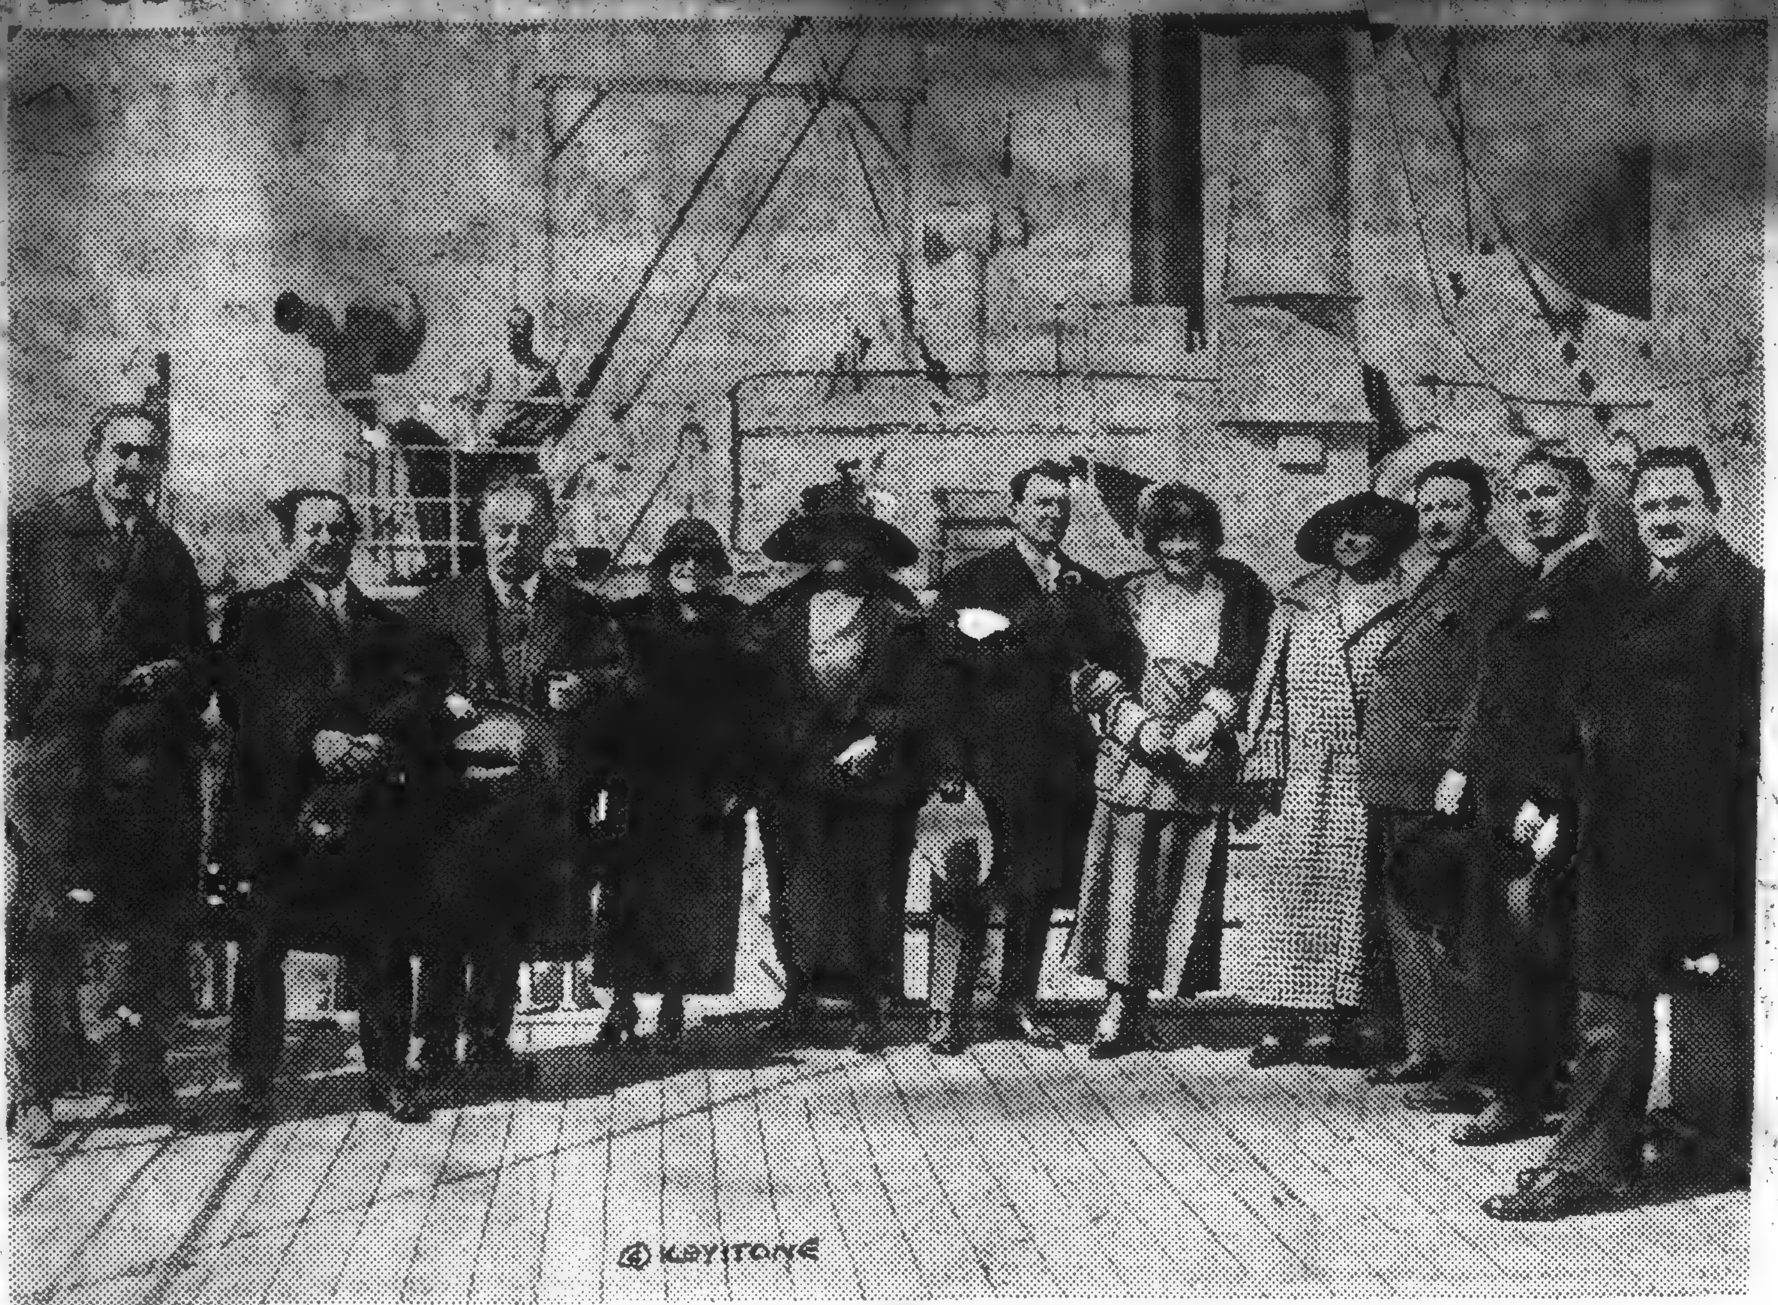
N. Y.
TRIBUNE
SEP 16 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
SEP 16 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES FROM ABROAD



Members of the orchestra on board the S. S. Paris arriving in New York Harbor from tour abroad. In the group are: M. Fourel, first viola; P. Monteaux, conductor; Mr. and Mrs. G. Tony Hautbois, soloists; Mr. and Mrs. J. Bedetti, first cello; Mr. and Mrs. George Mayer, first trumpet; Mr. and Mrs. L. Wurmser, harpist soloist, and H. Rudlinger, second violin. (C) Keystone.

POST. Oct. 3.

PIERRE MONTEUX RETURNS AFTER SUMMER ABROAD

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Europe yesterday morning on the Paris. The steamer docked in New York and the conductor came to Boston on the afternoon train.

He has brought in his trunk a number of new scores of interest, some in manuscript, which he found in Europe in the course of the Summer.

The conductor has ordered the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to assemble on Friday morning for the first rehearsal in preparation for the opening on the following Friday of what will be his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

Madame Monteux and the young son and daughter of the conductor went to France with him at the beginning of the Summer and they will remain there until he joins them at the conclusion of the symphony season.

GLOBE - Oct. 3.

LEADER OF SYMPHONY RETURNS

Says Orchestra Is Larger and Better Than Ever

BY OLIN DOWNES

Arriving in Boston last night from Europe, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outlined certain features of the programmes of the coming season, which will open next Friday in Symphony Hall, and stated that the Boston Symphony was a bigger orchestra today, and in finer condition because of the personnel which has been steadily augmented and improved, than ever before in his acquaintance with the organization.

NO EQUAL IN EUROPE

He spoke highly of Sergei Kussewitsky, who will succeed Mr. Monteux in the season of 1923-24 as leader of the Boston Symphony, and said that no orchestra in Europe came near the quality of the Boston Symphony or indeed of other of the best American orchestras.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a larger personnel this season than in any of the four years during which I have had the honor of conducting it," he said. "We now have all the extra brass—8 horns, 5 trumpets, etc., required to play the fullest modern scores.

Strawinsky in the Works

"Among the other works, therefore, I shall perform several which call for exceptional instrumental forces, such as Mahler's First Symphony; Scriabine's Third Symphony; the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus. I also expect to play Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps," which has not been heard yet in Boston.

When Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of this work in Paris the music caused hisses and cat-calls in the theatre, and nearly precipitated a riot.

Asked to compare the present technical state of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the leading symphony orchestras of Europe, Mr. Monteux said, "There is no comparison. There are no orchestras in Europe today which come near the tonal quality and the technical capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or a number of the bigger orchestras of America—none. European orchestras are crippled, and it is doubtful if in many years one will be able to hear in any European city such performances as audiences in a number of American cities enjoy."

POST. Oct. 2.

Mr. Monteux tells us that he will not bring out many new French works at the Symphony concerts this season. "When you hear French music, you should hear the best." He speaks highly of Louis Aubert's "Habanera," which will be performed at the second concert. (Aubert's opera, "La foret bleue," was produced at the Boston Opera House in March, 1913, and his Fantaisie for piano and orchestra has been played at a New England Conservatory concert.) Mahler's first symphony will be played here for the first time at the third concert.

Mr. Arthur Brooke, who has filled admirably the position of second flute for many years, now leaves at his own request. He will be replaced by a French artist. There will be a double quartet of horns. The two newcomers are Germans. Mr. Monteux says that a horn quartet should be composed of Germans or Frenchmen; for when the players are of two nations, the tonal quality is not homogeneous; not at all from racial feeling, but because the instruments differ, as does the manner of tonal production. When Mr. Damrosch imported a French horn player, he found it necessary to play a German horn.

Mr. Monteux heard little or no music in Paris, for he was there out of season. He thinks that the orchestra at the Opera-Comique has shown a certain lack of discipline since M. Ruhlmann, formerly the conductor, returned to Belgium. Mr. Monteux has many works of various nationalities which he received last season, but he thinks that no audience wishes to hear more than one unfamiliar piece at a concert. Certainly the reactionaries can attend the first concert without suspicion or trepidation, for the program, while it is interesting, contains nothing that should distress the poker-backed conservatives. This program includes Beethoven's 7th symphony; Brahms's St. Anthony variations; "La Peri," a danced poem by Dukas, and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

HERALD - Oct. 4.

Symphony Concerts to Begin Next Friday Night

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe many new scores of interest from which a number will be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. The opening program will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" of Dukas, and the dances from Richard Strauss' Opera, "Salome."

AMER. Oct. 6.

MUCH NEW MUSIC FOR SYMPHONY

Old Masterpieces to Have Place With New Scores

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe a number of new scores of interest, which, together with notable older masterpieces, will be included in the programmes of the symphony concerts in the course of the season.

Of the music now in the library, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be mentioned, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps") Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honneger, and Ropartz, likewise Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schonberg, Schreker, and Pfitzner: English composers, Eugene Goosens, Arnold Bax and Frank Bridge: likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok and the Spaniard de Falla.

Mr. Monteux will open his fifth and last season a week from tomorrow.

The subscription sale, which is now closing for the series of 24 Saturday evening concerts, will virtually exhaust the seats available, of which there are considerably fewer than at this time last year. For the Friday afternoon concerts there has been no public sale.

POST - Oct. 4.

Thursday evening, Oct. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the first of a new series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss Meisle of the younger generation for assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting; Miss Rethberg of the new German generation at the Metropolitan Opera House for assisting singer and Aubert's "Habanera" for novel piece. An ingratiating voice in young prime, skill and sensibility distinguish the singer.

Saturday evening, Oct. 20, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, Miss Rethberg for singer and Aubert's piece as already noted.

TRAN. Oct. 6.

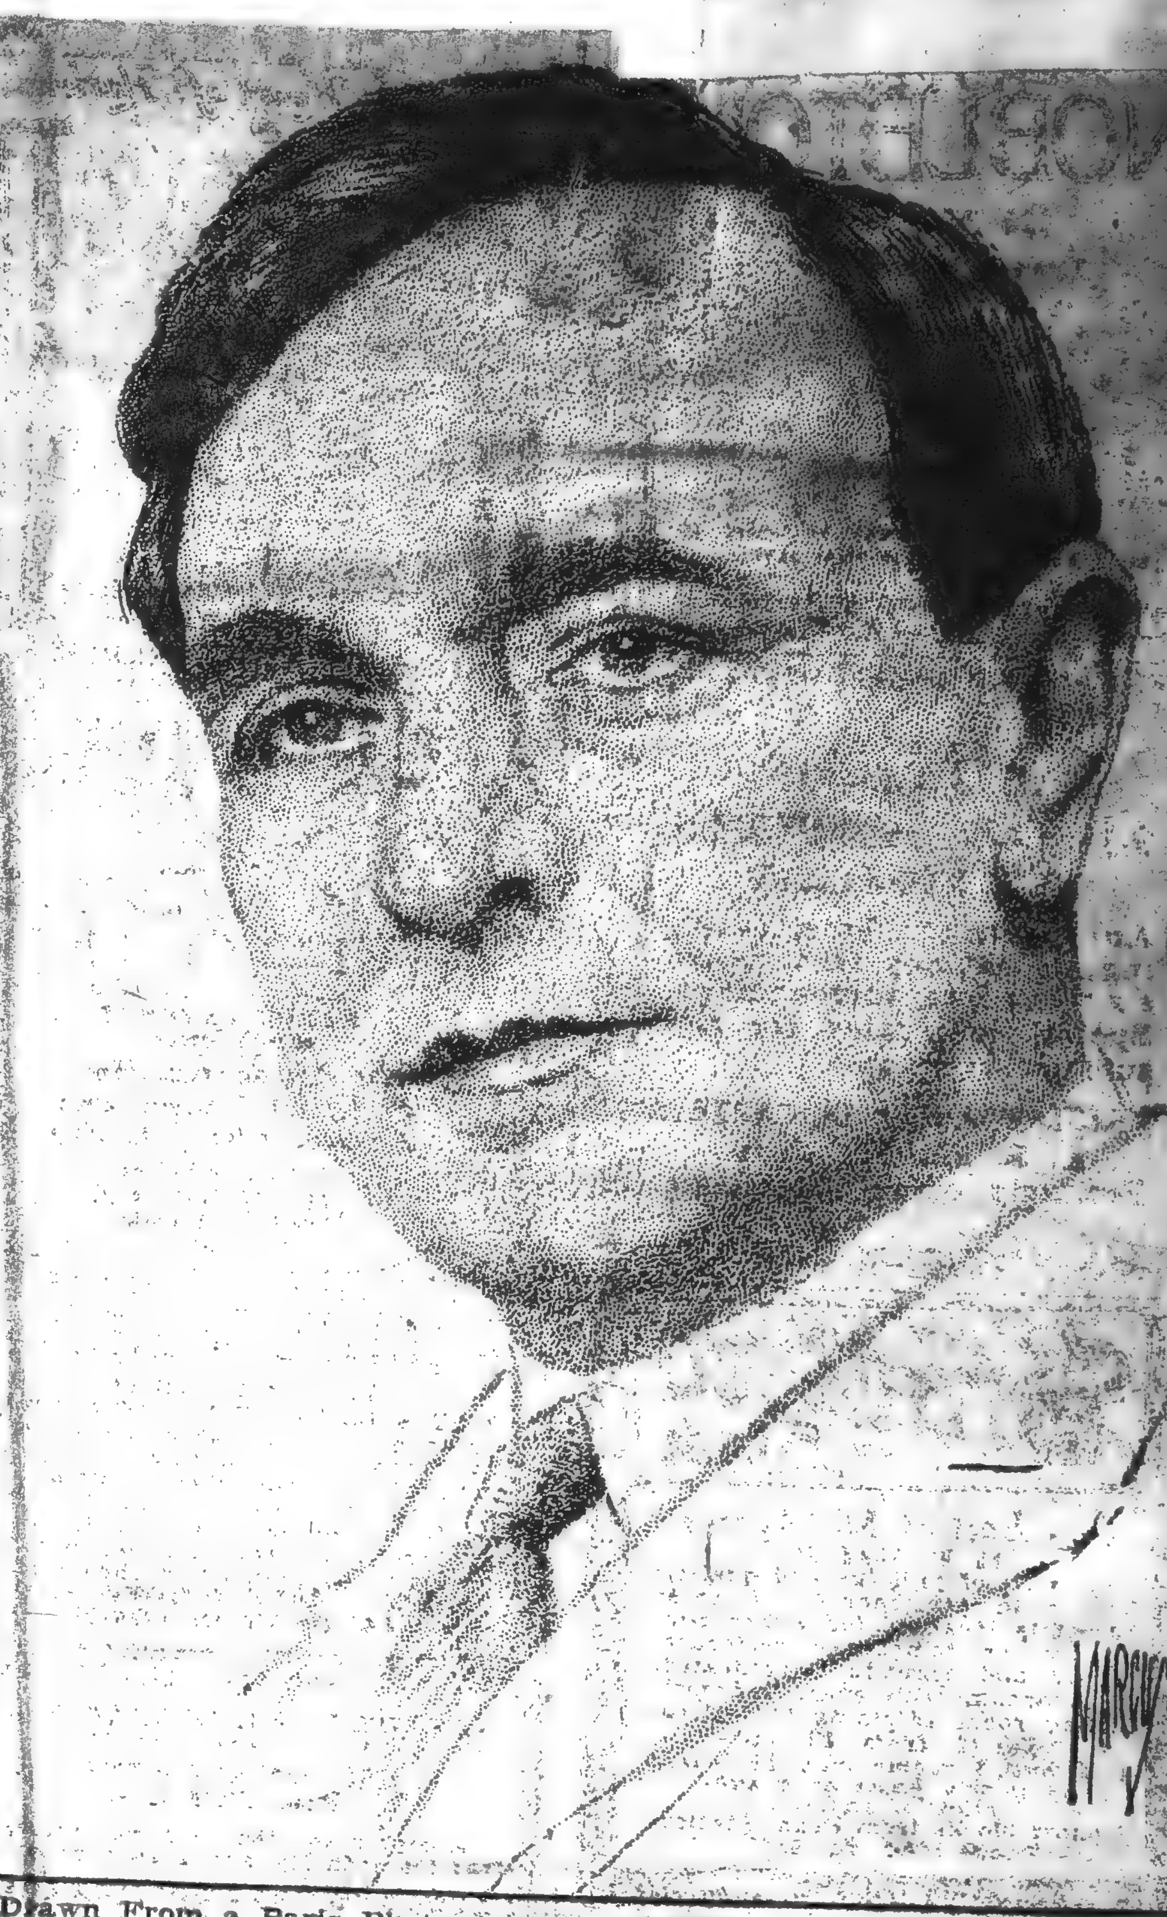
NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 16 1923

Pierre Monteux has been decorated by France with the ribbon of a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, in token of his work for French art in America. Mr. Monteux is returning to Boston this month with much new music, to prepare for the season's opening in Symphony Hall on Oct. 12, as well as here in Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy at the end of November. To Monteux's four years of tireless effort an official note ascribes the present high qualities of tone and ensemble of the Boston Orchestra. It adds that in serving now for a fifth season he will complete one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony conductors.

NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 16 1923



Drawn From a Paris Photograph. Courtesy of the Musical Digest.
Serge Kussevitzky, Coming in 1924 to Boston Orchestra.

By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski to name but two recent stars of the baton.

Kussevitzky, born in 1874 near Tver, between Novgorod and Moscow, was as a youth in Berlin the founder of Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. His orchestra gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd. Each Spring he instituted festivals. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

When the revolution scattered his men he became leader briefly of the Russian State Orchestra, and since 1920 has been in Western Europe as guest conductor with the London Symphony and for three years at the Concerts Kussevitzky and the Opéra in Paris.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
SEP 16 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
SEP 16 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

d in his
d creative the pro-enthusiasts igher than in up de-many of ickets. The the greatest ution in Amer-civic economy purely nominal these 505 seats, body who really away because of This would be ice. On business

nse. But then, on s it not also non-y on so hopelessly tution as the Sym-

e people in rush
ked a percentage eater than that des ago from the reg-
The 515 seats then
on. For this dis-obvious reason.

days?

iew of the manage-better to offer the ries of concerts for east public demand.
the Saturday eve-eason Friday was as that the Friday in fact a public reso called for many ecome distinguished oncert solely by the he reputed greater the Friday audience

o be done about the have arranged mathem Saturday night
fternoon? It is of e to do this at the ion books have not would, equally of desirable from the eople interested in ublic for the Sym-st in music, to offer series.
age from a public ring seats Saturday s that on that eve-
free to attend.
en are either in col-ork at hours which ult for them to at-when in college reourse that came at ted with the rush ony, something pos-complete elective

doubtless assumes to go to Symphony knowledge of stu-husetts Institute of
as an instructor
the writer of some-was hitherto also really a good many sicians or students

"highbrow" about earances; who will Symphony concerts, without or with their nces.
bout it, these mascu-concerts. But they ously and try to get of it without posing ulture." This is the ymptom for the mu-rica the writer has
; this appearance of concert after con-motives.
le Symphony ticket,
he means of most
atics about music.
y evenings to it at er plus a long wait men a perfectly ntertainment, pros them of doing it night rush seats
uld be even better n the Friday ones re a Trustee."

re from old custom is pending series of Sym-nce the beginnings of e of unreserved seats on Friday afternoon five cents. Now, and s been doubled. Well the concerts and well are many frequenters t is a costly "soloist"
her.
phony Orchestra will r nine concerts on Sanders Theatre. Mr.
t through the series
as large as the stage ts and the "assisting follows:
n Meisle, mezzo-so-

Hayes, tenor.
Bauer, pianist.
Schmitz, pianist.
detti, violoncellist.
anacopulos, soprano.
Flesch, violinist.
ance McGlinchee, pi-programme.

virtuosi all but Miss Glinchee will be heard ny Concerts in Boston are young women of rance; while Mr. Be-as to say—is the mas-he orchestra. Present new their subscriptions
Oct. 6, new subscribers
m from Oct. 13; both ook store.

comes that Mr. G heard in Boston outside ncerts, will play in a Jordan Hall on Satur-20. His ripened abilimselves. He has also ic programmes. Like though conductor now
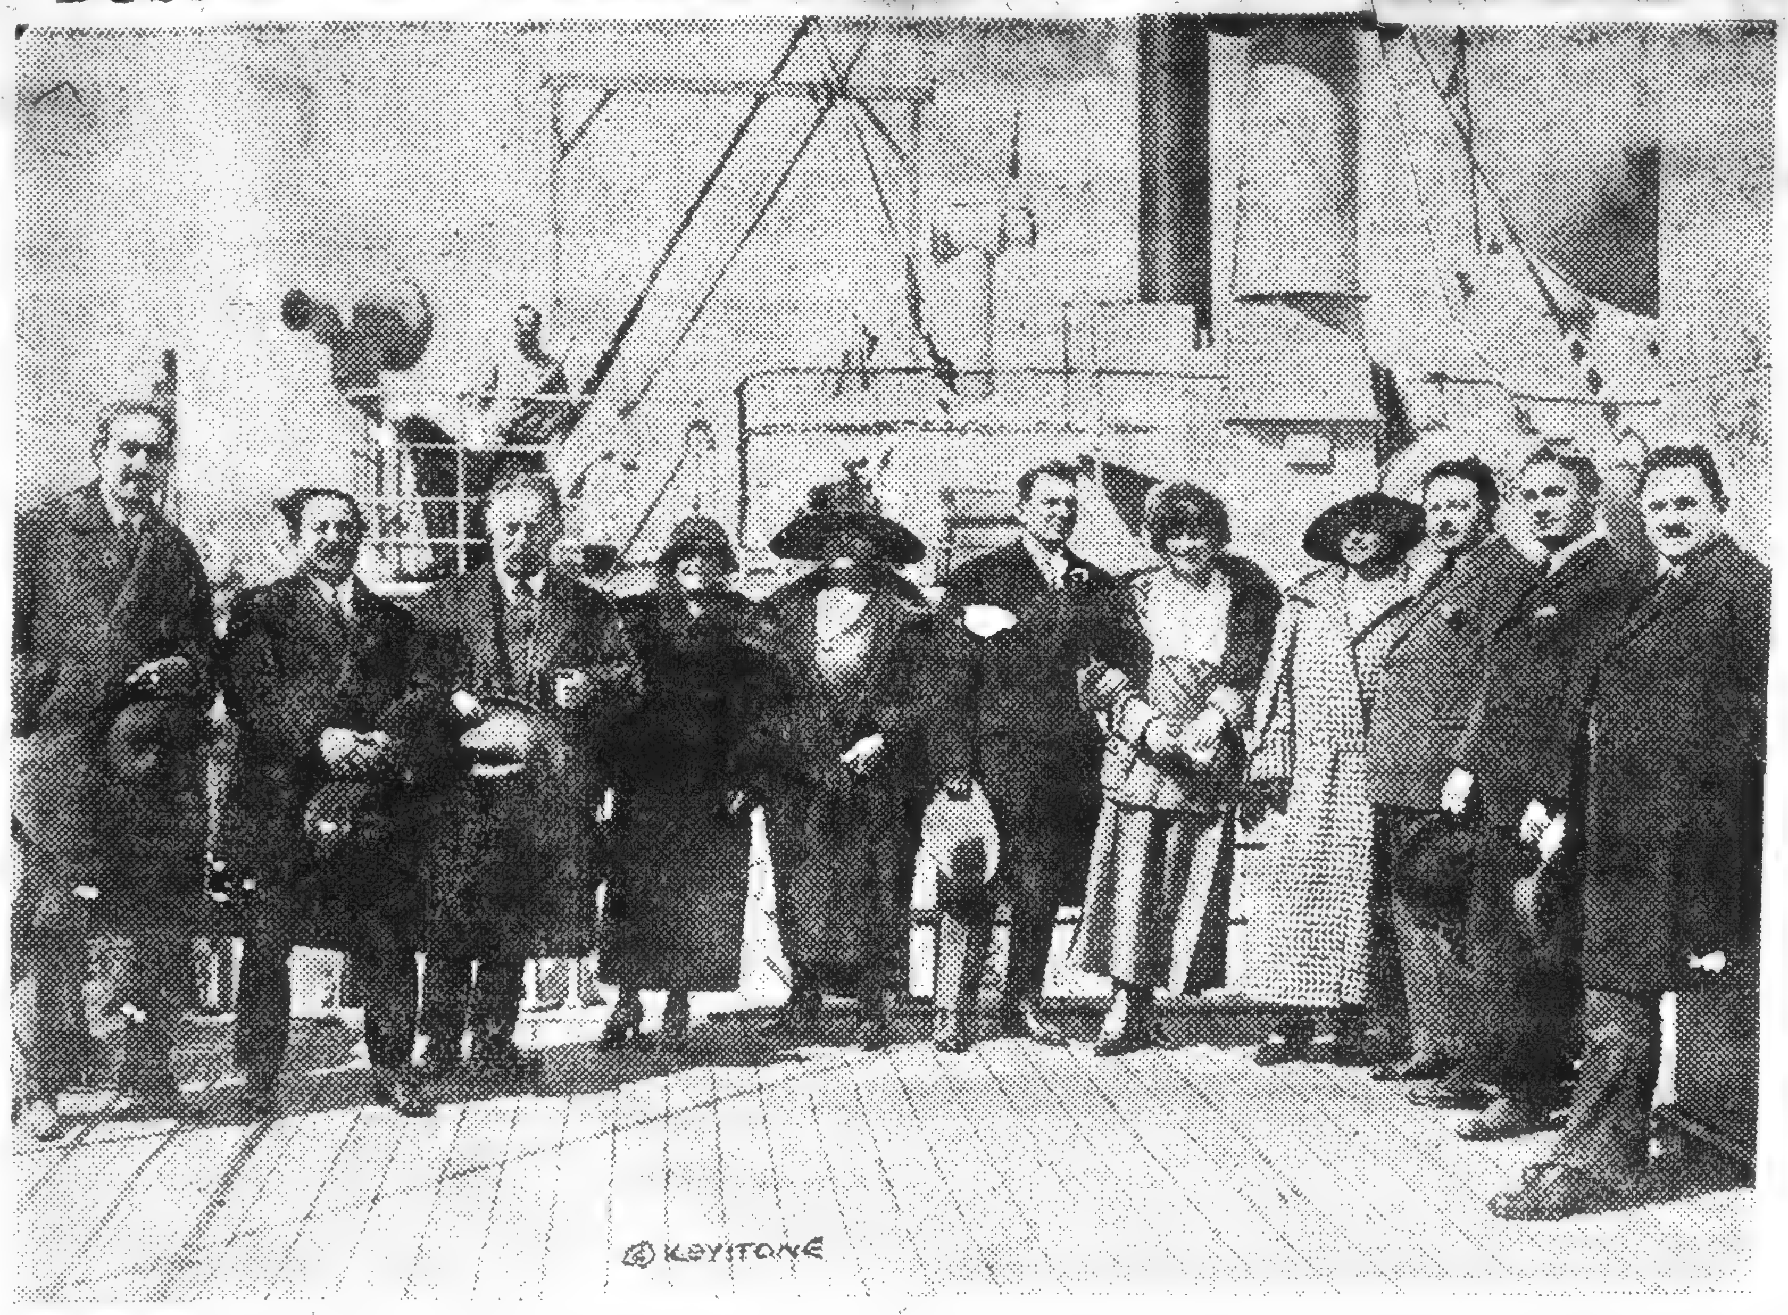
St. Louis—he does not

Oct. 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES FROM ABROAD



Members of the orchestra on board the S. S. Paris arriving in New York Harbor from tour abroad. In the group are: M. Fourel, first viola; P. Monteaux, conductor; Mr. and Mrs. G. Tony Hautbois, soloists; Mr. and Mrs. J. Bedetti, first cello; Mr. and Mrs. George Mayer, first trumpet; Mr. and Mrs. L. Wurmser, harpist soloist, and H. Rudlinger, second violin. (C) Keystone.

PIERRE MONTEUX RETURNS AFTER SUMMER ABROAD

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from Europe yesterday morning on the Paris. The steamer docked in New York and the conductor came to Boston on the afternoon train.

He has brought in his trunk a number of new scores of interest, some in manuscript, which he found in Europe in the course of the Summer.

The conductor has ordered the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to assemble on Friday morning for the first rehearsal in preparation for the opening on the following Friday of what will be his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

Madame Monteux and the young son and daughter of the conductor went to France with him at the beginning of the Summer and they will remain there until he joins them at the conclusion of the symphony season.

Globe - Oct.

LEADER OF SYMPHONY RETURNS

Says Orchestra Is Larger and Better Than Ever

BY OLIN DOWNES

Arriving in Boston last night from Europe, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, outlined certain features of the programmes of the coming season, which will open next Friday in Symphony Hall, and stated that the Boston Symphony was a bigger orchestra today, and in finer condition because of the personnel which has been steadily augmented and improved, than ever before in his acquaintance with the organization.

NO EQUAL IN EUROPE

He spoke highly of Sergei Kussewitsky, who will succeed Mr. Monteux in the season of 1923-24 as leader of the Boston Symphony, and said that no orchestra in Europe came near the quality of the Boston Symphony or indeed of other of the best American orchestras.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a larger personnel this season than in any of the four years during which I have had the honor of conducting it," he said. "We now have all the extra brass—8 horns, 5 trumpets, etc., required to play the fullest modern scores.

Strawinsky in the Works

"Among the other works, therefore, I shall perform several which call for exceptional instrumental forces, such as Mahler's First Symphony; Scriabine's Third Symphony; the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus. I also expect to play Strawinsky's "Sacre de Printemps," which has not been heard yet in Boston.

When Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of this work in Paris the music caused hisses and cat-calls in the theatre, and nearly precipitated a riot.

Asked to compare the present technical state of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the leading symphony orchestras of Europe, Mr. Monteux said, "There is no comparison. There are no orchestras in Europe today which come near the tonal quality and the technical capacities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or a number of the bigger orchestras of America—none. European orchestras are crippled, and it is doubtful if in many years one will be able to hear in any European city such performances as audiences in a number of American cities enjoy."

Mr. Monteux tells us that he will not bring out many new French works at the Symphony concerts this season. "When you hear French music, you should hear the best." He speaks highly of Louis Aubert's "Habanera," which will be performed at the second concert. (Aubert's opera, "La foret bleue," was produced at the Boston Opera House in March, 1913, and his Fantaisie for piano and orchestra has been played at a New England Conservatory concert.) Mahler's first symphony will be played here for the first time at the third concert.

Mr. Arthur Brooke, who has filled admirably the position of second flute for many years, now leaves at his own request. He will be replaced by a French artist. There will be a double quartet of horns. The two newcomers are Germans. Mr. Monteux says that a horn quartet should be composed of Germans or Frenchmen; for when the players are of two nations, the tonal quality is not homogeneous; not at all from racial feeling, but because the instruments differ, as does the manner of tonal production. When Mr. Damrosch imported a French horn player, he found it necessary to play a German horn.

Mr. Monteux heard little or no music in Paris, for he was there out of season. He thinks that the orchestra at the Opera-Comique has shown a certain lack of discipline since M. Ruhlmann, formerly the conductor, returned to Belgium. Mr. Monteux has many works of various nationalities which he received last season, but he thinks that no audience wishes to hear more than one unfamiliar piece at a concert. Certainly the reactionaries can attend the first concert without suspicion or trepidation, for the program, while it is interesting, contains nothing that should distress the poker-backed conservatives. This program includes Beethoven's 7th symphony; Brahms's St. Anthony variations; "La Peri," a danced poem by Dukas, and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

[illegible] Oct. 6

Symphony Concerts to Begin Next Friday Night

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe many new scores of interest from which a number will be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra.

The season will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, in Symphony Hall. The opening program will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" of Dukas, and the dances from Richard Strauss' Opera, "Salome."

AMER. Oct. 6.

MUCH NEW MUSIC FOR SYMPHONY

Old Masterpieces to Have Place With New Scores

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought with him from Europe a number of new scores of interest, which, together with notable older masterpieces, will be included in the programmes of the symphony concerts in the course of the season.

Of the music new in the library, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be mentioned, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps"); Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honegger and Ropartz. [illegible] Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schonberg, Schreker, and Pfitzner; English composers, Eugene Goossens, Arnold Bax and Frank Bridge; [illegible] Bartok [illegible]

Mr. Monteux will open his fifth and last season a week from [illegible].

The subscription sale, which is now closing for the series of 24 Saturday evening concerts, will virtually exhaust the seats available, of which there are considerably fewer than at this time last year. For the Friday afternoon concerts there has been no public sale.

Thursday evening, Oct. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the first of a new series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss Meisle of the younger generation for assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting; Miss Rethberg of the new German generation at the Metropolitan Opera House for assisting singer and Aubert's "Habanera" for novel piece. An ingratiating voice in young prime, skill and sensibility distinguish the singer.

Saturday evening, Oct. 20, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, Miss Rethberg for singer and Aubert's piece as already noted.

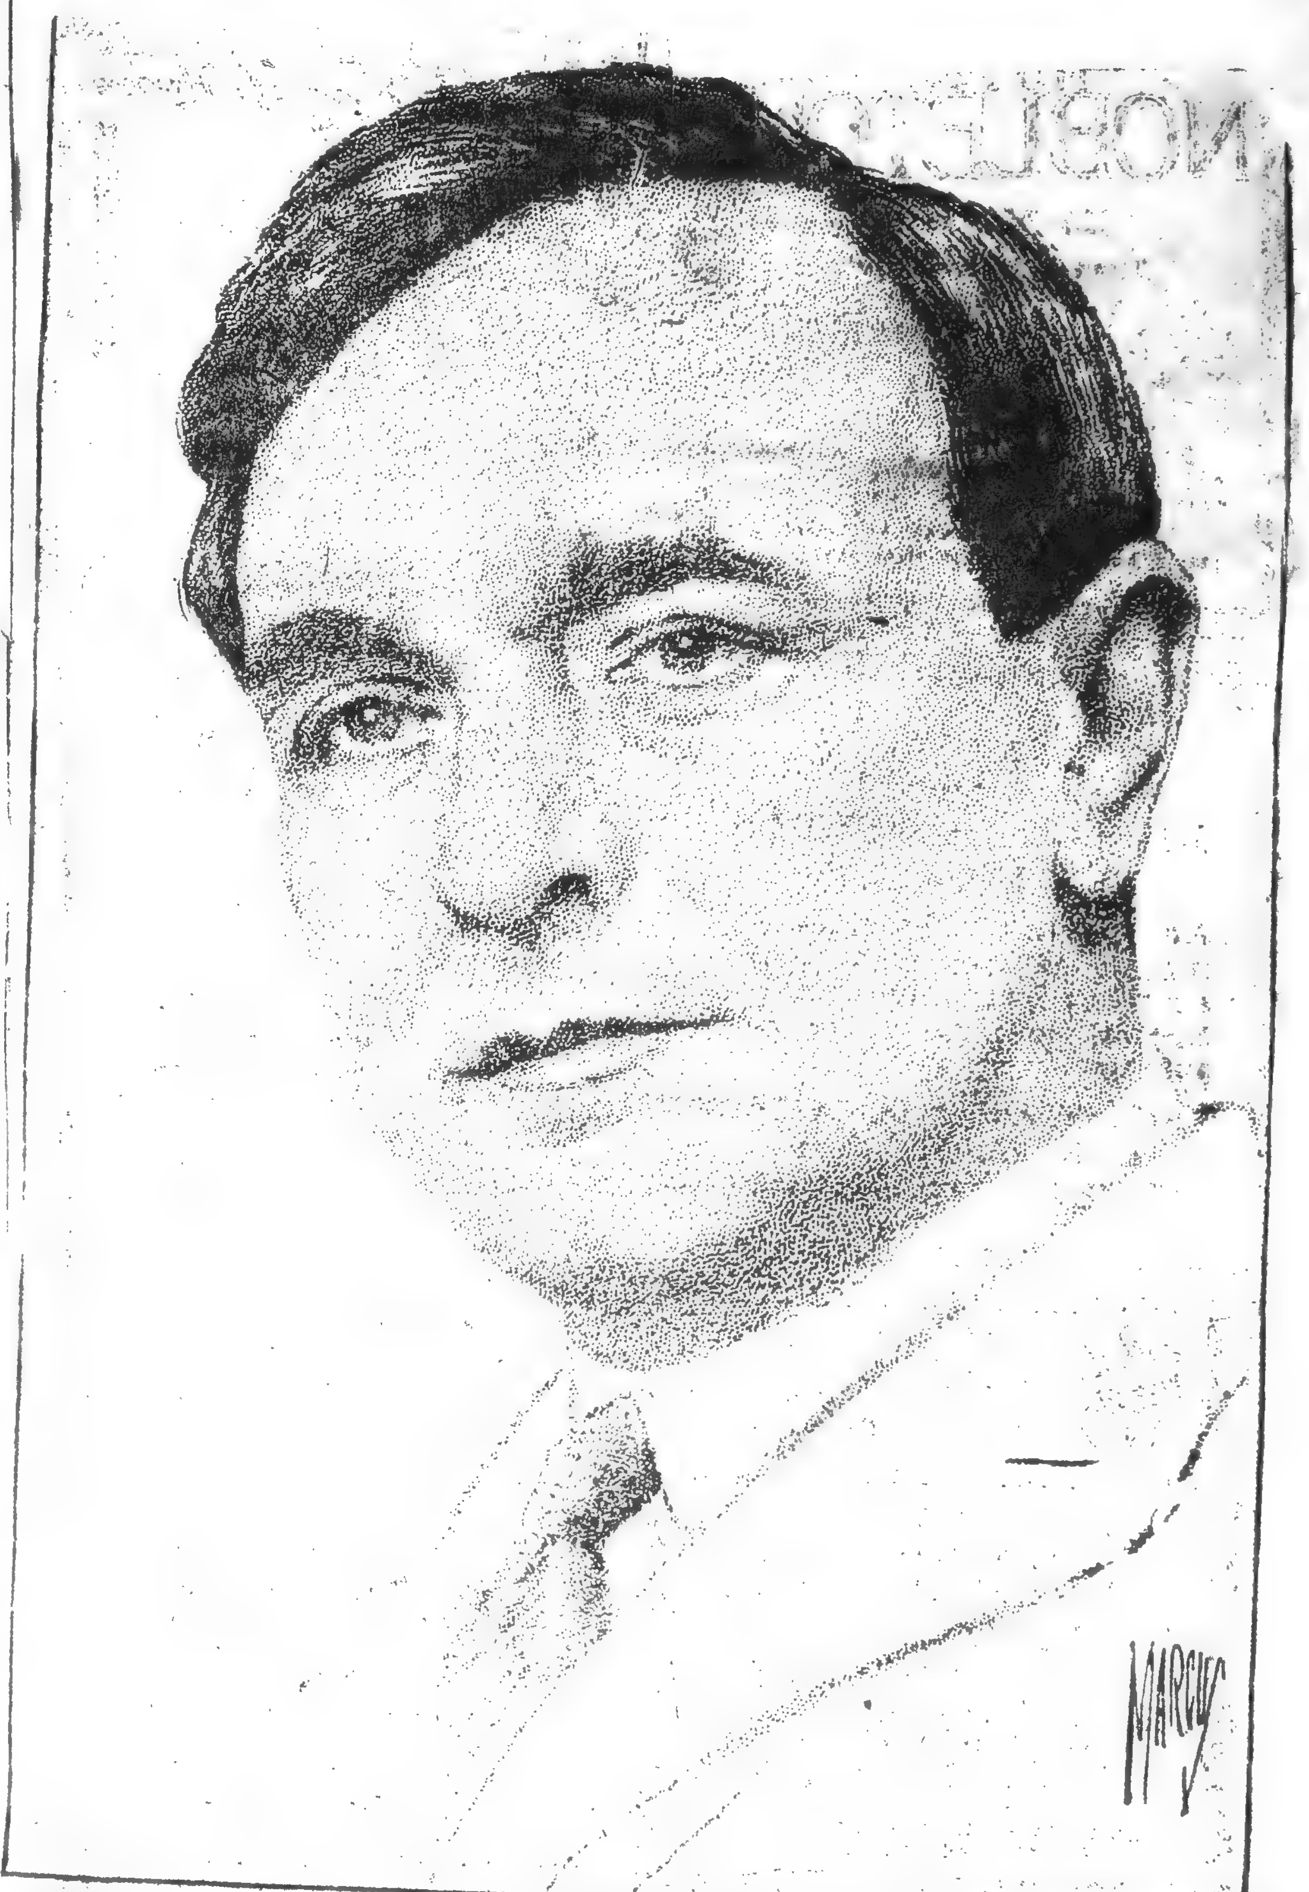
Oct.

NEW YORK
TIMES

Pierre Monteux has been decorated by France with the ribbon of a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, in token of his work for French art in America. Mr. Monteux is returning to Boston this month with much new music, to prepare for the season's opening in Symphony Hall on Oct. 12, as well as here in Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy at the end of November. To Monteux's four years of tireless effort an official note ascribes the present high qualities of tone and ensemble of the Boston Orchestra. It adds that in serving now for a fifth season he will complete one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony conductors.

NEW YORK
TIMES

S 16 '23



Drawn From a Paris Photograph. Courtesy of the Musical Digest.
Serge Kussevitzky, Coming in 1924 to Boston Orchestra.

By its capture of the Russian conductor, Serge Kussevitzky, for a term beginning 1924 and thereafter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a prospect of far-reaching interest to concertgoers in America. The singular virtuoso of bass-viol, who made himself a welcome guest conductor in the capitals of Europe, has been "heard," or his performances have been heard, by American travelers who have brought back no common report of the man and his activities. His coming here in person next year should introduce a personality of potential appeal unmatched since the departure of Toscanini or the rise of Stokowski to name but two recent stars of the baton.

Kussevitzky, born in 1874 near Tver, between Novgorod and Moscow, was as a youth in Berlin the founder of Union for Advancement of Russian Composers. His orchestra gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd. Each Spring he instituted festivals. He even chartered a steamer, and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music.

When the revolution scattered his men he became leader briefly of the Russian State Orchestra, and since 1920 has been in Western Europe as guest conductor with the London Symphony and for three years at the Concerts Kussevitzky and the Opéra in Paris.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE

16 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE

SEP 16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will begin its forty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12, a circular announces. The season calls for twenty-four Friday afternoon and as many Saturday evening concerts. The following list of soloists is announced: Sigrid Onegin, Jacques Thibaud, Marya Freund, Mitja Nikisch, Pablo Casals, Eva Gauthier, Paul Flesch, E. Robert Schmitz, Elisabeth Rethberg, Harold Bauer, Roland Hayes, Lionel Tertis, Moriz Rosenthal, Vera Janacopulos.

[128]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

SEP 16 1923

Koussevitzky Conductor of 1924 Boston Symphony.

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long conspicuous as a fine conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become a striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a large one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern. One series included the complete orchestral work of Beethoven.

Koussevitzky here acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera and thence take him to England and Scotland.

PHILADELPHIA
PA.
N. AMERICAN

SEP 16 1923

KOUSSEVITZKY TO LEAD THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Sept. 15.—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors.

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
~~STAR~~
Post

SEP 16 1923

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's ability and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

NEW YORK HERALD

1 OCTOBER

A New Symphony Conductor.

New York is almost as much interested as Boston in the personality of the man selected to stand at the head of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra began to visit New York soon after its organization. It rapidly made friends. Whether the late ARTHUR NIKISCH or WILHELM GERICKE was its conductor, interest in its concerts never waned. After the retirement of Dr. MUCK, however, the orchestra lost some of its hold on its old audiences. Now PIERRE MONTEUX is to return after this year to resume his duties in France, and SERGE KUSSEVITSKY, a noted Russian conductor, will take his place.

The Philharmonic Society of New York had a Russian as its conductor in WASSILY SAFONOFF, who was truly Muscovite in his musical tastes and in his interpretations. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, who has brought the Detroit Orchestra up to a high artistic level, is a Russian, and LEOPO STOJOWSKI, who has made the Philadelphia Orchestra famous, is of Polish birth on his father's side. Yet the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not until the engagement of SERGE KUSSEVITSKY had a conductor of Russian origin and fame.

KUSSEVITSKY has during the past few years delighted Paris with his achievements as a musician. Previously he devoted his talents and his fortune to traveling up and down the Volga with his orchestra in a huge boat, playing at various river towns for the inhabitants who might otherwise have been without orchestral music. His reputation as a musician of sound attainments was gained so long ago that his call to Boston can [illegible] result of the presen [illegible] prejudice in favor of Russian art. He is known as a conductor of genuine talent and cultivation.

WALTER DAMROSCH, who is altogether American although he was born in Breslau, invited ALFRED COATES, who is partly Russian by blood and more so by cultivation, to conduct some of the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra last year. WILLEM MENGELBERG is a Dutchman and so is WILLEM VAN HOOGSTRATEN who is to be at the head of the Philharmonic Orchestra this year. The merger of several orchestras has reduced the number of foreign conductors and the old time German preponderance in this department of music has decreased. BRUNO WALTER is to return for another season and ARTUR BODANZKY will be heard again as a conductor both in opera and concert. PIERRE MONTEUX remains during the approaching season and then the arrival of KUSSEVITSKY will introduce a new influence in American orchestral existence.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept. 20 - 1923

BOSTON PRESS ACCLAIMS SELECTION OF KOUSSEVITZKY FOR SYMPHONY POST

Critics Review Russian's Career and Anticipate His Coming—Other Boston News

Boston, Mass., September 16.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a popular local institution and one of the city's major glories. Quite naturally, therefore, Judge Cabot's announcement that Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, had been engaged to succeed Mr. Monteux as leader of the orchestra beginning next season, confirming the MUSICAL COURIER scoop of the previous week, was given a conspicuous position on the front page of most of the newspapers here last Monday. In addition to the official announcement that appeared in the press, the more important critics commented on the appointment in a manner which augurs well for the reception which will be accorded Mr. Koussevitzky when he enters upon his duties here in the fall of 1924. Thus, Olin Downes, in today's Sunday Post, hails the Russian as "artistically the man of the hour"; and, after quoting a very laudatory criticism from the London Morning Post, which extols his brilliant leadership and vivid interpretations, Mr. Downes adds:

> There is another reason why the appointment of Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony is welcome to music lovers of this city. His coming marks the end of a period in which the musical destinies of the orchestra were dominated first by Germans, and then by the French.
>
> Before the war, with a single exception of the Hungarian Nikisch, all the symphony conductors were German. Since the war they have been French. It is even stated, in reliable quarters, that Paris had much to do in 1919 with stopping negotiations begun with a view of bringing the great Italian, Arturo Toscanini, to Symphony Hall. It was intimated from Paris, it seems, that it would be a shame to injure by ever so little the "cordiale entente" between France and America through bringing an Italian to lead the celebrated orchestra.
>
> It is true that the Frenchmen, Rabaud and Monteux, have shown themselves as musicians and men infinitely broader in their point of view, infinitely less chauvinistic, than the Germans, and very sensitive musicians. But it is time that no national group should color musical affairs at Symphony Hall, and in native breadth of view, enthusiasm and receptivity to new ideas, from wherever they spring, the Russian is most like the American.
>
> There are not lacking good grounds for the belief that artistically he is the man of the future, while European nations tend far more to the spirit of the past. In a period when Russian art of every kind, Russian literature, drama, painting, dancing are coming into their own here by strides and leaps, a musician of Mr. Koussevitzky's nationality and personal powers should find a particularly sympathetic public and prove at least a leader of striking characteristics and excitements.

Less restrained in his expression of approval, H. T. Parker maliciously captioned a photograph of Mr. Koussevitzky "Russian Savior," used three columns of praise from the foreign press and the following article:

> Contrary to much precedent, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce a succeeding conductor a full year before the succession begins. Mr. Monteux's term as present director will end in May of next year. In the following autumn, Serge Koussevitzky, cosmopolitan Russian, will take over the band. Usually such tidings have been withheld until the spring in which the departing leader takes leave. In this instance "unavoidable circumstances" [why not the truth, viz., the MUSICAL COURIER scoop?] have altered cases. Engagements into which Mr. Koussevitzky long since entered in Paris will compel the speedy announcement there of his departure a year hence to Boston. Forthwith the news of his accession to the Symphony Orchestra would be broad-spread. Wisely the powers of Symphony Hall preferred to do their own heralding in their own way. Hence the publishing in September, 1923, of an event of October, 1924. In their haste some will question the fairness to Mr Monteux of such long anticipation of his successor. Yet the glamor of departure and the fervor of farewell may warm both him and his audiences. In Boston and in other familiar cities he will amply deserve them.
>
> Whether Mr. Monteux wished another term as conductor at Symphony Hall, none but him may confidently say. As some of his friends began to repeat last winter, he is minded to return to Paris; to live at leisure for a while; ultimately to resume work in Parisian concert halls or opera houses. As some of his more ardent and exclamatory partisans will aver, he should have been retained under all conditions and costs. Other points of view have prevailed in the councils of the trustees and similar "high quarters." Possibly, they counted five successive years sufficient term, as often in the past, for any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of that time, even under Dr. Muck, came audible decline in the reciprocal energies of conductor and players. Possibly again, it seemed advisable to mate the restored orchestra with the ablest and the most applauded of the middle generation of conductors in Europe.
>
> After the quiet abilities and devotions of Mr. Monteux, wisdom may have pointed the way to a more vivid, vehement and generally more salient figure upon the stages of Symphony and Carnegie Halls. Above all, audiences in the United States [illegible] conductors what they call "personality." Therein Mr. Koussevitzky abounds. It plays over his versions of the classics. It expands warmly upon the "modernists." It is stirred by much music betwixt and between. Furthermore, a certain disposition is discernible in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of the [illegible] conquests of the late war and to count it as a dependency, henceforth and forever, of Parisian conductors. The cosmopolitan Monteux, free from every Gallic limitation, did much to dissipate this illusion. With the choice of the Russian, Koussevitzky, the latter vanishes. To Paris, as well as to Berlin, it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice.
>
> Hereunder much is printed in description, in praise and in more reserved judgment of Mr. Koussevitzky. With allowance for every doubt and distaste, there is no questioning his high fitness for the new post. His reputation as a conductor of the first rank now runs the length and breadth of Europe. To general and particular plaudits he has exercised his powers upon many orchestras before many audiences. The more conservative and the more radical musicians and amateurs have joined hands and voices to extol him. Quickly he sways and moulds players. As swiftly hearers react to him. Beyond peradventure, he is vivid and vitalizing upon all things and all men that he touches. It is possible to question this or that intensity, but never the sincere energies that have heated and winged it. Beyond aught else, by every sign of his past, he will accept, continue and maintain the standards that Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux set for the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has ear and force. He knows both strength and sensibility. He is as eager for the newest and boldest modern piece as for the oldest and most venerated classic. He knows variety. He is aware of balance. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra enjoys a nearly perfect freedom. As free is Mr. Koussevitzky's musical mind. As freely will run the scope of his concerts. To a "modernist" in the best sense of the word succeeds another "modernist." There is no step backward. H. T. P.

Not so enthusiastic was Philip Hale in last Thursday's Herald. A warm admirer of Mr. Monteux it was not to be expected that he would share the enthusiasm of his colleagues. His comment follows:

> So Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1924-25. Many will be interested in the exact pronunciation of his name.
>
> When Arthur Nikisch appeared at the first rehearsal of his first season he expressed his delight at the technical proficiency and euphony of the orchestra. "Why, all I'll have to do will be to poetize," he exclaimed. Mr. Koussevitzky will be equally, if not more, fortunate, for he will have for his instrument the superb orchestra that is wholly the work of Pierre Monteux.
>
> Some, no doubt, will timorously ask whether Mr. Koussevitzky is a bolshevik. He is said to be rather sensational in the concert hall, a man of now imposing, now wild gestures. If this is so, he will surely please all those who attend concerts to see a conductor and incidentally to hear his interpretations. His programs in London and Paris have been of a Catholic and interesting nature. As was to be expected, he favors Stravinsky and other ultra-modern composers, but not exclusively.

The consensus of opinion among people who are interested in the musical standing of Boston is that while Mr. Monteux merits praise for his reorganization of the orchestra, the selection of Mr. Koussevitzky as his successor is a step forward in the history of this famous orchestra.

Mr Monteux has announced some of the novelties and important revivals he plans to introduce into this season's symphony programs. Skriabin's "The Divine Poem," which was not given last year because it demands eight horns, can be played this season, since new players have been added to the orchestra. Beethoven's Choral Symphony, in which the Harvard Glee Club will aid; Mahler's First Symphony, Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps," Debussy's "Martyrdom of St Sebastien," an excerpt from Aubert's "Blue Forest" are promised.

New composers hitherto unrepresented on the Symphony programs include Pfitzner, and Bela Bartok, Schoenberg, Schreker, Goossens, Bridge, Malipiero, Honegger, Respighi, Roussel, de Falla, and other modernists are to be represented on the programs. It is said that Mr Monteux feels that one new piece per program is about all that an audience will care for.

GLOBE Oct. 7.

Those to whom the departure of Mr. Monteux from the Symphony Orchestra next spring is still a nine days' wonder and chagrin, should recall that when his present contract with the Trustees was signed two years ago, there was clear understanding that it would not be renewed. As much was printed at the time in these columns.

Mr. Arthur Brooke, long the second flute-player of the Symphony Orchestra, has passed to the Chicago Orchestra as first flute-player. Many will recall him also as "announcer" at The Pops of changes in the programme or other deviations from routine. Why this task fell to him, no one has ever explained; but he was straightforward and audible. H. T. P.

TRANS.-Oct. 8.

"Rush" Seats Advance

Another sign of the time is the raising of the prices for the "rush" seats in the second balcony of Symphony Hall, which have hitherto been sold on the day of the concert to the first 525 patrons for 25 cents each. The price of these seats has become 50 cents, a price still very modest, within the reach of all who really want the music, and, indeed, very little for what is given. Nor shall we refrain from pointing out again, in this place, the extraordinary bargain for any lover of music offered by the prices of season tickets for the Boston symphony concerts. The cheapest tickets are $18 for 24 concerts. The most expensive seats are $42 for the same number of performances. These performances are given by a leading orchestra of the world, with the greatest artists known to public for soloists. The highest-priced seats come to less than $2 per performance, while the cheapest seats bring the price down to about 75 cents per concert.

POST OCT. 7.

MR. MONTEUX SETS THE COURSE FOR A SYMPHONIC YEAR

THE CONDUCTOR'S WAYS ABOUT PROGRAMMES

The Standards He Has Quietly Set and Firmly Maintained—Public and Pieces—His Summer Lists and Winter Progress—Large Adventures and Novel Pieces for the New Season

WHATEVER course the Symphony Concerts may take after Mr. Monteux's departure, one mark, set by him upon them, may hardly be erased. Russian, French, German, Italian, even American, conductors may succeed each other and each frame his programmes according to his idiosyncrasies and lights. None the less, it seems safe to say that these lists will not forego the breadth of view, the catholicity of choice, now become a standard of "these concerts." Gradually he has persuaded into consciousness of a programme a public divided on this score between loose notions or case-hardened prepossessions. Some ask only that a few pieces amuse them on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening at Symphony Hall and care not a jot whether the entertainers—for so they regard composers—be the enskied Beethoven or the earth-bound [illegible]egger. The "tired business man"—the brothers—and the drowsy dowagers—their sisters, cousins and aunts—regard all pieces askance that are not easy, tranquil, familiar "listening." At bottom, the pleasure from a concert is the pleasure of a bedtime story. At the other extreme stand the studiously serious. They [illegible] scores; they peruse programme-books [illegible] the last footnote about the great-grandfather of the substituted tenor who sang in the fifth performance at [illegible] 1871, of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Sometimes they seem to approve a programme in the proportion in which their [illegible] "run over" the numbers on their [illegible] Therefore is Haydn more delectable than Strauss or Respighi. Add [illegible] categories the case-hardened [illegible] who regard almost any music [illegible] the eighteen-nineties as a breach of [illegible] peace; and the equally [illegible]

[129]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

SEP 16 1923

Koussevitzky Conductor of 1924 Boston Symphony.

JUDGE FREDERICK P. CABOT, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long conspicuous as a fine conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become a striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's abilities and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

Mr. Monteux is expected to return from France in the latter part of this month with a number of new scores which he found in Europe during the summer. He will then immediately begin rehearsals in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 12. His family have left Boston and made their home once more in Paris, where Mr. Monteux will rejoin them at the conclusion of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver (in northern Russia) in 1874. He was first taught music by his parents, and at twelve conducted the orchestra in the Municipal Theater of his native town. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory, having made a particular study of the double bass, and it was as a virtuoso of this instrument that he became a member of the Moscow Imperial Opera Orchestra and likewise toured Europe.

At length he concentrated all his energies upon conducting. He organized an orchestra in Berlin, and, in 1909, a large one in Moscow. Here he assembled the best players Russia afforded; he subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free and his enterprise entirely artistic.

It was here that Mr. Koussevitzky revealed the characteristics in which he has excelled ever since—constructive ability, brilliant leadership and disinterested devotion to the promulgation of the best music, both old and new. He gave series of concerts in Moscow and Petrograd, and traveled over Russia with his orchestra. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave town after town an introduction to symphonic music. Each spring he instituted festivals in which each concert was devoted to a single composer. The composers ranged from Bach to the most modern. One series included the complete orchestral work of Beethoven.

Koussevitzky here acquired his reputation as a champion of true genius in the music of the day, whether by a Russian or another composer. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his own orchestra but not of his energies; he was appointed for a considerable time conductor of the Russian State Orchestra which superseded the Imperial Orchestra of the old regime.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. In Paris he organized what came to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts," and which he has given for the last three years. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris. His engagements for the coming season will begin in Berlin, extend to Prague, include a season at the Paris Opera, and thence take him to England and Scotland.

PHILADELPHIA
PA.
N. AMERICAN

SEP 16 1923

KOUSSEVITZKY TO LEAD THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Sept. 15.—Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony Orchestra conductors.

WASHINGTON,
D. C.
~~STAR~~

SEP 16 1923

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, annonces the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, beginning with the autumn of 1924.

Long the most conspicuous conductor in Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky has in the last three seasons been active in western Europe. In this time he has become the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, as an artist of impassioned convictions. He will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

Mr. Koussevitzky will directly succeed Pierre Monteux, whose pending season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be his fifth, one of the longer terms in the succession of Boston Symphony orchestra conductors. The present qualities of tone and ensemble in the Boston Symphony concerts are attributed to Mr. Monteux's ability and his indefatigable efforts through four seasons.

NEW [illegible]

[illegible] OCTOB[illegible]

A New Symphony Conductor.

New York is almost as much interested as Boston in the personality of the man selected to stand at the head of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra began to visit New York soon after its organization. It rapidly made friends. Whether the late ARTHUR NIKISCH or WILHELM GERICKE was its conductor, interest in its concerts never waned. After the retirement of DR. MUCK, however, the orchestra lost some of its hold on its old audiences. Now PIERRE MONTEUX is to return after this year to resume his duties in France, and SERGE KUSSEVITSKY, a noted Russian conductor, will take his place.

The Philharmonic Society of New York had a Russian as its conductor in WASSILY SAFONOFF, who was truly Muscovite in his musical tastes and in his interpretations. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, who has brought the Detroit Orchestra up to a high artistic level, is a Russian, and LEOPOLD STOJOWSKI, who has made the Philadelphia Orchestra famous, is of Polish birth on his father's side. Yet the Boston Symphony Orchestra had not until the engagement of SERGE KUSSEVITSKY had a conductor of Russian origin and fame.

KUSSEVITSKY has during the past few years delighted Paris with h achievements as a musician. Pre viously he devoted his talents and hi fortune to traveling up and down th Volga with his orchestra in a hug boat, playing at various river town for the inhabitants who might other wise have been without orchestra music. His reputation as a musicia of sound attainments was gained s long ago that his call to Boston can be thought a result of the presen rejudice in favor of Russian art. He is known as a conductor of gen ine talent and cultivation.

WALTER DAMROSCH, who is alto ether American although he was orn in Breslau, invited ALFRED OATES, who is partly Russian by lood and more so by cultivation, to onduct some of the concerts of the ew York Symphony Orchestra last ear. WILLEM MENGELBERG is a utchman and so is WILLEM VAN OOGSTRATEN who is to be at the ead of the Philharmonic Orchestra his year. The merger of several or hestras has reduced the number of oreign conductors and the old time erman preponderance in this de artment of music has decreased. BRUNO WALTER is to return for an ther season and ARTUR BODANZKY will be heard again as a conductor both in opera and concert. PIERRE MONTEUX remains during the approaching season and then the arrival of KUSSEVITSKY will introduce a new influence in American orches al existence.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Sept. 20 - 1923

BOSTON PRESS ACCLAIMS SELECTION OF KOUSSEVITZKY FOR SYMPHONY POST

Critics Review Russian's Career and Anticipate His Coming—Other Boston News

Boston, Mass., September 16.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a popular local institution and one of the city's major glories. Quite naturally, therefore, Judge Cabot's announcement that Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, had been engaged to succeed Mr. Monteux as leader of the orchestra beginning next season, confirming the MUSICAL COURIER scoop of the previous week, was given a conspicuous position on the front page of most of the newspapers here last Monday. In addition to the official announcement that appeared in the press, the more important critics commented on the appointment in a manner which augurs well for the reception which will be accorded Mr. Koussevitzky when he enters upon his duties here in the fall of 1924. Thus, Olin Downes, in today's Sunday Post, hails the Russian as "artistically the man of the hour"; and, after quoting a very laudatory criticism from the London Morning Post, which extols his brilliant leadership and vivid interpretations, Mr. Downes adds:

> There is another reason why the appointment of Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony is welcome to music lovers of this city. His coming marks the end of a period in which the musical destinies of the orchestra were dominated first by Germans, and then by the French.
>
> Before the war, with a single exception of the Hungarian Nikisch, all the symphony conductors were German. Since the war they have been French. It is even stated, in reliable quarters, that Paris had much to do in 1919 with stopping negotiations begun with a view of bringing the great Italian, Arturo Toscanini, to Symphony Hall. It was intimated from Paris, it seems, that it would be a shame to injure by ever so little the "cordiale entente" between France and America through bringing an Italian to lead the celebrated orchestra.
>
> It is true that the Frenchmen, Rabaud and Monteux, have shown themselves as musicians and men infinitely broader in their point of view, infinitely less chauvinistic, than the Germans, and very sensitive musicians. But it is time that no national group should color musical affairs at Symphony Hall, and in native breadth of view, enthusiasm and receptivity to new ideas, from wherever they spring, the Russian is most like the American.
>
> There are not lacking good grounds for the belief that artistically he is the man of the future, while European nations tend far more to the spirit of the past. In a period when Russian art of every kind, Russian literature, drama, painting, dancing are coming into their own here by strides and leaps, a musician of Mr. Koussevitzky's nationality and personal powers should find a particularly sympathetic public and prove at least a leader of striking characteristics and excitements.

Less restrained in his expression of approval, H. T. Parker maliciously captioned a photograph of Mr. Koussevitzky "Russian Savior," used three columns of praise from the foreign press and the following article:

> Contrary to much precedent, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announce a succeeding conductor a full year before the succession begins. Mr. Monteux's term as present director will end in May of next year. In the following autumn, Serge Koussevitzky, cosmopolitan Russian, will take over the band. Usually such tidings have been withheld until the spring in which the departing leader takes leave. In this instance "unavoidable circumstances" [why not the truth, viz., the MUSICAL COURIER scoop?] have altered cases. Engagements into which Mr. Koussevitzky long since entered in Paris will compel the speedy announcement there of his departure a year hence to Boston. Forthwith the news of his accession to the Symphony Orchestra would be broad-spread. Wisely the powers of Symphony Hall preferred to do their own heralding in their own way. Hence the publishing in September, 1923, of an event of October, 1924. In their haste some will question the fairness to Mr. Monteux of such long anticipation of his successor. Yet the glamor of departure and the fervor of farewell may warm both him and his audiences. In Boston and in other familiar cities he will amply deserve them.
>
> Whether Mr. Monteux wished another term as conductor at Symphony Hall, none but him may confidently say. As some of his friends began to repeat last winter, he is minded to return to Paris; to live at leisure for a while; ultimately to resume work in Parisian concert halls or opera houses. As some of his more ardent and exclamatory partisans will aver, he should have been [illegible] under all conditions and costs. Other points of view have prevailed [illegible] the trustees and similar "high quarters." Possibly [illegible] councils of [illegible] counted five successive years sufficient term, as often in the past, for any conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of that time, even under Dr. Muck, came audible decline in [illegible] energies of conductor and players. Possibly again, it seemed [illegible] to mate the restored orchestra with the ablest and the most applauded of the middle generation of conductors in Eu[illegible]
>
> After the quiet abilities and devotions of Mr. Monteux, wisdom may have pointed the way to a more [illegible] and generally more salient figure upon the stages [illegible] Carnegie Halls. Above all, audiences in the United States [illegible] conductors what they call "personality." Therein Mr. Kouss[illegible] abounds. It plays over his versions of the classics. It [illegible] firmly upon the "modernists." It is stirred by [illegible] between. Furthermore, a certain disposition [illegible] to regard the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] conquests of the late war and to count [illegible] henceforth and forever, of Parisian conductors. [illegible] Monteux, free from every Gallic limitation, did much [illegible] illusion. With the choice of the Russian, Koussevitzky [illegible] vanishes. To Paris, as well as to Berlin, it is good to [illegible] our free and independent choice.
>
> Hereunder much is printed in description, praise and in more reserved judgment of Mr. Koussevitzky. With allowance for every doubt and distaste, there is no questioning his high fitness for the new post. His reputation as a conductor of the first rank now runs the length and breadth of Europe. To general and particular plaudits he has exercised his powers upon many orchestras before many audiences. The more conservative and the more radical musicians and amateurs have joined hands and voices to extol him. Quickly he sways and moulds players. As swiftly hearers react to him. Beyond peradventure, he is vivid and vitalizing upon all things and all men that he touches. It is possible to question this or that intensity, but never the sincere energies that have heated and winged it. Beyond aught else, by every sign of his past, he will accept, continue and maintain the standards that Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux set for the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky has ear and force. He knows both strength and sensibility. He is as eager for the newest and boldest modern piece as for the oldest and most venerated classic. He knows variety. He is aware of balance. The conductor of the Boston Orchestra enjoys a nearly perfect freedom. As free is Mr. Koussevitzky's musical mind. As freely will run the scope of his concerts. To a "modernist" in the best sense of the word succeeds another "modernist." There is no step backward. H. T. P.

Not so enthusiastic was Philip Hale in last Thursday's Herald. A warm admirer of Mr. Monteux it was not to be expected that he would share the enthusiasm of his colleagues. His comment follows:

> So Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season of 1924-25. Many will be interested in the exact pronunciation of his name.
>
> When Arthur Nikisch appeared at the first rehearsal of his first season he expressed his delight at the technical proficiency and euphony of the orchestra. "Why, all I'll have to do will be to poetize," he exclaimed. Mr. Koussevitzky will be equally, if not more, fortunate, for he will have for his instrument the superb orchestra that is wholly the work of Pierre Monteux.
>
> Some, no doubt, will timorously ask whether Mr. Koussevitzky is a bolshevik. He is said to be rather sensational in the concert hall, a man of now imposing, now wild gestures. If this is so, he will surely please all those who attend concerts to see a conductor and incidentally to hear his interpretations. His programs in London and Paris have been of a Catholic and interesting nature. As was to be expected, he favors Stravinsky and other ultra-modern composers, but not exclusively.

The consensus of opinion among people who are interested in the musical standing of Boston is that while Mr. Monteux merits praise for his reorganization of the orchestra, the selection of Mr. Koussevitzky as his successor is a step forward in the history of this famous orchestra.

"Rush" Seats Advance

Another sign of the time is the raising of the prices for the "rush" seats in the second balcony of Symphony Hall, which have hitherto been sold on the day of the concert to the first 525 patrons for 25 cents each. The price of these seats has become 50 cents, a price still very modest, within the reach of all who really want the music, and, indeed, very little for what is given. Nor shall we refrain from pointing out again, in this place, the extraordinary bargain for any lover of music offered by the prices of season tickets for the Boston symphony concerts. The cheapest tickets are $18 for 24 concerts. The most expensive seats are $65 for the same number of performances. These performances are given by a leading orchestra of the world, with the greatest artists known to public for soloists. The highest-priced seats come to less than $3 per performance, while the cheapest seats bring the price down to about 75 cents per concert.

POST OCT. 7.

Mr Monteux has announced some of the novelties and important revivals he plans to introduce into this season's symphony programs. Skriabin's "The Divine Poem," which was not given last year because it demands eight horns, can be played this season, since new players have been added to the orchestra. Beethoven's Choral Symphony, in which the Harvard Glee Club will aid; Mahler's First Symphony, Strouss' "Sinfonia Domestica," Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps," Debussy's "Martyrdom of St Sebastien," an excerpt from Aubert's "Blue Forest" are promised.

New composers hitherto unrepresented on the Symphony programs include Pfitzner, and Bela Bartok. Shoenberg, Schreker, Goossens, Bridge, Malipiero, Honegger, Respighi, Roussel, de Falla, and other modernists are to be represented on the programs. It is said that Mr Monteux feels that one new piece per program is about all that an audience will care for.

GLOBE Oct-7.

Those to whom the departure of Mr. Monteux from the Symphony Orchestra next spring is still a nine days' wonder and chagrin, should recall that when his present contract with the Trustees was signed two years ago, there was clear understanding that it would not be renewed. As much was printed at the time in these columns.

Mr. Arthur Brooke, long the second flute-player of the Symphony Orchestra, has passed to the Chicago Orchestra as first flute-player. Many will recall him also as "announcer" at The Pops of changes in the programme or other deviations from routine. Why this task fell to him, no one has ever explained; but he was straightforward and audible. H. T. P.

TRANS - Oct. 8.

MR. MONTEUX SETS THE COURSE FOR A SYMPHONIC YEAR

THE CONDUCTOR'S WAYS ABOUT PROGRAMMES

The Standards He Has Quietly Set and Firmly Maintained—Public and Pieces—His Summer Lists and Winter Progress—Large Adventures and Novel Pieces for the New Season

WHATEVER course the Symphony Concerts may take after Mr. Monteux's departure, one mark, set by him upon them, may hardly be erased. Russian, French, German, Italian, even American, conductors may succeed each other and each frame his programmes according to his idiosyncrasies and lights. None the less, it seems safe to say that these lists will not forego the breadth of view the catholicity of choice, now become a standard of "these concerts." Gradually he has persuaded into consciousness of a programme a public divided on that score between loose notions or case-hardened prepossessions. Some ask only that a sequence of pieces amuse them on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening at Symphony Hall and care not a jot whether the entertainer—for so they regard composers—be th enskied Beethoven or the earth-bound Ha egger. The "tired business men"—the brothers—and the drowsy dowagers their sisters, cousins and aunts—rega all pieces askance that are not easy, tra quil, familiar "listening." At bottom, th pleasure from a concert is the pleasure a bedtime story. At the other extr stand the studiously serious. They scores; they peruse programme-books the last footnote about the great-gr grandfather of the substituted tenor w sang in the fifth performance at Gra 1871, of Beethoven's Ninth Symp Sometimes they seem to approve a gramme in the proportion in which the "run over" the numbers on their ow Therefore is Haydn more delectable than Strauss or Respighi. Add to t categories the case-hardened conservat who regard almost any music written the eighteen-nineties as a breach of peace; and the equally amusing rad

Y POST

n Parisian concert nt and exclamatory nder all conditions in the councils of
, they counted five past, for any con-of that time, even iprocal energies of advisable to mate
t applauded of the Monteux, wisdom

ment and generally
nd Carnegie Halls.
in conductors what itzky abounds. It s warmly upon the twixt and between in Paris to regard incidental conquests cy, henceforth and tan Monteux, free this illusion. With tatter vanishes. To m our free and in-praise and in more allowance for every high fitness for the

the first rank now al and particular y orchestras before d, the more radical voices to extol him.
ftly hearers react to ing upon all things estion this or that heated and winged he will accept, con-and Mr. Monteux set nd force. He knows for the newest and
ost venerated classic.
The conductor of the
om. As free is Mr.
run the scope of his
of the word succeeds
l. H. T. P.

---

last Thursday's t was not to be m of his col-

Symphony Orchestra
interested in the exact rehearsal of his first nical proficiency and do will be to poetize,"

, if not more, for-superb orchestra that

Mr. Koussevitzky is l in the concert hall,
If this is so, he will see a conductor and programs in London ting nature. As was tra-modern composers, who are interested

t while Mr. Mon-of the orchestra,
his successor is a us orchestra.

SETS
RSE FOR A
PHONIC YEAR

'S WAYS ABOUT
AMMES

Has Quietly Set and
—Public and Pieces—
and Winter Progress—and Novel Pieces for

ER course the Sym-Concerts may take after onteux's departure, one set by him upon them,
sed. Russian, French, ven American, conduc-ch other and each es according to his
hts. None the less,
that these lists will
th of view the cathow become a stands." Gradually he has cioueness of a proided on that score be-or case-hardened pre-only that a sequence on a Friday afternoon
g at Symphony Hall ether the entertainer composers—be th
the earth-bound Ho business men"—the drowsy dowagers and aunts—rega
t are not easy, tra ng." At bottom, th
ert is the pleasure
At the other extre serious. They programme-books bout the great-gra substituted tenor w rformance at Grat n's Ninth Sympho
m to approve a p rtion in which they ers on their own p nore delectable to t pighi. Add to t rdened conservat

who [illegible] at Stravinsky and end it, say, at Schönberg. Count in those who would be excited and those who would be soothed—and the lot of the conductor as programme-maker is not a happy one.

A theory and a practice [illegible] unquestionably useful in the process. Vague and elastic [illegible] both may be; yet they are a very present help when the public debates and questions. At least, the conductor professes a point of view. Thus, "ages ago," as it seems, Mr. Fiedler was all for diversity and contrast, even when such sorting seemed to achieve only hodge-podge. More recently Mr. Rabaud clung tightly to the accepted Parisian models, since therewith his world began and ended. Dr. Muck, in his best days, professed and practised the "unified" programme, forgetting that logic may become dry and even atmosphere monotonous. If Symphony Hall has never known an excess of moderns—watch out for Mr. Kusevitzky!—it has known too preponderant minor ancients. Wisely Mr. Monteux has published no theories of programme-making. Yet his practice—his wise and modest practice—has long praised him. As persistent as it has been quiet, it bids fair to set an enduring standard.

With even-handed justice Mr. Monteux balances his programmes. The classical masters shall not enter in and possess them, since music is an art in progress as well as an art preserved. No more shall the "modernists" devour them. Geniuses they all are, let us say, yet somehow not above routine and imitation in their new gospelling. In its place, too, shall the middle generation of accepted, but hardly hallowed, composers be kept. Too much of them—and we of the first quarter of the twentieth century are dwelling in the last quarter of the nineteenth. Grant the classics their place, runs Mr. Monteux's persistent practice; but do not play the masterpieces until for band, audience and conductor they become routine. Remember also that this Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann wrote much that is interesting and alive, outside his "standard works." Keep room for the "modernists"; but be careful to choose them where ability and individuality clearly abound. Better such a "new" Englishman or "new" Italian than some of the play-boys of the Parisian Six or the altar-boys of the admirable Schönberg. By all means array in measure Debussy, Ravel, d'Indy, Strauss, Rimsky-Korsakov, the other discoveries of the nineties. Yet there were kings before these Agamemnons and there will be kings after them—though as yet only the most confident of us are quite sure of their names.

Above all, snap the silly bonds of nationality. If the music be worth the hearing, it matters not whether Frenchman or American, German or Englishman, Czech, Slav or Latin wrote it—and wrote it well. The wider the choice the better. Symphony concerts are not museums of music. No more are they laboratories thereof. They are seats of pleasure—and it is pleasure to traverse in them the lengths and the breadths, the foregrounds and the backgrounds of the art they profess. They are also seats of obligation. There and there only may our own good time, writing music according to its impulses and faiths, find voice and test experience. Curiosity about music is good and information as often whets as chastens this passion. Symphony concerts become merely an institution, a formula, when they do not minister to it. From Mr. Monteux's practice, it is possible so to deduce his theories. They are now, they bid fair to remain, a glory of the Boston Orchestra. More individual possession in his vein for pieces that mate well, contrast well, round into a satisfying or stimulating whole. Such arrangement is the spice and salt of his programme-making.

And how does the conductor set about his task, proceed with it, when a hundred-odd concerts—sixty in or about Boston, fifty elsewhere—stretch before him between one October and another May? According to his habit Mr. Monteux avoids either extreme. He does not array and publish a long and fixed schedule of programmes as Mr. Stokowski used to do in Philadelphia, as the conductors of the Philharmonic Society have done this autumn in New York. No more does he let fall his lists at hap-hazard and at the last possible moment—a growing habit upon Dr. Muck in his less ambitious, final years. In his summers, whether he spend them in Europe, in New England or in both, Mr. Monteux exercises a studious, enquiring mind. He has will and leisure to scrutinize the new scores that composers and publishers pile on his table. He can make his deliberate choice among the music of composers to whom he has resolved to give conspicuous place. He can return to the classics to renew old satisfactions and make fresh re-discoveries. He can sort out those baffling, yet insistent "modernists." He can part the composers who are also Americans, from the Americans who believe themselves composers. He can find room at last for this or that piece deferred, waiting and still deserving. As these scrutinies and sortings advance, lists come into being—Symphonies, Overtures, Miscellaneous Pieces, Novelties—and these lists are the skeleton of the programmes for a season. Never was every projected piece brought to hearing in an autumn, a winter and a spring. A conductor whose ambitions did not outrange his opportunity would descend as programme-maker to the level of the repetitious Mengelberg. No more does any list go unamended through a season. What conductor knows what imperative or tempting score may drop on his table the day after tomorrow? A keen judgment, a [illegible] faith may be upset by a single trial in actual rehearsal—and the piece pass forthwith to the shelves of silence. In the choice and the blending of each particular programme come always readjustments.

Yet Mr. Monteux annually works with a [illegible] and in no small measure annually [illegible]ls it. In Boston Mahler and Bruckner [illegible] been of late neglected symphonists. [illegible]e is unclosed debate of their music [illegible]ever it is played outside German[illegible]. Since the late war those lands [illegible]sed it with new warmth and under-[illegible] [illegible] season, w[illegible] anticipation

First [illegible]phony, light, [illegible]—far from the striving grandiosity of many another—stands on Mr. Monteux's list. For Bruckner's contrasts of ecstacy and homeliness, his Seventh Symphony will serve. Since Dr. Muck's day, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," last in the series of his tone-poems has not been played in Boston. It deserves, and it will receive, revival.

For two seasons Mr. Monteux has taken thought of Stravinsky's ballet of primitive and pagan Russia, "The Rite of the Spring." When ten years have not brought it hither, it is unlikely to be mimed and danced in America. In Paris, Mr. Monteux played the music as tone-poem. In Boston, this winter he will play it again, less a few pages that are meaningless apart from setting and action. Only Mr. Stokowski has played it in America—and he misunderstood. Mr. Monteux, in his days with Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, received it from Stravinsky's hands and mind.

Departing, Mr. Monteux would crown his ambitions and his powers with Beethoven by a performance of the Choral Symphony. To it and to the Fifth Symphony, a concert for the Pension Fund is allotted. From Dr. Davison's choirs at Harvard and Radcliffe will come the chorus. It is time to hear again the masterpiece of Ravel—the music of the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." One Suite from it, Mr. Monteux will revive with the invisible chorus as added color and suggestion. Skriabin's mystical and mounting symphonic music Bostonians hardly know. Whither he is pure metal or base, whether he scales the heavens or flings about in sounds and furies, few may surely say. Hence on Mr. Monteux's list Skriabin's "Divine Poem."

Newcomers and unfamiliar comers also knock at the door and Mr. Monteux opens hand to receive them. Of the younger Britons, Arthur Bliss has seldom been heard in America; yet there is no questioning the vitality and the individuality of his music. His one Symphony—"The Color Symphony" of last autumn in England—is here to be introduction for him. The implications of a color, the mood that it expresses, inform each movement. From last season remains Goossens's tone-poem, "The Eternal Rhythm." This time Mr Monteux will not overlook it. By way of Par's we shall hear the gentle Honegger of "A Summer Pastoral"; Roussel's ballet-music of "The Spider's Feast" and his tone-poem of the spring—music that would fuse old ways and new. From Italy, Respighi sends a Suite of artful archaic dances; while Tommasini's tone-poem, "Il Beato Regno," suggested by a like-named picture, also awaits performance. Schreker, the German whom Mr. Monteux led into American concert-halls, stands ready with an Overture that is more tone-poem; while an orchestral fragment of Pfitzner's opera, "Palestrina," pleases the conductor. De Falla, the Spaniard, whose music commingles flavor of the soil and flavor of a personal imagination and skill, promises a manuscript.

So much for novel, relatively novel, and exceptional items on Mr. Monteux's lists. Add to them the more familiar symphony of Rimsky-Korsakov, "Antar"; Debussy's half-remembered "Gigues"; a repetition of Vaughan Williams's "Tallis Variations" of last year; Sir E. Elgar's Overture of London, "Cockagne"; a resurrected Overture of Méhul, probably that to his opera "Joseph"; the return of Mr. Carpenter's fanciful and humorsome "Adventures in a Perambulator" and of Mr. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes"—and enough of Mr. Monteux's new tale is told, His classics, his freshened classics, will speak one after another for themselves. His Americans—Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Gilbert aside—he is yet weighing. Wagner, outside occasional numbers and a full concert for the Pension Fund, he is minded to leave to the returning German Opera.

H. T. P.

TRANS. OCT. 11.

THIS autumn, the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven is favorite piece with the conductors for the beginning of a new year. With it, here in Boston, Mr. Monteux leads his programme for Friday and Saturday. Last evening in New York Mr. Stransky chose it for the birth of his new State Orchestra. With it, a week ago, Mr. Stokowski set the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra under way. For a century, the music has spoken for itself, "lying in the ear of the hearer as the landscape in the eye of the beholder." Yet foolish, fantastical "interpretations" have been studded upon it. A Viennese doctor drove Beethoven to oaths when he discovered the music as "tone-picture of a political revolution." Some, like the estimable d'Indy; would have it a second Pastoral Symphony. Village weddings and "sumptuous odalisques" have been caught hiding in the measures. A few would have it military; and others prefer it chivalrous. Wagner saluted it as "apotheosis of the dance." Mindful also of the pervading rhythmic élan, Mr. Lawrence Gilman would have it a "symphony of motion." He deserves re-printing from the programme-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra:

> Perhaps the seventh is the most beautiful Symphony in the world. Perhaps even those who shy at superlatives will hesitate to dispute the unique compulsions of this music. You fancy, listening to it, that George Herbert might have imagined something not unlike it, when he wrote "My free soul may use her wing." It has the deathless charm of all motion that is unvexed, spontaneous, perfectly released—the flight of wild swans across an autumn sky; the ripple of wind-swept corn; a gale through April woods; the running of mountain water. Beethoven patterned after nature in setting his rhythms to a varying pace. This music is full at times of the ungovernable ecstasy of some primal and magically recovered spring—you may hear in it the sudden laughter of dryads in immemorial woods, the exquisite gayety of the vernal earth; or it has the grave pace of some commemorative ritual.

[130]

And Salome

For the first time in many years at a Symphony Concert, Mr. Monteux is tomorrow reviving the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama to Wilde's text. And here again from a programme-book of the New York Philharmonic Society is Mr. Gilman's graphic [illegible] arch of Galilee. At one side is a gigantic staircase; at the back, an old cistern surrounded by a wall of green bronze. The neurotic Herod cannot take his gaze off his perturbing daughter-in-law; but his wife Herodias, that most unneighborly of operatic consorts, keeps a balefully suspicious eye on him. He has just slipped in the blood of the love-sick suicide, Naraboth, and Herodias has contributed to the general amiability by reminding him that she, of royal race, is married to the son of a camel-driver. Herod assures her that she is a liar, and turns for consolation to Salome, stonily pale and sick with desire—though not for him.

"'Dance for me, Salome!' beseeches Herod. But Salome answers that she has no wish to dance. Herod pleads with her: he promises to give her, if she will dance, whatever she may ask. Salome brightens and bids him swear it. He swears by his life, his crown, his gods. 'You have sworn, Tetrarch,' she says. 'I have sworn, Salome,' answers Herod. He shivers—there is a chill wind on the terrace, the beating of vast wings in the air. . . . No—the wind is not cold, he cries: it is hot, and he is suffocating. Unbearably excited, he cries for water, for air.

"As slaves bring perfumes and the seven veils, and take off the sandals of Salome, the warning voice of Jokanaan is heard from his cistern. Herodias is upset, and would go indoors; but the infatuated Herod declines to move. 'Do not dance, my daughter,' begs Herodias. But Salome pays no heed to her. 'I am ready, Tetrarch,' she announces. 'The musicians begin a wild dance,' say the stage directions in Strauss's score. Salome remains motionless. The music grows quieter at her command. Then Salome begins to dance the Dance of the Seven Veils."

Incidents and Prospects

In vain may the chronicler seek to be comprehensive when he lists the novel numbers that Mr. Monteux destines for the Symphony Concerts. One of moment the recorder is sure to omit. Yesterday, it was a Suite for Orchestra from Bártók, the vivid and vigorous Hungarian whose music makes more and more stir as it journeys westward. A few piano-pieces have hitherto been his lot in Boston and New York.

From the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Monteux has put by for a while Mahler's First Symphony. He does so that he make room for the Sea-Pieces of Frank Bridge, the English composer, now in this country and minded to conduct in his own music. At the concerts of next week, on Oct. 19 and 20, the orchestra will be heard in Rakhmaninov's familiar and lenghty Symphony; in Aubert's glorified "Habanera," new piece to Boston, and in the whirling Overture to Smetana's Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride." Miss Rethberg of the new German generation at the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Beethoven's displayful air, "Ah, Perfido!" and Elisabeth's salute to the Hall of Song in "Tannhäuser."

Uncommonly early in the musical year, the Symphony Orchestra will resume its Concerts for Young People. The first pair are now set for the afternoons of Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 30 and 31, in Symphony Hall, with tickets distributed through the schools of the metropolitan district. The overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz;" an Air and Gavotte of Bach; a fragment of Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus"; Smetana's tone picture of the river Moldau; the plucked Scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; two pieces from Ravel's "Mother Goose"; Berlioz's Rákóczy March, fill a manifold programme.

TRANS. OCT. 11

From OCT 13 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

The Symphonies.

Pierre Monteux arrived from Europe on the Paris last week, bringing with him much new music of interest which he will include upon the programs of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the music now in the library, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be mentioned, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps"); Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honneger, and Ropartz, likewise Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schonberg, Schreker, and Pfitzner; English composers, Eugene Goossens, Arnold Bax, and Frank Bridge; likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok, and the Spaniard, de Falla. Some of this music will of course be included in the ten programs of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York.

AUSPICIOUSLY A SYMPHONY CONCERT RETURNS AGAIN

CONDUCTOR AND ORCHESTRA AT HIGH METTLE

Beethoven and Brahms for Classics, Dukas and Strauss for Moderns—From a Symphony of Motion to the Dance of Salome—Passions of a Peri and Pleasures of Variations

LESS resumed than continued seemed the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon. Once Mr. Monteux had been clapped and clap[illegible]

[illegible] ear disco[illegible] while no[illegible] to the eye. A few new [illegible]covered in the orchestra—among [illegible] in the quartet of flutes, above [illegible] of the tuba-player, among the in[illegible]ents tinkled or smitten, at the will of Dukas or Strauss for a Peri and also for Princess Salome. In the little circle of [illegible] familiar to each frequenter of these afternoon concerts newcomers were also discoverable. In the main, however, the aspect of stage, floor and gallery seemed scarcely changed; while the goings, comings and chatterings of the intermission departed not a whit from a custom. Fewer than usual, however, seemed the late-comers, since on a holiday the progress of motors in town was little hindered; while for early admonition to the wilfully tardy, a reminder about intrusions and restrictions was slipped into every programme-book. Those that scanned the upper gallery to descry whether a doubled price of admission had there lessened numbers found every seat occupied as of old. While the applause for Mr. Monteux entering was general, hearty and long-sustained; while the orchestra was warmly called to its feet at the end of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, conductor and players have many times in the past received as fervent plaudits. In sum, no new year at Symphony Hall has lately begun more quietly—or more auspiciously. As it seemed, the first concert of the present season might have been the twenty-fifth concert of the season past.

In no material respect had Mr. Monteux altered as conductor. In the Symphony of Beethoven—the Symphony that is all tonal motion—he was alert, animated and pliant of rhythm. Good to hear was the light and even swing of the Allegretto; whirling and tumultuous, yet never blurred or rough, was the coursing of the Finale. If the conductor seemed to stay and thicken the hymn-like measures of the Scherzo, he made double and triple amends, when from the germ of a motiv—say in the first movement—a theme expanded into melody and that melody, broadening, deepening, poured into flood through the music. Then, the pace, the accent, the progress of the conductor were as quickening and as glow upon the voice of Beethoven. Beauty of curve, beauty of shading, glamored the Allegretto; crystal-like, yet without brittle hardness, was the phrasing of the Scherzo. The Finale neither skipped too lightly nor stamped too ponderously. Beethoven-wise, it leapt and whirled, man-like in frenzy. A vigorous, full-throated Brahms abounding in energies of creation and contrast spoke from the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

Mr. Monteux's version of the Dance of Salome is version of the Straussian theatre. The music exhales langours, weaves repetitions, sensuously rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smother of sensuality in the full, thick, velvet voices of horns and violoncellos; when he would have his wood-winds bite as with "the little white teeth of Salome" in the old chronicles; when the dance ends in a whirr of trills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered, with every thread of instrumental color. As well, or better, succeeded Mr. Monteux with "The Peri" of Dukes, played as the tone-poem to which, after all, the dancing is accessory. The ear felt the rich pile and texture of the music; the suggestion of motion and color within and without; the eager, or the mournful, ecstasy of contrasting pages, the fineness of means and articulation; the fervors as glowing, yet as remote, as the Peri's cup. Once more the conductor both released and revealed the composer.

Numbed or clouded would have been these pleasures were not the orchestra likewise on its mettle. Warm, smooth, transparent were the wood-winds in the Variations of Brahms, as though the music nestled in the hollow of such beauty. In turn, they bit like acid into copper through sundry measures of Strauss. Time and again in the Seventh Symphony Beethoven asks incisive, leaping strings. As often Dukas would have them pale and piercing or full-throated and lustrous. To each and all these musics the choir answered with the characterizing voice. The newcomers enrich the horns; prove elsewhere skill and sensibility with timbres that are the tintings and the suggestion of Dukas and Strauss. As the orchestra was in the endings of last spring, so now is it in the beginnings of the present autumn—an alert and plastic ensemble, balancing and shading its multifold voices, fusing and parting them, running the gamut of beauty and power, musical in every trait, responsive to every turn of the conductor's will. Though he thicken a clear tone, yet does it obey, as in Beethoven's Scherzo. Though he linger over luscious harmonies as in "The Peri," it sags not. Fortunate are conductor and audience in so responsive, so many-sided instrument.

Fortunate also are composers, since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now give them, their music lives and is charactered. Strauss assembles a vast orchestra for the dance of the slender, star-like Salome. He would wind it in thick or transparent strands. He would have it shiver and sparkle in myriad points and colors. He would have enlaced harmonies caress and parted, isolated harmonies bite. He would use this orchestral magnificence as a cloak—in those heavy middle measures—to a discoverable commonness of invention. He would use this orchestral luminosity, plangency, pungency, to intensify measures of imagination. Above all, he would work through tones, sensations and illusions of the theatre. "Salome dances the dance of the seven veils," says Wilde for once laconic. Only less sparse are Strauss's own stage-directions. The singing-actress spent with toils past, anticipating toils to come, may contribute but little. A substituted dancer fits not the frame, achieves no concentration and cumulation. The music must work the half-sensual, half-tragic spell, and conductor and players be, as they were yesterday, the composer's releasing and animating instruments.

Dukas's music of "The Peri" proceeds, for the most part, in an almost cloying richness. With the Goldmark of Vienna, this Jew of Paris shares the Semitic impulse to sensuous, sumptuous, music, the wine and the oil of tone in thick-coiled India or [illegible] they so drench their m[illegible] Dukas's "danced poem" passed to a [illegible]risian theatre, says the learned and [illegible]haustible compiler of the programme-b[illegible] "the stage of the Chatelet showed mountains, crimson valleys and trees [illegible]ing silver fruit." Dukas would hav[illegible] harmonies give back such colors. [illegible] the flower that the Peri bore in her [illegible] was "a lotus like unto an emerald [illegible] unto snow and gold upon the summ[illegible] [illegible] at sunset." It purpled als[illegible] it faded. Again Dukas bids harmo[illegible] timbres work such illusion upon the [illegible] More: Wagner-wise he would [illegible] music unfold, advance, reced[illegible] thicken and thin, as with the progr[illegible] fable and an action. Yet he would [illegible] it persuade and persist also as musi[illegible] its own sake by virtue of a songful[illegible] possessing melodic power and beauty [illegible] progress. Through "The Peri" he fu[illegible] all these desires in a fullness of a sp[illegible] imagination and illusion that set the [illegible] poem high above his other symp[illegible] pieces. But conductor and orchestra [illegible] be of reciprocating and revealing [illegible] Yesterday, they were.

So also in degree with Brahms of [illegible] Variations and yet more with the S[illegible]phony of Beethoven. Glory be, Mr. M[illegible]teux was, ~~is and~~ still remains intrinsi[illegible] a conductor of modern music, hot-vo[illegible] high colored, rich in textures and rhy[illegible] a-glow in accent, modulation and prog[illegible] Being such, he misses sometimes the ab[illegible] of Brahms to take this simple them[illegible] Haydn or even some fraction, sub-divi[illegible] or suggestion of it and out of no more [illegible] three notes—as they frequently s[illegible] weave periods and paragraphs of [illegible] Brahms thinks, but he also gives [illegible] warmth. There are sparks in his rh[illegible] ardors in his advance. With a lar[illegible] easy gesture he rounds some of these [illegible]ations; with a moody, spirit he [illegible] others. Yet steadily in this nine-fold [illegible] he writes in the blacks and the w[illegible] music; while the average hearer—[illegible] Monteux with him—would have [illegible] more "sensuosity" as the boy in "Clar[illegible] used to put it. Of such are the infir[illegible] of the listening and even the condu[illegible] flesh.

The Seventh Symphony of Beeth[illegible] escapes these cooling shadows becaus[illegible] it through a century have persisted a [illegible]petual heat and light. Strauss imagi[illegible] and in degree achieving the wildnes[illegible] Salome's dance, pales beside the fren[illegible] of the leaping, shouting, infinitely g[illegible]dened Beethoven of this Finale: [illegible] Chaikovsky's aspiring orgies become [illegible] sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. [illegible] twenty minutes before, that same B[illegible] has carved the lines of his Allegretto [illegible] in flowing yet chiselled relief of [illegible] Those who would know from rill to fl[illegible] the progress of a melody through bea[illegible] into power, have but to listen to Beetho[illegible] beginning, broadening, deepening [illegible] Symphony. Recall steps of earth and [illegible] of heaven as they divide the Sche[illegible] Page after page of Beethoven has lost [illegible] for—twentieth-century ears; but thro[illegible] the Seventh Symphony still pulse a [illegible]ereign sway and masterdom."

H. T.

TRANS. OCT. 13

RETHBERG, SOLOIST

Elisabeth Rethberg, who was considered in New York the most important new soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season, will make her Boston debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the second pair of concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20.

The prima donna will sing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," and the principal aria of Elisabeth from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

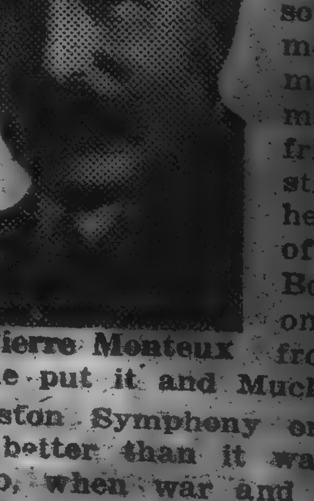
TRAV. OCT. 13

43D SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS

Monteux Gives Brilliant Reading of Ballet Numbers

By E. F. HARKINS

Starting his final term as Symphony conductor, Pierre Monteux was cordially greeted yesterday at the opening of the famous orchestra's 43rd season.



Pierre Monteux

A likeable personality has this modest Frenchman, who has made a host of friends while he struggled at the herculean task of keeping the Boston Symphony in the forefront, where Gericke put it and Muck left it. The Boston Symphony orchestra today is better than it was three years ago, when war and internal strife had dragged it from its high estate. Monteux, just back from Europe, says it excels any orchestra he heard abroad. Its match, if it has a match, is to be found in this country, which has made prodig[illegible] strides ahead in the orchestral [illegible] in recent years.

TWO BALLET NUMBERS

The best part of the performa[illegible] yesterday came with the final num[illegible]ber, Salome's dance, from Richa[illegible] Strauss' "Salome," an opera ba[illegible] from all Puritanical cities, al[illegible]

Y POST

X SETS
RSE FOR A
PHONIC YEAR

'S WAYS ABOUT
RAMMES

Has Quietly Set and Public and Pieces—
and Winter Progress—
Novel Pieces for

---

who begin music at Stravinsky and end it, say, at Schönberg. Count in those who would be excited and those who would be soothed—and the lot of the conductor as programme-maker is not a happy one.

A theory and a practice [illegible] unquestionably useful in the process. Vague and elastic [illegible] both may be; yet they are a very present help when the public debates and questions. At least, the conductor professes a point of view. Thus, "ages ago," as it seems, Mr. Fiedler was all for diversity and contrast, even when such sorting seemed to achieve only hodge-podge. More recently Mr. Rabaud clung tightly to the accepted Parisian models, since therewith his world began and ended. Dr. Muck, in his best days, professed and practised the "unified" programme, forgetting that logic may become dry and even atmosphere monotonous. If Symphony Hall has never known an excess of moderns—watch out for Mr. Kusevitzky!—it has known too preponderant minor ancients. Wisely Mr. Monteux has published no theories of programme-making. Yet his practice—his wise and modest practice—has long praised him. As persistent as it has been quiet, it bids fair to set an enduring standard.

With even-handed justice Mr. Monteux balances his programmes. The classical masters shall not enter in and possess them, since music is an art in progress as well as an art preserved. No more shall the "modernists" devour them. Geniuses they all are, let us say, yet somehow not above routine and imitation in their new gospelling. In its place, too, shall the middle generation of accepted, but hardly hallowed, composers be kept. Too much of them—and we of the first quarter of the twentieth century are dwelling in the last quarter of the nineteenth. Grant the classics their place, runs Mr. Monteux's persistent practice; but do not play the masterpieces until for band, audience and conductor they become routine. Remember also that this Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann wrote much that is interesting and alive, outside his "standard works." Keep room for the "modernists"; but be careful to choose them where ability and individuality clearly abound. Better such a "new" Englishman or "new" Italian than some of the play-boys of the Parisian Six or the altar-boys of the admirable Schönberg. By all means array in measure Debussy, Ravel, d'Indy, Strauss, Rimsky-Korsakov, the other discoveries of the nineties. Yet there were kings before these Agamemnons and there will be kings after them—though as yet only the most confident of us are quite sure of their names.

Above all, snap the silly bonds of nationality. If the music be worth the hearing, it matters not whether Frenchman or American, German or Englishman, Czech, Slav or Latin wrote it—and wrote it well. The wider the choice the better. Symphony concerts are not museums of music. No more are they laboratories thereof. They are seats of pleasure—and it is pleasure to traverse in them the lengths and the breadths, the foregrounds and the backgrounds of the art they profess. They are also seats of obligation. There and there only may our own good time, writing music according to its impulses and faiths, find voice and test experience. Curiosity about music is good and information as often whets as chastens this passion. Symphony concerts become merely an institution, a formula, when they do not minister to it. From Mr. Monteux's practice, it is possible so to deduce his theories. They are now, they bid fair to remain, a glory of the Boston Orchestra. More individual possession in his vein for pieces that mate well, contrast well, round into a satisfying or stimulating whole. Such arrangement is the spice and salt of his programme-making.

And how does the conductor set about his task, proceed with it,, when a hundred-odd concerts—sixty in or about Boston, fifty elsewhere—stretch before him between one October and another May? According to his habit Mr. Monteux avoids either extreme. He does not array and publish a long and fixed schedule of programmes as Mr. Stokowski used to do in Philadelphia, as the conductors of the Philharmonic Society have done this autumn in New York. No more does he let fall his lists at hap-hazard and at the last possible moment—a growing habit upon Dr. Muck in his less ambitious, final years. In his summers, whether he spend them in Europe in New England or in both, Mr. Monteux exercises a studious, enquiring mind. He has will and leisure to scrutinize the new scores that composers and publishers pile on his table. He can make his deliberate choice among the music of composers to whom he has resolved to give conspicuous place. He can return to the classics to renew old satisfactions and make fresh re-discoveries. He can sort out those baffling, yet insistent "modernists." He can part the composers who are also Americans, from the Americans who believe themselves composers. He can find room at last for this or that piece deferred, waiting and still deserving. As these scrutinies and sortings advance, lists come into being—Symphonies, Overtures, Miscellaneous Pieces, Novelties—and these lists are the skeleton of the programmes for a season. Never was every projected piece brought to hearing in an autumn, a winter and a spring. A conductor whose ambitions did not outrange his opportunity would descend as programme-maker to the level of the repetitious Mengelberg. No more does any list go unamended through a season. What conductor knows what imperative or tempting score may drop on his table the day after tomorrow? A keen judgment, a warm faith may be upset by a single trial in actual rehearsal—and the piece pass forthwith to the shelves of silence. In the choice and the blending of each particular programme come always readjustments.

Yet Mr. Monteux annually works with a list and in no small measure annually fulfils it. In Boston Mahler and Bruckner have been of late neglected symphonists. There is unclosed debate of their music wherever it is played outside German lands. Since the late war those lands have heard it with new warmth and under- [illegible] With reason, with anticipation [illegible] also. [illegible] First Symphony, light, graceful, [illegible] far from the striving grandiosity of many another—stands on Mr. Monteux's list. For Bruckner's contrasts of ecstacy and homeliness, his Seventh Symphony will serve. Since Dr. Muck's day, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," last in the series of his tone-poems has not been played in Boston. It deserves, and it will receive, revival.

For two seasons Mr. Monteux has taken thought of Stravinsky's ballet of primitive and pagan Russia, "The Rite of the Spring." When ten years have not brought it hither, it is unlikely to be mimed and danced in America. In Paris, Mr. Monteux played the music as tone-poem. In Boston, this winter he will play it again, less a few pages that are meaningless apart from setting and action. Only Mr. Stokowski has played it in America—and he misunderstood. Mr. Monteux, in his days with Diaghilev's Russian Ballet, received it from Stravinsky's hands and mind.

Departing, Mr. Monteux would crown his ambitions and his powers with Beethoven by a performance of the Choral Symphony. To it and to the Fifth Symphony, a concert for the Pension Fund is allotted. From Dr. Davison's choirs at Harvard and Radcliffe will come the chorus. It is time to hear again the masterpiece of Ravel—the music of the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." One Suite from it, Mr. Monteux will revive with the invisible chorus as added color and suggestion. Skriabin's mystical and mounting symphonic music Bostonians hardly know. Whither he is pure metal or base, whether he scales the heavens or flings about in sounds and furies, few may surely say. Hence on Mr. Monteux's list Skriabin's "Divine Poem."

Newcomers and unfamiliar comers also knock at the door and Mr. Monteux opens hand to receive them. Of the younger Britons, Arthur Bliss has seldom been heard in America; yet there is no questioning the vitality and the individuality of his music. His one Symphony—"The Color Symphony" of last autumn in England—is here to be introduction for him. The implications of a color, the mood that it expresses, inform each movement. From last season remains Goossens's tone-poem, "The Eternal Rhythm." This time Mr Monteux will not overlook it. By way of Paris we shall hear the gentle Honegger of "A Summer Pastoral"; Roussel's ballet-music of "The Spider's Feast" and his tone-poem of the spring—music that would fuse old ways and new. From Italy, Respighi sends a Suite of artful archaic dances; while Tommasini's tone-poem, "Il Beato Regno," suggested by a like-named picture, also awaits performance. Schreker, the German whom Mr. Monteux led into American concert-halls, stands ready with an Overture that is more tone-poem; while an orchestral fragment of Pfitzner's opera, "Palestrina," pleases the conductor. De Falla, the Spaniard, whose music commingles flavor of the soil and flavor of a personal imagination and skill, promises a manuscript.

So much for novel, relatively novel, and exceptional items on Mr. Monteux's lists. Add to them the more familiar symphony of Rimsky-Korsakov, "Antar"; Debussy's half-remembered "Gigues"; a repetition of Vaughan Williams's "Tallis Variations" of last year; Sir E. Elgar's Overture of London, "Cockagne"; a resurrected Overture of Méhul, probably that to his opera "Joseph"; the return of Mr. Carpenter's fanciful and humorsome "Adventures in a Perambulator" and of Mr. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes"—and enough of Mr. Monteux's new tale is told. His classics, his freshened classics, will speak one after another for themselves. His Americans—Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Gilbert aside—he is yet weighing. Wagner, outside occasional numbers and a full concert for the Pension Fund, he is minded to leave to the returning German Opera.

H. T. P.

TRANS. OCT. 11

THIS autumn, the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven is favorite piece with the conductors for the beginning of a new year. With it, here in Boston, Mr. Monteux leads his programme for Friday and Saturday. Last evening in New York Mr. Stransky chose it for the birth of his new State Orchestra. With it, a week ago, Mr. Stokowski set the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra under way. For a century, the music has spoken for itself, "lying in the ear of the hearer as the landscape in the eye of the beholder." Yet foolish, fantastical "interpretations" have been studded upon it. A Viennese doctor drove Beethoven to oaths when he discovered the music as "tone-picture of a political revolution." Some, like the estimable d'Indy, would have it a second Pastoral Symphony. Village weddings and "sumptuous odalisques" have been caught hiding in the measures. A few would have it military; and others prefer it chivalrous. Wagner saluted it as "apotheosis of the dance." Mindful also of the pervading rhythmic élan, Mr. Lawrence Gilman would have it a "symphony of motion." He deserves re-printing from the programme-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra:

> Perhaps the seventh is the most beautiful Symphony in the world. Perhaps even those who shy at superlatives will hesitate to dispute the unique compulsions of this music. You fancy, listening to it, that George Herbert might have imagined something not unlike it, when he wrote "My free soul may use her wing." It has the deathless charm of all motion that is unvexed, spontaneous, perfectly released—the flight of wild swans across an autumn sky; the ripple of wind-swept corn; a gale through April woods; the running of mountain water. Beethoven patterned after nature in setting his rhythms to a varying pace. This music is full at times of the ungovernable ecstasy of some primal and magically recovered spring—you may hear in it the sudden laughter of dryads in immemorial woods, the exquisite gayety of the vernal earth; or it has the grave pace of some commemorative ritual.

And Salome

For the first time in many years at a Symphony Concert, Mr. Monteux is tomorrow reviving the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama to Wilde's text. And here again from a programme-book of the New York Philharmonic Society is Mr. Gilman's graphic [illegible] Tetrarch of Galilee. At one side is a gigantic staircase; at the back, an old cistern surrounded by a wall of green bronze. The neurotic Herod cannot take his gaze off his perturbing daughter-in-law; but his wife Herodias, that most unneighborly of operatic consorts, keeps a balefully suspicious eye on him. He has just slipped in the blood of the love-sick suicide, Narraboth, and Herodias has contributed to the general amiability by reminding him that she, of royal race, is married to the son of a camel-driver. Herod assures her that she is a liar, and turns for consolation to Salome, stonily pale and sick with desire—though not for him.

"'Dance for me, Salome!' beseeches Herod. But Salome answers that she has no wish to dance. Herod pleads with her: he promises to give her, if she will dance, whatever she may ask. Salome brightens and bids him swear it. He swears by his life, his crown, his gods. 'You have sworn, Tetrarch,' she says. 'I have sworn, Salome,' answers Herod. He shivers—there is a chill wind on the terrace, the beating of vast wings in the air. . . . No—the wind is not cold, he cries: it is hot, and he is suffocating. Unbearably excited, he cries for water, for air.

"As slaves bring perfumes and the seven veils, and take off the sandals of Salome, the warning voice of Jokanaan is heard from his cistern. Herodias is upset, and would go indoors; but the infatuated Herod declines to move. 'Do not dance, my daughter,' begs Herodias. But Salome pays no heed to her. 'I am ready, Tetrarch,' she announces. 'The musicians begin a wild dance,' say the stage directions in Strauss's score. Salome remains motionless. The music grows quieter at her command. Then Salome begins to dance the Dance of the Seven Veils."

Incidents and Prospects

In vain may the chronicler seek to be comprehensive when he lists the novel numbers that Mr. Monteux destines for the Symphony Concerts. One of moment the recorder is sure to omit. Yesterday, it was a Suite for Orchestra from Bártók, the vivid and vigorous Hungarian whose music makes more and more stir as it journeys westward. A few piano-pieces have hitherto been his lot in Boston and New York.

From the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 26 and 27, Mr. Monteux has put by for a while Mahler's First Symphony. He does so that he make room for the Sea-Pieces of Frank Bridge, the English composer, now in this country and minded to conduct in his own music. At the concerts of next week, on Oct. 19 and 20, the orchestra will be heard in Rakhmaninov's familiar and lenghty Symphony; in Aubert's glorified "Habanera," new piece to Boston, and in the whirling Overture to Smetana's Czech opera, "The Bartered Bride." Miss Rethberg of the new German generation at the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Beethoven's displayful air, "Ah, Perfido!" and Elisabeth's salute to the Hall of Song in "Tannhäuser."

Uncommonly early in the musical year, the Symphony Orchestra will resume its Concerts for Young People. The first pair are now set for the afternoons of Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 30 and 31, in Symphony Hall, with tickets distributed through the schools of the metropolitan district. The overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz;" an Air and Gavotte of Bach· a fragment of Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus"; Smetana's tone picture of the river Moldau; the plucked Scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; two pieces from Ravel's "Mother Goose"; Berlioz's Rákóczy March, fill a manifold programme.

TRANS. OCT. 11

From OCT 13 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

The Symphonies.

Pierre Monteux arrived from Europe on the Paris last week, bringing with him much new music of interest which he will include upon the programs of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the music now in the library, Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be mentioned, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps"); Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honneger, and Ropartz, likewise Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schonberg, Schreker, and Pfitzner; English composers, Eugene Goossens, Arnold Bax, and Frank Bridge; likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok, and the Spaniard, de Falla. Some of this music will of course be included in the ten programs of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York.

AUSPICIOUSLY A SYMPHONY CONCERT RETURNS AGAIN

CONDUCTOR AND ORCHESTRA AT HIGH METTLE

Beethoven and Brahms for Classics, Dukas and Strauss for Moderns—From a Symphony of Motion to the Dance of Salome—Passions of a Peri and Pleasures of Variations

LESS resumed than continued seemed the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon. Once Mr. Monteux had been clapped and clapped again, as [illegible] came [illegible] ear discovered [illegible] beginnings; while not [illegible] to the eye. A few new faces [illegible] discovered in the orchestra—among the [illegible], in the quartet of flutes, above the chair of the tuba-player, among the instruments tinkled or smitten, at the will of Dukas or Strauss, for a Peri and also for Princess Salome. In the little circle of the auditorium familiar to each frequenter of these afternoon concerts newcomers were also discoverable. In the main, however, the aspect of stage, floor and gallery seemed scarcely changed; while the goings, comings and chatterings of the intermission departed not a whit from a custom. Fewer than usual, however, seemed the late-comers, since on a holiday the progress of motors in town was little hindered; while for early admonition to the wilfully tardy, a reminder about intrusions and restrictions was slipped into every programme-book. Those that scanned the upper gallery to descry whether a doubled price of admission had there lessened numbers found every seat occupied as of old. While the applause for Mr. Monteux entering was general, hearty and long-sustained; while the orchestra was warmly called to its feet at the end of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, conductor and players have many times in the past received as fervent plaudits. In sum, no new year at Symphony Hall has lately begun more quietly—or more auspiciously. As it seemed, the first concert of the present season might have been the twenty-fifth concert of the season past.

In no material respect had Mr. Monteux altered as conductor. In the Symphony of Beethoven—the Symphony that is all tonal motion—he was alert, animated and pliant of rhythm. Good to hear was the light and even swing of the Allegretto; whirling and tumultuous, yet never blurred or rough, was the coursing of the Finale. If the conductor seemed to stay and thicken the hymn-like measures of the Scherzo, he made double and triple amends, when from the germ of a motiv—say in the first movement—a theme expanded into melody and that melody, broadening, deepening, poured into flood through the music. Then, the pace, the accent, the progress of the conductor were as quickening and as glow upon the voice of Beethoven. Beauty of curve, beauty of shading, glamored the Allegretto; crystal-like, yet without brittle hardness, was the phrasing of the Scherzo. The Finale neither skipped too lightly nor stamped too ponderously. Beethoven-wise, it leapt and whirled, man-like in frenzy. A vigorous, full-throated Brahms abounding in energies of creation and contrast spoke from the Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

Mr. Monteux's version of the Dance of Salome is version of the Straussian theatre. The music exhales langours, weaves repetitions, sensuously rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smother of sensuality in the full, thick, velvet voices of horns and violoncellos; when he would have his wood-winds bite as with "the little white teeth of Salome" in the old chronicles; when the dance ends in a whirr of trills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered, with every thread of instrumental color. As well, or better, succeeded Mr. Monteux with "The Peri" of Dukes, played as the tone-poem to which, after all, the dancing is accessory. The ear felt the rich pile and texture of the music; the suggestion of motion and color within and without; the eager, or the mournful, ecstasy of contrasting pages, the fineness of means and articulation; the fervors as glowing, yet as remote, as the Peri's cup. Once more the conductor both released and revealed the composer.

Numbed or clouded would have been these pleasures were not the orchestra likewise on its mettle. Warm, smooth, transparent were the wood-winds in the Variations of Brahms, as though the music nestled in the hollow of such beauty. In turn, they bit like acid into copper through sundry measures of Strauss. Time and again in the Seventh Symphony Beethoven asks incisive, leaping strings. As often Dukas would have them pale and piercing or full-throated and lustrous. To each and all these musics the choir answered with the characterizing voice. The newcomers enrich the horns; prove elsewhere skill and sensibility with timbres that are the tintings and the suggestion of Dukas and Strauss. As the orchestra was in the endings of last spring, so now is it in the beginnings of the present autumn—an alert and plastic ensemble, balancing and shading its multifold voices, fusing and parting them, running the gamut of beauty and power, musical in every trait, responsive to every turn of the conductor's will. Though he thicken a clear tone, yet does it obey, as in Beethoven's Scherzo. Though he linger over luscious harmonies as in "The Peri," it sags not. Fortunate are conductor and audience in so responsive, so many-sided instrument.

Fortunate also are composers, since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now give them, their music lives and is charactered. Strauss assembles a vast orchestra for the dance of the slender, star-like Salome. He would wind it in thick or transparent strands. He would have it shiver and sparkle in myriad points and colors. He would have enlaced harmonies caress and parted, isolated harmonies bite. He would use this orchestral magnificence as a cloak—in those heavy middle measures—to a discoverable commonness of invention. He would use this orchestral luminosity, plangency, pungency, to intensify measures of imagination. Above all, he would work through tones, sensations and illusions of the theatre. "Salome dances the dance of the seven veils," says Wilde for once laconic. Only less sparse are Strauss's own stage-directions. The singing-actress spent with toils past, anticipating toils to come, may contribute but little. A substituted dancer fits not the frame, achieves no concentration and cumulation. The music must work the half-sensual, half-tragic spell, and conductor and players be, as they were yesterday, the composer's releasing and animating instruments.

Dukas's music of "The Peri" proceeds, for the most part, in an almost cloying richness. With the Goldmark of Vienna, this Jew of Paris shares the Semitic impulse to sensuous, sumptuous, music, the wine and the oil of tone in thick-coiled [illegible]
India or Dukas his Peri [illegible] they so drench their measures. W Dukas's "danced poem" passed to a risian theatre, says the learned and i haustible compiler of the programme-b
"the stage of the Chatelet showed mountains, crimson valleys and trees ing silver fruit." Dukas would have harmonies give back such colors.
the flower that the Peri bore in her was "a lotus like unto an emerald . .
unto snow and gold upon the summ [illegible] at sunset." It purpled also it faded. Again Dukas bids harmoni timbres work such illusion upon the s
More: Wagner-wise he would h music unfold, advance, recede, thicken and thin, as with the progres fable and an action. Yet he would it persuade and persist also as musi its own sake by virtue of a songful possessing melodic power and beauty progress. Through "The Peri" he fu all these desires in a fullness of a sp imagination and illusion that set the t poem high above his other symph pieces. But conductor and orchestra be of reciprocating and revealing m
Yesterday, they were.

So also in degree with Brahms of Variations and yet more with the S phony of Beethoven. Glory be, Mr. M teux was, is and still remains intrinsi a conductor of modern music, hot-vo high colored, rich in textures and rhyt a-glow in accent, modulation and prog
Being such, he misses sometimes the ab of Brahms to take this simple theme Haydn or even some fraction, sub-divi or suggestion of it and out of no more three notes—as they frequently s weave periods and paragraphs of m Brahms thinks, but he also gives warmth. There are sparks in his rhy ardors in his advance. With a larg easy gesture he rounds some of these V ations; with a moody spirit he cha others. Yet steadily in this nine-fold p he writes in the blacks and the whi music; while the average hearer—a Monteux with him—would have seen more "sensuosity" as the boy in "Clare used to put it. Of such are the infir of the listening and even the condu flesh.

The Seventh Symphony of Beeth escapes these cooling shadows becaus it through a century have persisted a petual heat and light. Strauss imagi and in degree achieving the wildness Salome's dance, pales beside the fren of the leaping, shouting, infinitely g dened Beethoven of this Finale; v Chaikovsky's aspiring orgies become sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.
twenty minutes before, that same Beeth has carved the lines of his Allegretto in flowing yet chiselled relief of to Those who would know from rill to f
the progress of a melody through bea into power, have but to listen to Beetho beginning, broadening, deepening Symphony. Recall steps of earth and s of heaven as they divide the Sche
Page after page of Beethoven has lost for—twentieth-century ears; but thro the Seventh Symphony still pulse a " ereign sway and masterdom." H. T.

TRANS. OCT. 13

RETHBERG, SOLOIST

Elisabeth Rethberg, who was consid ered in New York the most important new soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season, will make her
Boston debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the second pair of concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening,
Oct. 19-20.

The prima donna will sing Beethoven's
"Ah, perfido," and the principal aria of Elisabeth from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

TRAV. OCT. 13

43D SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS

Monteux Gives Brilliant Reading of Ballet Numbers

By E. F. HARKINS

Starting his final term as Symphony conductor, Pierre Monteux was cordially greeted yesterday at the opening of the famous orchestra's 43rd season.

Pierre Monteux

A likeable personality has this modest Frenchman, who has made a host of friends while he struggled at the herculean task of keeping the Boston Symphony in the forefront, where Gericke put it and Muck left it. The Boston Symphony orchestra today is better than it was three years ago, when war and internal strife had dragged it from its high estate. Monteux, just back from Europe, says it excels any orchestra he heard abroad. Its match, if it has a match, is to be found in this country, which has made prodigiou strides ahead in the orchestral fie in recent years.

TWO BALLET NUMBERS

The best part of the performance yesterday came with the final number, Salome's dance, from Richard Strauss' "Salome," an opera barred from all Puritanical cities, although [illegible] inconsistencies in [illegible] I approve a similar thing in another part. The "Salome" music is extraordinary, a characteristic masterpiece by the greatest living composer; and it is in the interpretation of such intensely modern and enormously difficult music that Pierre Monteaux is happiest. He did honor to Strauss; also to his own fellow-countryman, Dukas, whose ballet, "La Peri," was another impressive feature of this week's program. Dukas, too, has his moments of genius.

SOME BRILLIANT SPOTS

The orchestra, like the conductor, was at its best in these two ballet music performances. Both wonderfully imaginative compositions, hardly needing a dancer to enforce or enhance their dramatic values! And under the sympathetic Monteux this music of Near East and Far East glowed and glimmered. Magic carpet music, tranferring you to other lands.

One of the sections of the Brahms "Variations of a Haydn Theme" and the finale of the seventh Beethoven symphony were equally brilliant features of the performances. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVSR. OCT. 13.

SYMPHONY SETS PACE FOR SEASON

Enthusiasm Marks the Opening of 43d Year

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 43rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with much public enthusiasm and with several hundred turned away after all the seats in the second balcony had been taken.

The programme was half classic, half modern in texture; also, half symphonic and half of the theatre, since it opened with the Beethoven's 7th Symphony, followed by the Brahms-Haydn variations, and proceeded with dance music by Paul Dukas—"The Peri"—and Richard Strauss, in the instance of Salome's dance from the opera of that name.

TRIUMPH FOR CONDUCTOR

The performance of the Beethoven symphony, which, after all, stands alone among all the symphonies of the master, was very sincere and enthusiastic, though at times rough in tone-quality. The finale has seldom been played here with such enormous, overwhelming hilarity, and, thus played it constituted a triumph for the conductor and his men.

A superior performance, indeed, one of the best readings of classic score by Mr. Monteux that we remember, was that of the Brahms variations. These are ordinarily perfunctory and soporific enough. Mr. Monteux showed that when this is the case it is caused by a lackadaisical interpretation. The music as he treated it was not only of unflagging interest, but, with all the carefully planned contrasts between the variations there was the sensation of continuity of thought, of a long architectural line, unbroken from the statement of the theme to the resounding climax.

Dukas' Brilliant Dance

Then, with the music of Dukas, composed for Mme. Trouhanovna, came what must be considered one of the most brilliant scores by a modern composer. And it is more than a brilliant score. It has symphonic texture. Obviously music conceived for a stage spectacle, it is eloquent by itself on the concert platform, because of the coherency, logic and inspiration with which its ideas are developed.

Furthermore, it is music of imagination. It has the quality of the fairy-tale. It has what may be called the genuine and inspired truthfulness of that wholly artificial thing, the treatre. There is only a little such music. Men write what are merely tunes and rhythms for dancers to step or turn. They do not possess, in their souls, the glamour of the stage, the dazzle of it, the ability to enter and remain in the land of make-believe. One feels, one sees this music, as well as hears it. There is the sense of the exquisite and incredible occurring before the eyes. This is caused by the pretty fancy and [illegible] exotic character of the mo[illegible] [illegible] wonderful, now [illegible]

A Score to Rejoice In

It is a score for everyone to know and rejoice in. Here is a composer with, one would say, a very exhaustive technical knowledge of his instruments, and also an inborn felicity in combining them. A hundred ingenious conceits flash by. In all the departments of the orchestra the most delightful things are continually being accomplished. The percussion battery alone furnishes a perfect gamut of color as well as rhythm and then there is the sense of form, underneath that color, the most gorgeous color being reserved for the greatest climax, when, indeed, Dukas' orchestra becomes a jewelled conflagration.

The music might have been far less effective, lacking Mr. Monteux's masterly performance.

And yet—and this was amazing—with all these wonders, this perfect union of the medium, of the thought and its execution, the dance that Strauss wrote for Salome, which is ugly, vulgar, and inept by comparison, made the music of Dukas pale. Of course, the two composers had far different intention, and wrote in completely different veins.

Strauss' Dramatic Power

Strauss' music would have been atrocious for the subject of "La Peri." Strauss' idiom is so far from that of Dukas that no literal comparison is possible. The plain fact must nevertheless be recorded, that Strauss, by the side of the Frenchman was a perfect farmer with his orchestra; a savage, brutal composer if you choose, and capable of lapses into bad taste of which an artist such as Dukas would never dream—this Strauss has an almost frightful dramatic power, and a musical physiognomy indelible in the memory.

Mr. Monteux's performance of this music was so far superior to the performance of it given seasons ago by Max Fielder that it may be said the score was heard yesterday for the first time. The earlier performance showed only the vulgarities of the composer, and little if any of his genius. But when that dance began yesterday, with the wild thrumming of the instruments, the whining of the oboe, the capricious, and, possibly perverse orientalism of the opening pages, it was a thing that gripped the hearer and did not let him go.

Written at White Heat

Now there was blatant commonness, such as the trumpet, which doubles the theme given the strings in 3-4 time; there were, as one might say, great, black ugly shadows of tone, interrupted by some piercing shriek of the instruments; hesitations inexplicable without the dancer on the stage; an orchestra now indolent, panting, or run amuck. The music is in places elemental or worse—the flavor of the beast. But there is no gainsaying it: Strauss wrote Salome at a white heat. In so doing he rode over traditions, laws of taste, as well as of style, as if they had not existed in his path. There will never be but one opera on the subject of Salome. It has been written, the pages not to be imitated or turned back, by Richard Strauss.

POST. OCT 13

SYMPHONY CONCERT BEGINS SEASON

Monteux Applauded by Brilliant Audience

Dance From Strauss' "Salome" Vividly Interpreted

Pierre Monteux was greeted with cordial and prolonged applause yesterday afternoon when he came on the stage at Symphony Hall to conduct the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season. Mr Monteux, after this year, will return to Paris and Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian conductor, will take his place here.

Yesterday's audience obviously wanted to show that it appreciates the many and great services to the orchestra rendered by Monteux as its conductor in the peculiarly difficult seasons just passed. It is, in fact, very largely due to his patient zeal that the orchestra which played yesterday is an organization greatly improved over its condition after the double calamities of war and strike.

As usual, Symphony Hall was completely filled. All seats except the second balcony were sold by subscription as long ago as last May for the entire season of Friday concerts. The doubled price of admission to the second balcony, 50 cents instead of a quarter, caused no vacant seats there.

All except about 200 of the present subscribers occupied the same seats last season, and many of them for much longer than that. Before the concert and during the intermission countless little groups of friends were holding informal reunions all over the hall.

The Friday Symphony audience is still what it has so long been, a gathering of well-to-do and socially prominent people of a sort hardly paralleled in any other public place.

There was but one comparative novelty on the program, the famous dance from Richard Strauss' opera, "Salome." Whatever one may think of the ethical quality of it, this dance is unmistakably vivid, powerful music. Its idiom, not long ago deemed futuristic by many, now seems sanely conservative. Rhythms, timbres, themes, harmonies, are all clearly derived from the procedure of great composers from Wagner backward. The performance was particularly effective.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most completely and permanently satisfying of all pieces of music, was a wise choice for the first number of the season. It is good to get the thrill of again listening to a first-rate orchestra after some months, combined with the deeper emotion of hearing so great a work as this symphony, which renders verbal rhapsodies futile. The scherzo was not well played; the first theme was obscured by faulty orchestral balance, and the rhythms were too stodgy. The allegretto was given a genuinely romantic interpretation.

Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, stirringly performed, seemed almost to justify the variation form to those who are accustomed to regard it as insufferably prolix and unemotional. The other number, Dukas' "La Peri," is conventional ballet music in the mode of 1910, capably put together with a skilful use of harmonic and orchestral effects. It suffers by transportation from the theatre to the concert hall. The audience applauded a brilliant performance with especial warmth.

Next week Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera will sing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido" and "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhauser." Aubert's "Habanera," Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" are the other numbers.

GLOBE. OCT. 13

SYMPHONY'S 43D SEASON

Orchestra Opens with One of Most Brilliant Concerts in History

MONTEUX RECEIVES WARM WELCOME

By PHILIP HALE

The 43d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The audience completely filled the hall and many were turned away. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, A major, No. 7; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Dukas, "The Peri," a danced poem; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

Mr. Monteux was greeted with heartiest applause that was unusually long-continued. This welcome must have shown him, if proof was needed, how warmly he is regarded, how highly he is respected by the Symphony audience.

It will not soon be forgotten that the superb orchestra of today is his creation. He formed and moulded it in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage, and artistic enthusiasm. To this well-equipped body he gave life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music.

For some years it was customary to write perfunctorily about the first concert of a season; sometimes it was thought necessary to write in a semi-apologetic vein—"the players were scattered during the summer; they have not yet, of course, wholly found themselves—" and so forth and so on.

But the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall. No wonder that the performance throughout provoked enthusiastic plaudits.

A finer interpretation of Beethoven's symphony has not been heard here in many years. Too often Beethoven's symphonies are treated in a perfunctory manner. "The music speaks for itself," a conductor will say, and then spend his time and strength on a more modern work that appeals to his nature because it gives him, as he fondly thinks, a greater opportunity for self-glorification. Or, again, wishing to shine as Arcturus in the sky, he will put new wine in the old bottle; introduce strange effects, give prominence to that which is comparatively unimportant, astonish by unexpected tempi and distorted phrases. Unfortunately there are hearers that encourage these lamentable exhibitions.

Mr. Monteux has too artistic a nature to sin in this manner. Conducting the symphony he was neither obsequious in self-effacement before the master, nor was he bumptious with the air of saying: "Now I'll show you how this should go. Just watch me." His breadth of treatment was never forced; his care for detail was never finical. Beethoven was revealed in his grandeur, his sadness, his light-heartedness, and at last his riotous joy, as one exulting, shouting deliriously from the intoxication of life in its fulness, without the thought of the inevitable end to every man's desire.

And Brahms was treated as a human being, not as a dry and solemn professor of musical architecture. The variations were fittingly differentiated, not merely played one after the other with regard only for literal accuracy, as if the fact that Joannes wrote them would be sufficient excuse for a pedestrian performance.

Perhaps the dance music of Dukas and of Strauss suffered somewhat by the juxtaposition. If injury were inflicted on either composer, Strauss was the victim, for in the concert hall, as in the opera house, the exoticism of Salome's dance seems labored, and there is little that is sensuous or voluptuous. In the opera house one is more absorbed in the stripping of Salome than in the music that accompanies. In the concert hall the effect might be greater if Salome stripped on the screen, or if Miss Mary Garden could be persuaded to do the dance between the conductor's stand and the expectant, palpitating audience.

"The Peri" bears better the severance from the ballet stage, and it has passages of genuine beauty. There are stretches which without the action in the theatre seem inconsequential: There is a vitality to the music as a whole, a warmth, in spite of the occasionally over-refined instrumentation, that is missing in the artificially rhetorical measures of Richard the Extravagant.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week is as follows: Rachmaninov, Symphony, E minor, No. 2; Aubert, Habanera (first time here); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride." Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido!" and Elisabeth's "Greeting," from "Tannhaeuser."

HERALD. Oct. 13.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 14 1923

New Music by Boston Symphony.

When Pierre Monteux, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pays his annual visit this fall and winter to Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music here, he is expected to present a number of compositions new to New York concert-goers. Mr. Monteux is this year rounding out a five-year term as leader of the famous orchestra from the Hub, and in recognition of his work for French art in America he has been decorated by France with the ribbon of a chevalier of the Legion of Honor. He will end his connection with the Boston Symphony this season. His successor is to be the Russian conductor Serge Kussevitzky.

PIERRE MONTEUX

CLEVELAND
OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 14 1923

Interesting news comes from Boston. The famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as leader of the Boston symphony in the fall of 1924. No question about it, Mr. Koussevitzky is universally considered one of the world's greatest conductors. It may well be that the Bostonians are about to enter on another epoch of splendor, recalling the days of yore.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
HERALD

OCT 14 1923

Pierre Monteux arrived from Europe on the Paris recently, bringing with him much new music, which he will include in the programs of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of the music now in the library Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps"); Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honegger and Ropartz, likewise Debussy with his "Martyrdon of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schoenberg, Schreker and Pfitzner; English composers, Goosens, Bax and Bridge; likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok and the Spaniard de Falla. Some of this music will, of course, be included in the ten programs of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York. The orchestra's season opened in Boston on Friday last.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week the soloist will be Elizabeth Rethberg, Metropolitan Opera Company soprano, who will sing the "Ah, perfido" aria of Beethoven and the "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser." Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, Aubert's novel "Habanera" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture are on the program.

ADVTSR. Oct. 14.

First Hearing of "Habanera"

Next week, Mr. Monteux will play for the first time at the Symphony concerts the symphonic poem of Louis Aubert, "Habanera." This work was first performed at the Concerts Pasdeloup in Paris, March 23, 1919. It is not a realistic musical portrayal of Spain or of the dance upon which its rhthms are based. Its inspiration is the lines of Baudelaire printed on the flyleaf of the score: "Laisse-moi respirer longtemps, longtemps, l'odeur de tes cheveux, y plonger mon visage, come un homme altere dans l'eau d'une source, et les agiter aveo ma main comme un mouchoir odorant. Si tu pouvais savoir tout ce que je vois. Tout ce que je sens. Tout ce que j'entends dans tes cheveux! Mon ame voyage sur les parfums, comme l'ame des autres hommes sur la musique!"

(Let me breathe a long, long time the perfume of your tresses, let me sink my face among them, like a thirsting man in the waters of a spring, and toy with them in my hand as I would a scented handkerchief. Could you but know all that I see—all that I feel—all that I hear within your tresses! My soul fares forth on their perfume as do the souls of other men on the wings of music.)

There is a slow introduction, in which 'celli and harp "quasi guitarra," announce the habanera rhythm. A languorous and melancholy theme is intoned by the solo viola. Gradually other instruments of the orchestra enter with re-enforcing timbres and phrases. The paces quicken, there is a long crescendo with the theme of the habanera, the rhythm enforced by the castenets and the Basque drum. After an ecstatic climax the decrescendo begins. There are distant echoes of the opening theme, by the bass-clarinet, of the habanera phrase by trumpet and flutes, an effect of a veiled echo. The solo viola is again heard, and a curious unresolved chord, played very softly, brings the end.

Mr. Aubert is known in Boston by two or three interesting songs and by the opera, "La foret bleue," produced for the first time anywhere by the Boston Opera Company under the management of Henry Russell on March 8, 1913.

Rethberg Symphony Soloist

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony season will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20, at Symphony Hall.

The soloist will be Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano who came from Europe to the Metropolitan Opera Company last autumn and is considered the principal new soprano of that organization. She will sing the aria, "Ah, perfido," of Beethoven, and Elisabeth's Greeting "Dich, Theure Halle" from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Rachmaninov's Second Symphony in E minor, also give the first performance in Boston of Aubert's "Habanera," and close with Smetanas Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

POST. OCT. 14.

A pair of concerts for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given in Symphony Hall the afternoons of Tuesday, Oct 30, and Wednesday, Oct 31, at 4 o'clock.

Tickets will be distributed, as formerly, through the schools of Greater Boston, at the rate of 35 cents each.

The program will include Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Air and Gavotte from Bach's Suite in D major, Beethoven's Fifth Ballet from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"; the Scherzo from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, "Beauty and the Beast," and the "Empress of the Pagodas," from Ravel's "Mother Goose," and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

GLOBE. Oct. 14

RETHBERG, SOLOIST

Elisabeth Rethberg, who was considered in New York the most important new soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season, will make her Boston debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the second pair of concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20.

The prima donna will sing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," and the principal aria of Elisabeth from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

MONITOR. Oct. 14

Rethberg Symphony Soloist

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony season will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20, at Symphony Hall.

The soloist will be Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano who came from Europe to the Metropolitan Opera Company last autumn and is considered the principal new soprano of that organization. She will sing the aria, "Ah, perfido," of Beethoven, and Elisabeth's Greeting "Dich, Theure Halle" from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Rachmaninov's Second Symphony in E minor, also give the first performance in Boston of Aubert's "Habanera," and close with Smetanas Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

POST. OCT. 14

[illegible] is [illegible] strange inconsistencies in [illegible] ridiculous censorships, [illegible] one thing in this part of the city and approve a similar thing in another part. The "Salome" music is extraordinary, a characteristic masterpiece by the greatest living composer; and it is in the interpretation of such intensely modern and enormously difficult music that Pierre Monteaux is happiest. He did honor to Strauss; also to his own fellow-countryman, Dukas, whose ballet, "La Peri," was another impressive feature of this week's program. Dukas, too, has his moments of genius.

SOME BRILLIANT SPOTS

The orchestra, like the conductor, was at its best in these two ballet music performances. Both wonderfully imaginative compositions, hardly needing a dancer to enforce or enhance their dramatic values! And under the sympathetic Monteux this music of Near East and Far East glowed and glimmered. Magic carpet music, tranferring you to other lands.

One of the sections of the Brahms "Variations of a Haydn Theme" and the finale of the seventh Beethoven symphony were equally brilliant features of the performances. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR. OCT. 13.

SYMPHONY SETS PACE FOR SEASON

Enthusiasm Marks the Opening of 43d Year

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 43rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with much public enthusiasm and with several hundred turned away after all the seats in the second balcony had been taken.

The programme was half classic, half modern in texture; also, half symphonic and half of the theatre, since it opened with the Beethoven's 7th Symphony, followed by the Brahms-Haydn variations, and proceeded with dance music by Paul Dukas—"The Peri"—and Richard Strauss, in the instance of Salome's dance from the opera of that name.

TRIUMPH FOR CONDUCTOR

The performance of the Beethoven symphony, which, after all, stands alone among all the symphonies of the master, was very sincere and enthusiastic, though at times rough in tone-quality. The finale has seldom been played here with such enormous, overwhelming hilarity, and, thus played it constituted a triumph for the conductor and his men.

A superior performance, indeed, one of the best readings of classic score by Mr. Monteux that we remember, was that of the Brahms variations. These are ordinarily perfunctory and soporific enough. Mr. Monteux showed that when this is the case it is caused by a lackadaisical interpretation. The music as he treated it was not only of unflagging interest, but, with all the carefully planned contrasts between the variations there was the sensation of continuity of thought, of a long architectural line, unbroken from the statement of the theme to the resounding climax.

Dukas' Brilliant Dance

Then, with the music of Dukas, composed for Mme. Trouhanovna, came what must be considered one of the most brilliant scores by a modern composer. And it is more than a brilliant score. It has symphonic texture. Obviously music conceived for a stage spectacle, it is eloquent by itself on the concert platform, because of the coherency, logic and inspiration with which its ideas are developed.

Furthermore, it is music of imagination. It has the quality of the fairy tale. It has what may be called the genuine and inspired truthfulness of that wholly artificial thing, the treatre. There is only a little such music. Men write what are merely tunes and rhythms for dancers to step or turn. They do not possess, in their souls, the glamour of the stage, the dazzle of it, the ability to enter and remain in the land of make-believe. One feels one sees this music, as well as hears it. There is the sense of the exquisite and incredible occurring before the eyes. This is caused by the pretty fancy and [illegible] exotic character of the mo[illegible] [illegible] by the wonderful, now [illegible] of

A Score to Rejoice In

It is a score for everyone to know and rejoice in. Here is a composer with, one would say, a very exhaustive technical knowledge of his instruments, and also an inborn felicity in combining them. A hundred ingenious conceits flash by. In all the departments of the orchestra the most delightful things are continually being accomplished. The percussion battery alone furnishes a perfect gamut of color as well as rhythm and then there is the sense of form, underneath that color, the most gorgeous color being reserved for the greatest climax, when, indeed, Dukas' orchestra becomes a jewelled conflagration.

The music might have been far less effective, lacking Mr. Monteux's masterly performance.

And yet—and this was amazing—with all these wonders, this perfect union of the medium, of the thought and its execution, the dance that Strauss wrote for Salome, which is ugly, vulgar, and inept by comparison, made the music of Dukas pale. Of course, the two composers had far different intention, and wrote in completely different veins.

Strauss' Dramatic Power

Strauss' music would have been atrocious for the subject of "La Peri." Strauss' idiom is so far from that of Dukas that no literal comparison is possible. The plain fact must nevertheless be recorded, that Strauss, by the side of the Frenchman was a perfect farmer with his orchestra; a savage, brutal composer if you choose, and capable of lapses into bad taste of which an artist such as Dukas would never dream—this Strauss has an almost frightful dramatic power, and a musical physiognomy indelible in the memory.

Mr. Monteux's performance of this music was so far superior to the performance of it given seasons ago by Max Fielder that it may be said the score was heard yesterday for the first time. The earlier performance showed only the vulgarities of the composer, and little if any of his genius. But when that dance began yesterday, with the wild thrumming of the instruments, the whining of the oboe, the capricious, and, possibly perverse orientalism of the opening pages, it was a thing that gripped the hearer and did not let him go.

Written at White Heat

Now there was blatant commonness, such as the trumpet, which doubles the theme given the strings in 3-4 time; there were, as one might say, great, black ugly shadows of tone, interrupted by some piercing shriek of the instruments; hesitations inexplicable without the dancer on the stage; an orchestra now indolent, panting, or run amuck. The music is in places elemental or worse—the flavor of the beast. But there is no gainsaying it: Strauss wrote Salome at a white heat. In so doing he rode over traditions, laws of taste, as well as of style, as if they had not existed in his path. There will never be but one opera on the subject of Salome. It has been written, the pages not to be imitated or turned back, by Richard Strauss.

POST·OCT 13

SYMPHONY CONCERT BEGINS SEASON

Monteux Applauded by Brilliant Audience

Dance From Strauss' "Salome" Vividly Interpreted

Pierre Monteux was greeted with cordial and prolonged applause yesterday afternoon when he came on the stage at Symphony Hall to conduct the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season. Mr Monteux, after this year, will return to Paris and Serge Koussevitsky, the distinguished Russian conductor, will take his place here.

Yesterday's audience obviously wanted to show that it appreciates the many and great services to the orchestra rendered by Monteux as its conductor in the peculiarly difficult seasons just passed. It is, in fact, very largely due to his patient zeal that the orchestra which played yesterday is an organization greatly improved over its condition after the double calamities of war and strike.

As usual, Symphony Hall was completely filled. All seats except the second balcony were sold by subscription as long ago as last May for the entire season of Friday concerts. The doubled price of admission to the second balcony, 50 cents instead of a quarter, caused no vacant seats there.

All except about 200 of the present subscribers occupied the same seats last season, and many of them for much longer than that. Before the concert and during the intermission countless little groups of friends were holding informal reunions all over the hall.

The Friday Symphony audience is still what it has so long been, a gathering of well-to-do and socially prominent people of a sort hardly paralleled in any other public place.

There was but one comparative novelty on the program, the famous dance from Richard Strauss' opera, "Salome." Whatever one may think of the ethical quality of it, this dance is unmistakably vivid, powerful music. Its idiom, not long ago deemed futuristic by many, now seems sanely conservative. Rhythms, timbres, themes, harmonies, are all clearly derived from the procedure of great composers from Wagner backward. The performance was particularly effective.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most completely and permanently satisfying of all pieces of music, was a wise choice for the first number of the season. It is good to get the thrill of again listening to a first-rate orchestra after some months, combined with the deeper emotion of hearing so great a work as this symphony, which renders verbal rhapsodies futile. The scherzo was not well played; the first theme was obscured by faulty orchestral balance, and the rhythms were too stodgy. The allegretto was given a genuinely romantic interpretation.

Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, stirringly performed, seemed almost to justify the variation form to those who are accustomed to regard it as insufferably prolix and unemotional. The other number, Dukas' "La Peri," is conventional ballet music in the mode of 1910, capably put together with a skilful use of harmonic and orchestral effects. It suffers by transportation from the theatre to the concert hall. The audience applauded a brilliant performance with especial warmth.

Next week Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera will sing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido" and "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhauser." Aubert's "Habanera," Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" are the other numbers.

GLOBE·OCT. 13

SYMPHONY'S 43D SEASON

Orchestra Opens with One of Most Brilliant Concerts in History

MONTEUX RECEIVES WARM WELCOME

By PHILIP HALE

The 43d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The audience completely filled the hall and many were turned away. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, A major, No. 7; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Dukas, "The Peri," a danced poem; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

Mr. Monteux was greeted with heartiest applause that was unusually long-continued. This welcome must have shown him, if proof was needed, how warmly he is regarded, how highly he is respected by the Symphony audience.

It will not soon be forgotten that the superb orchestra of today is his creation. He formed and moulded it in the face of obstacles that would have daunted a man of less patience, courage, and artistic enthusiasm. To this well-equipped body he gave life and beauty by his skill and taste as an interpreter of ancient, modern and ultra-modern music.

For some years it was customary to write perfunctorily about the first concert of a season; sometimes it was thought necessary to write in a semi-apologetic vein—"the players were scattered during the summer; they have not yet, of course, wholly found themselves—" and so forth and so on.

But the concert yesterday was one of the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall. No wonder that the performance throughout provoked enthusiastic plaudits.

A finer interpretation of Beethoven's symphony has not been heard here in many years. Too often Beethoven's symphonies are treated in a perfunctory manner. "The music speaks for itself," a conductor will say, and then spend his time and strength on a more modern work that appeals to his nature because it gives him, as he fondly thinks, a greater opportunity for self-glorification. Or, again, wishing to shine as Arcturus in the sky, he will put new wine in the old bottle; introduce strange effects, give prominence to that which is comparatively unimportant, astonish by unexpected tempi and distorted phrases. Unfortunately there are hearers that encourage these lamentable exhibitions.

Mr. Monteux has too artistic a nature to sin in this manner. Conducting the symphony he was neither obsequious in self-effacement before the master, nor was he bumptious with the air of saying: "Now I'll show you how this should go. Just watch me." His breadth of treatment was never forced; his care for detail was never finical. Beethoven was revealed in his grandeur, his sadness, his light-heartedness, and at last his riotous joy, as one exulting, shouting deliriously from the intoxication of life in its fulness, without the thought of the inevitable end to every man's desire.

And Brahms was treated as a human being, not as a dry and solemn professor of musical architecture. The variations were fittingly differentiated, not merely played one after the other with regard only for literal accuracy, as if the fact that Joannes wrote them would be sufficient excuse for a pedestrian performance.

Perhaps the dance music of Dukas and of Strauss suffered somewhat by the juxtaposition. If injury were inflicted on either composer, Strauss was the victim, for in the concert hall, as in the opera house, the exoticism of Salome's dance seems labored, and there is little that is sensuous or voluptuous. In the opera house one is more absorbed in the stripping of Salome than in the music that accompanies. In the concert hall the effect might be greater if Salome stripped on the screen, or if Miss Mary Garden could be persuaded to do the dance between the conductor's stand and the expectant, palpitating audience.

"The Peri" bears better the severance from the ballet stage, and it has passages of genuine beauty. There are stretches which without the action in the theatre seem inconsequential: There is a vitality to the music as a whole, a warmth, in spite of the occasionally over-refined instrumentation, that is missing in the artificially rhetorical measures of Richard the Extravagant.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week is as follows: Rachmaninov, Symphony, E minor, No. 2; Aubert, Habanera (first time here); Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride." Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido!" and Elisabeth's "Greeting," from "Tannhaeuser."

HERALD·OCT. 13.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 14 1923

New Music by Boston Symphony.

When Pierre Monteux, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pays his annual visit this fall and winter to Carnegie Hall and the Academy of Music here, he is expected to present a number of compositions new to New York concert-goers. Mr. Monteux is this year rounding out a five-year term as leader of the famous orchestra from the Hub, and in recognition of his work for French art in America he has been decorated by France with the ribbon of a chevalier of the Legion of Honor. He will end his connection with the Boston Symphony this season. His successor is to be the Russian conductor Serge Kussevitzky.

PIERRE MONTEUX

CLEVELAND
OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 14 192[illegible]

Interesting news comes from Boston. The famous Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitzky will succeed Pierre Monteux as leader of the Boston symphony in the fall of 1924. No question about it, Mr. Koussevitzky is universally considered one of the world's greatest conductors. It may well be that the Bostonians are about to enter on another epoch of splendor, recalling the days of yore.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
HERALD

OCT 14 1923

Pierre Monteux arrived from Europe on the Paris recently, bringing with him much new music, which he will include in the programs of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of the music now in the library Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be played. Of the newer music there may be, among Russian composers, Stravinsky ("Sacre du Printemps"); Italians, Malipiero and Respighi; French, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honegger and Ropartz, likewise Debussy with his "Martyrdon of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schoenberg, Schreker and Pfitzner; English composers, Goosens, Bax and Bridge; likewise the Hungarian Bela Bartok and the Spaniard de Falla. Some of this music will, of course, be included in the ten programs of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York. The orchestra's season opened in Boston on Friday last.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week the soloist will be Elizabeth Rethberg, Metropolitan Opera Company soprano, who will sing the "Ah, perfido" aria of Beethoven and the "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser." Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, Aubert's novel "Habanera" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture are on the program.

ADVTSR. OCT. 14.

First Hearing of "Habanera"

Next week, Mr. Monteux will play for the first time at the Symphony concerts the symphonic poem of Louis Aubert, "Habanera." This work was first performed at the Concerts Pasdeloup in Paris, March 23, 1919. It is not a realistic musical portrayal of Spain or of the dance upon which its rhthms are based. Its inspiration is the lines of Baudelaire printed on the flyleaf of the score: "Laisse-moi respirer longtemps, longtemps, l'odeur de tes cheveux, y plonger mon visage, come un homme altere dans l'eau d'une source, et les agiter aveo ma main comme un mouchoir odorant. Si tu pouvais savoir tout ce que je vois. Tout ce que je sens. Tout ce que j'entends dans tes cheveux! Mon ame voyage sur les parfums, comme l'ame des autres hommes sur la musique!"

(Let me breathe a long, long time the perfume of your tresses, let me sink my face among them, like a thirsting man in the waters of a spring, and toy with them in my hand as I would a scented handkerchief. Could you but know all that I see—all that I feel—all that I hear within your tresses! My soul fares forth on their perfume as do the souls of other men on the wings of music.)

There is a slow introduction, in which 'celli and harp "quasi guitarra," announce the habanera rhythm. A languorous and melancholy theme is intoned by the solo viola. Gradually other instruments of the orchestra enter with re-enforcing timbres and phrases. The paces quicken, there is a long crescendo with the theme of the habanera, the rhythm enforced by the castenets and the Basque drum. After an ecstatic climax the decrescendo begins. There are distant echoes of the opening theme, by the bass-clarinet, of the habanera phrase by trumpet and flutes, an effect of a veiled echo. The solo viola is again heard, and a curious unresolved chord, played very softly, brings the end.

Mr. Aubert is known in Boston by two or three interesting songs and by the opera, "La foret bleue," produced for the first time anywhere by the Boston Opera Company under the management of Henry Russell on March 8, 1913.

Rethberg Symphony Soloist

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony season will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20, at Symphony Hall.

The soloist will be Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano who came from Europe to the Metropolitan Opera Company last autumn and is considered the principal new soprano of that organization. She will sing the aria, "Ah, perfido," of Beethoven, and Elisabeth's Greeting "Dich, Theure Halle" from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Rachmaninov's Second Symphony in E minor, also give the first performance in Boston of Aubert's "Habanera," and close with Smetanas Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

POST. OCT. 14.

A pair of concerts for young people by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will be given in Symphony Hall the afternoons of Tuesday, Oct 30, and Wednesday, Oct 31, at 4 o'clock.

Tickets will be distributed, as formerly, through the schools of Greater Boston, at the rate of 35 cents each.

The program will include Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," Air and Gavotte from Bach's Suite in D major, Beethoven's Fifth Ballet from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"; the Scherzo from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, "Beauty and the Beast," and the "Empress of the Pagodas," from Ravel's "Mother Goose," and Berlioz's Rakoczy March.

GLOBE. OCT. 14

RETHBERG, SOLOIST

Elisabeth Rethberg, who was considered in New York the most important new soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company last season, will make her Boston debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the second pair of concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20.

The prima donna will sing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," and the principal aria of Elisabeth from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

M[illegible] . OCT. 14

Rethberg Symphony Soloist

The second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony season will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 19-20, at Symphony Hall.

The soloist will be Elisabeth Rethberg, the soprano who came from Europe to the Metropolitan Opera Company last autumn and is considered the principal new soprano of that organization. She will sing the aria, "Ah, perfido," of Beethoven, and Elisabeth's Greeting "Dich, Theure Halle" from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Rachmaninov's Second Symphony in E minor, also give the first performance in Boston of Aubert's "Habanera," and close with Smetanas Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

POST. OCT. 14

[131]

[illegible] Orchestra

A NEW Spanish piece by a French composer, and a new German singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, diversify the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The new piece is a dance-tune, a Habanera glorified by the rhythmic verve, the harmonic and instrumental color that twentieth-century composer and twentieth-century orchestra may lend to it. Aubert wrote it. Faintly Bostonians may remember him as composer of "The Blue Forest," passing piece of folk-tale, at their opera house. The new singer is Miss Rethberg, who came from Dresden to New York last winter, well graced in voice and in the other means and attributes of song. She will sing Beethoven's displayful piece, "Ah, Perfido," and Elisabeth's Salute to the Hall of Song in "Tannhäuser." Rakhmaninov's familiar, lengthy and often eloquent Symphony in E minor, will begin the concerts; Smetana's racing overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," will end them.

To Sanders Theatre at Harvard, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra go next Thursday evening for the first of the annual series of concerts in Cambridge. Rakhmaninov's Symphony in E Minor as aforesaid, the Variations of Brahms upon a Theme of Haydn, the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama, are the numbers for the band. Between whiles, Miss Katherine Meisle, fast becoming a notable alto-singer, will be heard in pieces from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" and Verdi's "Don Carlos." By these signs an operatic voice and manner.

TRANS. OCT. 13.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, second program, Second symphony, in E minor, Rachmaninov; "Ah, perfido," Beethoven; "Habanera," Aubert; "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana. Soloist, Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano.

GLOBE. OCT. 14

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Contrasts and Comparisons in Mr. Monteux's First Programme—Mr. Shalyapin Repeats Too Many Pieces in Tedious Surroundings—Mr. Kusevitzky's European Leave-Takings

WITH the present unmistakable reaction against the subtleties of French Impressionism and the excesses of neo-German Romanticism has come a new faith in the all but abandoned doctrine that a musical idea is one thing and the instrumental presentation quite another. Repeatedly have we been assured that to submit the orchestral music of a Debussy or a Strauss to the proof of performance in the cold black-and-white of the pianoforte is unsound and unfair, though it was freely admitted that a Beethoven or even a Wagner could bear such test triumphantly. But now that our ears have become accustomed to, and even cloyed by, these irridescent or glowing or tumultous sonorities, we can peer more closely beneath the surface and so may discriminate between the flesh and blood that is melody, harmony and rhythm and the diaphonous or gorgeous garment that is—or lately was—modern orchestration. Possessed of this new clarity of vision, we are not infrequently discovering dross where we had once thought to find gold. Yet by a kindly working of the law of compensation we are experiencing, too, a new satisfaction in all music, ancient or modern, that may defy this searching scrutiny. Perhaps through very surfeit of tonal luxuriance we are perceiving a hitherto unsuspected beauty in the once contemned orchestration of the classics.

Intentionally no doubt, since he is shrewd in such matters, it was in the order of the instrumental requirements that Mr. Monteux set the four pieces which made the programme of the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. To the modest orchestra of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Brahms in his "St. Anthony" Variations would add a piccolo, a double bassoon, a third and fourth horn and a triangle. For Dukas of "The Peri" a third bassoon takes the place of the double bassoon, and he must have—besides the German's other instruments—an English horn, a bass clarinet, a third trumpet three trombones and tuba, two harps, a celesta and a side-drum, bass drum, tambourine, xylophone and cymbals. For Salome's Dance Strauss demands substantially every instrument that the contemporary orchestra affords—and for good measure a hecklephone, a fifth clarinet, a fourth trombone, an organ and a harmonium. . . .

And yet for how many in Friday's or Saturday's audience was Salome's dance as pulse-stirring as was the Finale of the Seventh Symphony or how many found in the radiantly scored but intrinsically empty music of Dukas a greater pleasure than in the unassuming loveliness of Beethoven's Allegretto? And for all Mr. Monteux's efforts in behalf of Strauss and Dukas—and their music was brilliantly played—was it not in the music of Beethoven that he gave most truly of himself and found the most spontaneous response from the players before him? Not all the scholarly ingenuity of Brahms nor the tonal magic of Dukas nor the orchestral violences and splendors of Strauss could banish recollection of the simpler but irresistibly eloquent music of Beethoven. Of what avail in this instance the stupendous technical progress of a hundred years? Almost it seemed a retrogression. W. S. S.

[illegible] ents and Prospects

[illegible] conductors go there is no more con[illegible]ate and generous man—it is now safe [illegible]y—than Mr. Monteux. Among the [illegible] he had long had in mind for revival [illegible]e Symphony Concerts this season was [illegible]ovsky's tone-poem, "Fran[illegible] da [illegible] which Mr. [illegible] exercise[illegible] year Mr. Kusevitzky becomes conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. And to him, without a word except those here printed, Mr. Monteux has left "Francesca."

A series of unexacting concerts on Saturday evenings, at monthly intervals in Jordan Hall, will bring thither on Nov. 17, Mr. Cadman, the composer, and his assisting Indian woman-singer; on Dec. 15, Miss Grace Kerns, pleasing in song; and on Jan. 12, a Sextet assembled from the remarkable choir for liturgical music at the Russian Cathedral in New York. As a body, it once made no little stir here. Now this Sextet may recall its glories.

Before Mr. Kusevitzky comes to Boston next autumn he would evidently re-traverse his European field and confirm his place there. To his usual concerts in Paris—a series in the autumn, a series in the spring—he will add as many as five with the London Symphony Orchestra in that city; a visit to Manchester and a visit to Berlin.

TRANS. OCT. 15

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 19 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

When Pierre Monteux stepped upon the platform of Symphony hall in Boston Saturday afternoon before the great audience and orchestra assembled for the opening of the Boston Symphony season, a storm of applause greeted the illustrious French conductor whose present season will culminate his contract. The program included Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Dukas's "The Peri," Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." Hundreds applying for admission had been turned away, since all seats for the series of 24 concerts were re-subscribed last spring. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba, and two French horns.

The concert was called the most brilliant the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever given.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

Oct. 18 - 1923

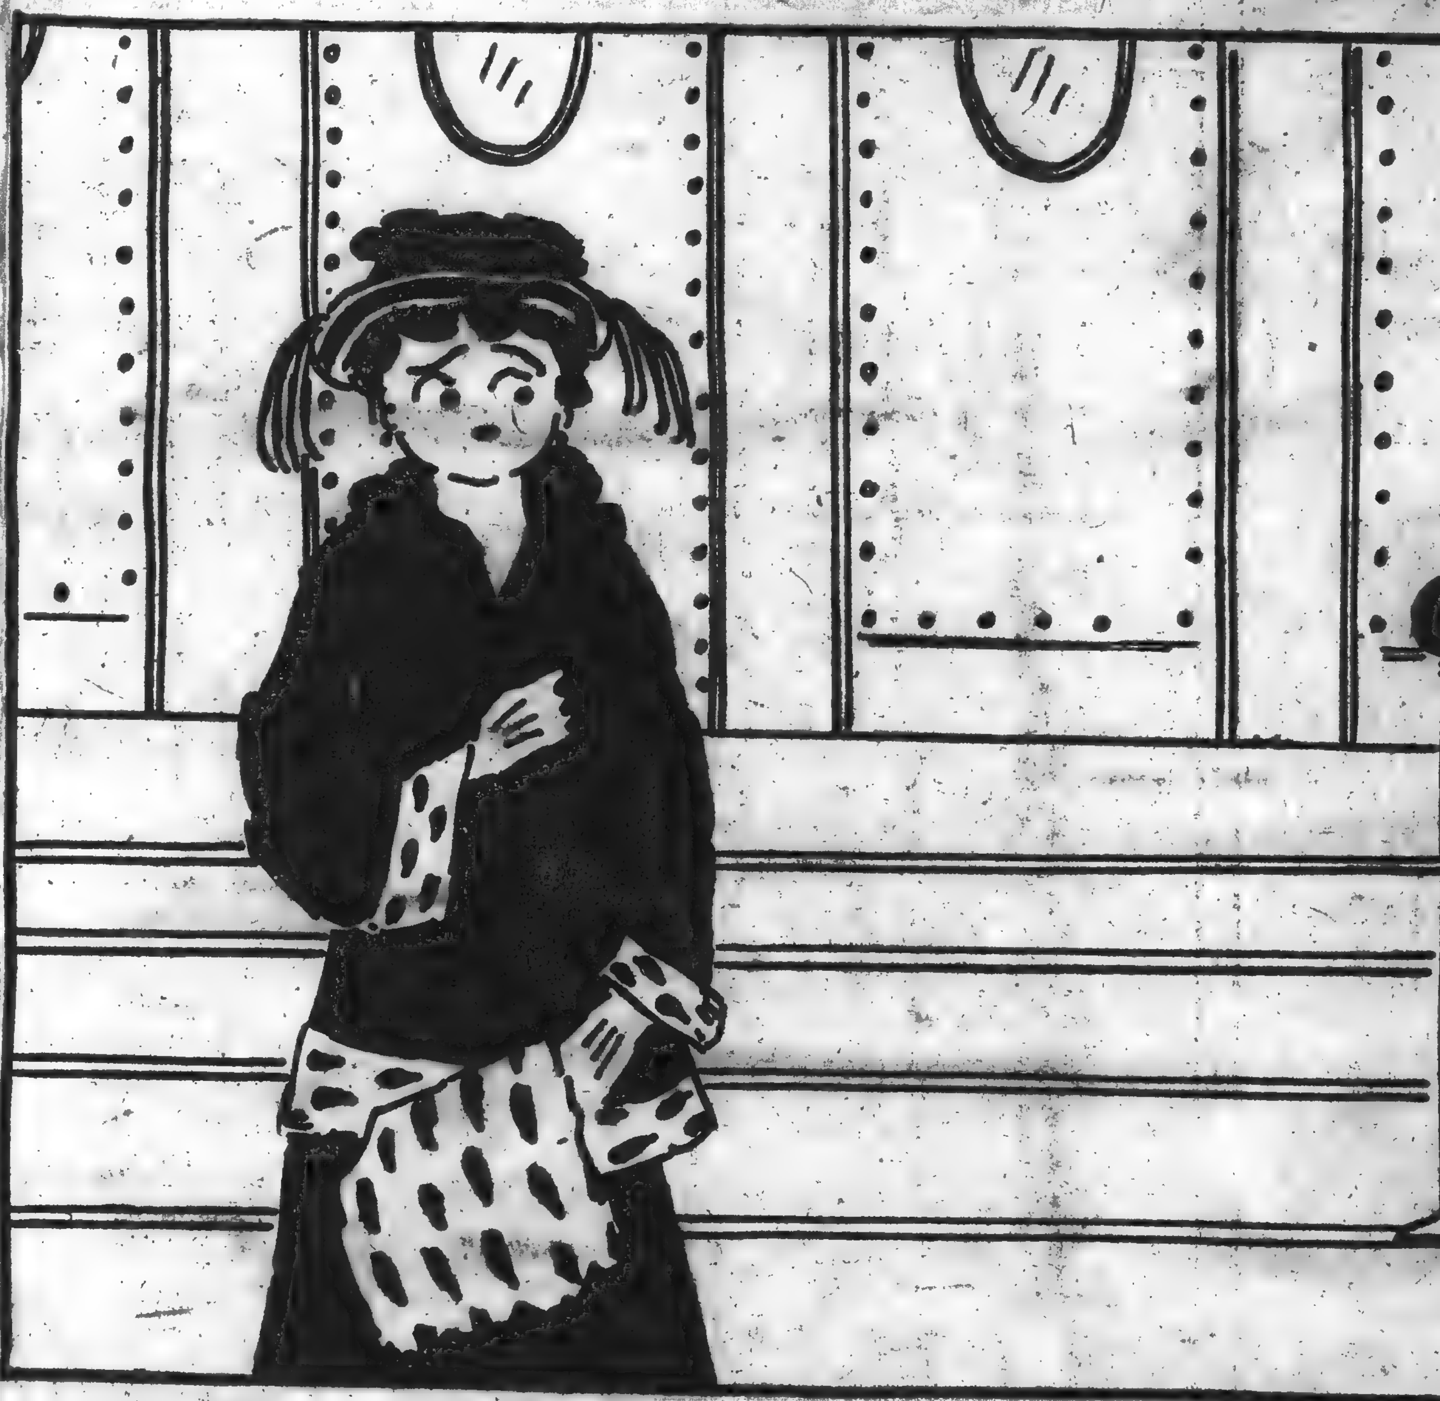
MONTEUX TO PRESENT NEW WORKS AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

New Works Brought Over from Europe to Be Featured on This Season's Programs—McCormack Thrills Large Audience—San Carlo Repertory—Notes

Boston, October 14.—Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought back from Europe many new and interesting compositions from which he will select several to be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra. These scores give further evidence of the catholicity of view, freedom from chauvinism and conscientious search for novel music of interest which has characterized the French conductor's programs during his leadership of the local orchestra.

From Paris Mr. Monteux brings Honegger's A Summer Pastoral; Roussel's ballet, The Spider's Feast, and his tone poem of Spring; Debussy's Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian; Mehul's overture to his opera Joseph; Ravel's Mother Goose and pieces by Aubert and Ropartz. Modern German music will be represented by Mahler's first symphony. Bruckner's seventh symphony, Strauss' Sinfonia Domestica, an overture by Schreker, and an orchestral fragment from Pfitzner's opera, Palestrina, and a probable work of Schönberg. A feature of the year will be the first performance since Dr. Muck's day of Beethoven's ninth symphony with the assistance of the Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs. The Russian composers will include Scriabin's Divine Poem, Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Antar. English music that is likely to be heard during the current season will probably include the Color Symphony of Bliss; Goossen's tone poem, The Eternal Rhythm; Vaughan Williams' Tallis variations, repeated from last year; Elgar's Cockaigne and numbers from Bax and Bridge. From Italy Mr. Monteux brings a suite of dances by Respighi, Tommasini's tone poem, Il Beato Regno, and a piece by Malipiero. The Hungarian Bela Bartok will be represented by a suite, and the Spaniard de Falla also has sent a score. Of American music the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra will probably hear a repetition of Carpenter's Adventures in a Perambulator and Gilbert's Comedy Overture on Negro Themes.

Predicaments of the Concert-Room



The Time, The Place and—The Plight
Time: 3.10 on a Friday Afternoon
Place: Lobby of Symphony Hall
Plight: Absence of Friend Due—with Tickets—at 2.20

UPON his Second Symphony, played last evening in Cambridge, as it will be played today and tomorrow in Boston, Mr. Rakhmaninov may look with the pride of one who has achieved rarely and significantly. The list of symphonies from the hands of living composers is of goodly length. Yet few have won definite place in the orchestral repertory. Four of the five by Sibelius are thus established; so also are the first two of d'Indy; while in this company may surely be numbered Rakhmaninov's Second. It is the fashion of the hour to speak slightingly of the Russian, to dismiss him with an air of superiority as a "stand-patter"; even to condemn him as a reactionary. This Second Symphony, in particular has detractors who reproach it with unwarranted prolixity and occasional commonplace. Yet for some the piece, now nearing its twentieth year, wears uncommonly well. With or without the sensitive composer's recent cuts, it holds its own for conductors, orchestras, audiences.

With or without cuts again—for Mr. Monteux did not always accept these excisions—steadily forward went the Symphony in Sanders Theatre, from first bar to last unfolding, expanding, saying its full say yet never marking time nor wearying the hearer with vain repetition. Not the least among Mr. Monteux's virtues as conductor is his ability to keep the music in hand in constant flux and motion, not by the obvious expedient of merely quickening the tempo but by maintaining the rhythmic pulse and by resisting every temptation to over-emphasize alluring details. Within recent memory he has done such service for the Symphony in C-major of Schubert, and in thus reanimating the Second Symphony of Rakhmaninov he bids fair to win for the piece new adherents and to strengthen the admiration of those who have long esteemed it. Between such leading and the composer's cuts, the longeurs of the slow movement vanished.

Rahmanmov's position in music is a singular one. He is of that small company of composers who have contrived to be individual without attaining originality. He has invented no new harmonies. It would even be difficult to point out a single progression that might be called typically Rakhmaninovian. Yet somehow his harmony manifests a personal quality, a distinctive color. Again his melody, though without idiosyncracy of interval, is always distinuishable, and his instrumentation, while devoid of actual novelty, seems peculiarly his own. So marked indeed is this personal quality that many of his compositions seem but a re-writing of material previously used. And were all his music destroyed save this second symphony and the tone-poem "The Isle of the Dead," all that is vital and essential to it would still remain. In the one piece he displays to the full his power to evoke a sombre dramatic mood that has no precise parallel in music. With the other he has poured into the symphonic mould his grave richness of harmonic and orchestral color and likewise all that is characteristc in the purely lyrical phase of his talent.

For this is predominantly a lyric symphony. Steadily it sings, and its themes, whether tinged with the composer's native melancholy or with his rarer gaiety and exuberance, have definite melodic contour. When first heard they arrest the ear, and on each re-hearing they return as welcome friends. Even in the Scherzo the composer's songful impulse will not down, and barely has this spirited movement begun before the violins sing the half-elgaic, [illegible] cantilena that none but [illegible] could have written. If the [illegible] is a little vaguer in outline, and the development, even with judicious cuts, a little diffuse, the movement never for an instant loses lyric quality; while in this merit it stands nearly alone among the slow sections in modern symphonies. (Whatever else he may be, the representative modern composer is no lyricist.) Again with the finale Rakhmaninov's melodic gift does not desert him, though here it does occasionally betray him, since now and then the music turns almost commonplace. As often with Chaikovsky, to whom Rakhmaninov owes much both technically and spiritually, the sheer energy of the music and its unquestionable sincerity tend for the moment to silence these critical scruples.

Preceding concerts in Boston yielded the other orchestral numbers—Brahms's "Saint Anthony" Variations and the Dance of Salome from Strauss's opera. Once more the Variations of Brahms oppressed with their pedantry or charmed with their freshness as the composer, according to his wont, wrote now with his head and now from his heart. Again Salome's Dance gripped ear and fired imagination as it began and as it ended; while for the rest it proved that the greatest of living composers could, at the very time when he should have written with a pen of blood and fire, make music that is both flat and tawdry.

Between these pieces Miss Kathryn Meisle, once member of the Chicago Opera Company, though little known in this city, sang the air "Amour, viens aider," from "Samson and Delilah," and the celebrated "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." It was refreshing to find Miss Meisle choosing this comparatively neglected song from the opera of Saint-Saëns rather than the hackneyed "Mon Cœur s'Quovre a ta Voix." To the singing of this ingratiating music she brought richness of tone and warmth of interpretation, and she bestowed these same gifts on Verdi's air, nowadays heard oftener from the [illegible] concert-platform and—outside the opera house—rarely sung with orchestral accompaniment. An obvious theatricalism mars the opening recitative and the final outburst, but between comes one of the most notable of Verdi's inspirations. Not even for "Aida" might he find a melody more sensuously beautiful. W. S. S.

TRANS. OCT. 19.

SYMPHONY ASSISTED BY SINGER

Aubert's "Habanera" Given for First Time Fails to Please

BY OLIN DOWNES

TRANS. OCT. 19

Once the composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, said to us that the greatest thing in art was sincerity. The performance of his second symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, brought this remark forcibly to mind.

SINCERE AND EFFECTIVE

For the symphony has a number of faults quite evident now that the work is familiar here, and at the same time it has an irresistible sincerity to which it was impossible for one listener, at any rate, not to respond. True, this symphony is too long. True, it has passages of tearful sentimentality. And the instrumentation is too thick and there is too much string color throughout.

Very well! Yet this work has a wonderful quality of the heart, in which the composer speaks straight through his instruments to those who hear him. One does not think so much of esthetic values as one thinks, "This man is my brother." Before him one would not hisitate, if occasion rose, to speak from one's inner self, or ask solace. Those who have never seen Sergei Rachmaninoff hear the tones of his voice in this music, and are stirred by his spirit.

Long, But Enjoyable

Moreover, there is the fine Slavic gloom of Rachmaninoff's orchestra, and the great masses of flaming color that occasionally burst through. And he has a great excuse for his lengthiness. That is a very uncommon richness of imagination in developing his ideas. It is an eloquent symphony. We must impenitently admit that we enjoyed it.

Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was soloist. She sang the well known scene and aria "Abscheulicher," etc., from Beethoven's "Fidelio," which to say the truth, is becoming pretty flat; and also the rapturous song of Elizabeth, "Dich theure halle," from [illegible]

[132]

Symphony Orchestra

A NEW Spanish piece by a French composer, and a new German singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, diversify the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The new piece is a dance-tune, a Habanera glorified by the rhythmic verve, the harmonic and instrumental color that twentieth-century composer and twentieth-century orchestra may lend to it. Aubert wrote it. Faintly Bostonians may remember him as composer of "The Blue Forest," passing piece of folk-tale, at their opera house. The new singer is Miss Rethberg, who came from Dresden to New York last winter, well graced in voice and in the other means and attributes of song. She will sing Beethoven's displayful piece, "Ah, Perfido," and Elisabeth's Salute to the Hall of Song in "Tannhäuser." Rakhmaninov's familiar, lengthy and often eloquent Symphony in E minor, will begin the concerts; Smetana's racing overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," will end them.

To Sanders Theatre at Harvard, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra go next Thursday evening for the first of the annual series of concerts in Cambridge. Rakhmaninov's Symphony in E Minor as aforesaid, the Variations of Brahms upon a Theme of Haydn, the Dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named music-drama, are the numbers for the band. Between whiles, Miss Katherine Meisle, fast becoming a notable alto-singer, will be heard in pieces from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" and Verdi's "Don Carlos." By these signs an operatic voice and manner.

TRANS. OCT. 13.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, second program. Second symphony, in E minor, Rachmaninov; "Ah, perfido," Beethoven; "Habanera," Aubert; "Dich, Theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana. Soloist, Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano.

GLOBE. OCT. 14.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Contrasts and Comparisons in Mr. Monteux's First Programme—Mr. Shalyapin Repeats Too Many Pieces in Tedious Surroundings—Mr. Kusevitzky's European Leave-Takings

WITH the present unmistakable reaction against the subtleties of French Impressionism and the excesses of neo-German Romanticism has come a new faith in the all but abandoned doctrine that a musical idea is one thing and the instrumental presentation quite another. Repeatedly have we been assured that to submit the orchestral music of a Debussy or a Strauss to the proof of performance in the cold black-and-white of the pianoforte is unsound and unfair, though it was freely admitted that a Beethoven or even a Wagner could bear such test triumphantly. But now that our ears have become accustomed to, and even cloyed by, these irridescent or glowing or tumultous sonorities, we can peer more closely beneath the surface and so may discriminate between the flesh and blood that is melody, harmony and rhythm and the diaphonous or gorgeous garment that is—or lately was—modern orchestration. Possessed of this new clarity of vision, we are not infrequently discovering dross where we had once thought to find gold. Yet by a kindly working of the law of compensation we are experiencing, too, a new satisfaction in all music, ancient or modern, that may defy this searching scrutiny. Perhaps through very surfeit of tonal luxuriance. we are perceiving a hitherto unsuspected beauty in the once contemned orchestration of the classics.

Intentionally no doubt, since he is shrewd in such matters, it was in the order of the instrumental requirements that Mr. Monteux set the four pieces which made the programme of the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. To the modest orchestra of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Brahms in his "St. Anthony" Variations would add a piccolo, a double bassoon, a third and fourth horn and a triangle. For Dukas of "The Peri" a third bassoon takes the place of the double bassoon, and he must have—besides the German's other instruments—an English horn, a bass clarinet, a third trumpet three trombones and tuba, two harps, a celesta and a side-drum, bass drum, tambourine, xylophone and cymbals. For Salome's Dance Strauss demands substantially every instrument that the contemporary orchestra affords—and for good measure a heckelphone, a fifth clarinet, a fourth trombone, an organ and a harmonium. . . .

And yet for how many in Friday's or Saturday's audience was Salome's dance as pulse-stirring as was the Finale of the Seventh Symphony or how many found in the radiantly scored but intrinsically empty music of Dukas a greater pleasure than in the unassuming loveliness of Beethoven's Allegretto? And for all Mr. Monteux's efforts in behalf of Strauss and Dukas—and their music was brilliantly played—was it not in the music of Beethoven that he gave most truly of himself and found the most spontaneous response from the players before him? Not all the scholarly ingenuity of Brahms nor the tonal magic of Dukas nor the orchestral violences and splendors of Strauss could banish recollection of the simpler but irresistibly eloquent music of Beethoven. Of what avail [illegible] this instance the stupendous technical progress of a hundred years? Almost it seemed a retrogression. W. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

[illegible] conductors go there is no more con[illegible]ate and generous man—it is now safe [illegible]ay—than Mr. Monteux. Among the [illegible]es he had long had in mind for revival [illegible]he Symphony Concerts this season was [illegible]kovsky's tone-poem, "Francesca da Rimini." It [illegible] which Mr. Kusevitzky excels—and next year Mr. Kusevitzky becomes conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. And to him, without a word except those here printed, Mr. Monteux has left "Francesca."

A series of unexacting concerts on Saturday evenings, at monthly intervals in Jordan Hall, will bring thither on Nov. 17, Mr. Cadman, the composer, and his assisting Indian woman-singer; on Dec. 15, Miss Grace Kerns, pleasing in song; and on Jan. 12, a Sextet assembled from the remarkable choir for liturgical music at the Russian Cathedral in New York. As a body, it once made no little stir here. Now this Sextet may recall its glories.

Before Mr. Kusevitzky comes to Boston next autumn he would evidently re-traverse his European field and confirm his place there. To his usual concerts in Paris—a series in the autumn, a series in the spring—he will add as many as five with the London Symphony Orchestra in that city; a visit to Manchester and a visit to Berlin.

TRANS. OCT. 15

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 19 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

When Pierre Monteux stepped upon the platform of Symphony hall in Boston Saturday afternoon before the great audience and orchestra assembled for the opening of the Boston Symphony season, a storm of applause greeted the illustrious French conductor whose present season will culminate his contract. The program included Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Dukas's "The Peri," Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." Hundreds applying for admission had been turned away, since all seats for the series of 24 concerts were re-subscribed last spring. The personnel of the orchestra is increased by the addition of a new trumpet, tympanist, tuba, and two French horns.

The concert was called the most brilliant the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever given.

UPON his Second Symphony, played last evening in Cambridge, as it will be played today and tomorrow in Boston, Mr. Rakhmaninov may look with the pride of one who has achieved rarely and significantly. The list of symphonies from the hands of living composers is of goodly length. Yet few have won definite place in the orchestral repertory. Four of the five by Sibelius are thus established; so also are the first two of d'Indy; while in this company may surely be numbered Rakhmaninov's Second. It is the fashion of the hour to speak slightingly of the Russian, to dismiss him with an air of superiority as a "stand-patter"; even to condemn him as a reactionary. This Second Symphony, in particular has detractors who reproach it with unwarranted prolixity and occasional commonplace. Yet for some the piece, now nearing its twentieth year, wears uncommonly well. With or without the sensitive composer's recent cuts, it holds its own for conductors, orchestras, audiences.

With or without cuts again—for Mr. Monteux did not always accept these excisions—steadily forward went the Symphony in Sanders Theatre, from first bar to last unfolding, expanding, saying its full say yet never marking time nor wearying the hearer with vain repetition. Not the least among Mr. Monteux's virtues as conductor is his ability to keep the music in hand in constant flux and motion, not by the obvious expedient of merely quickening the tempo but by maintaining the rhythmic pulse and by resisting every temptation to over-emphasize alluring details. Within recent memory he has done such service for the Symphony in C-major of Schubert, and in thus reanimating the Second Symphony of Rakhmaninov he bids fair to win for the piece new adherents and to strengthen the admiration of those who have long esteemed it. Between such leading and the composer's cuts, the longeurs of the slow movement vanished.

Rahmanmov's position in music is a singular one. He is of that small company of composers who have contrived to be individual without attaining originality. He has invented no new harmonies. It would even be difficult to point out a single progression that might be called typically Rakhmaninovian. Yet somehow his harmony manifests a personal quality, a distinctive color. Again his melody, though without idiosyncracy of interval, is always distinuishable, and his instrumentation, while devoid of actual novelty, seems peculiarly his own. So marked indeed is this personal quality that many of his compositions seem but a re-writing of material previously used. And were all his music destroyed save this second symphony and the tone-poem "The Isle of the Dead," all that is vital and essential to it would still remain. In the one piece he displays to the full his power to evoke a sombre dramatic mood that has no precise parallel in music. With the other he has poured into the symphonic mould his grave richness of harmonic and orchestral color and likewise all that is characteristc in the purely lyrical phase of his talent.

For this is predominantly a lyric symphony. Steadily it sings, and its themes, whether tinged with the composer's native melancholy or with his rarer gaiety and exuberance, have definite melodic contour. When first heard they arrest the ear, and on each re-hearing they return as welcome friends. Even in the Scherzo the composer's songful impulse will not down, and barely has this spirited movement begun before the violins sing the half-elgaic, half-passionate cantilena that none but Rakhmaninov could have written. If the [illegible] Adagio is a little vaguer in outline, and the development, even with judicious cuts, a little diffuse, the movement never for an instant loses lyric quality; while in this merit it stands nearly alone among the slow sections in modern symphonies. (Whatever else he may be, the representative modern composer is no lyricist.) Again with the finale Rakhmaninov's melodic gift does not desert him, though here it does occasionally betray him, since now and then the music turns almost commonplace. As often with Chaikovsky, to whom Rakhmaninov owes much both technically and spiritually, the sheer energy of the music and its unquestionable sincerity tend for the moment to silence these critical scruples.

Preceding concerts in Boston yielded the other orchestral numbers—Brahms's "Saint Anthony" Variations and the Dance of Salome from Strauss's opera. Once more the Variations of Brahms oppressed with their pedantry or charmed with their freshness as the composer, according to his wont, wrote now with his head and now from his heart. Again Salome's Dance gripped ear and fired imagination as it began and as it ended; while for the rest it proved that the greatest of living composers could, at the very time when he should have written with a pen of blood and fire, make music that is both flat and tawdry.

Between these pieces Miss Kathryn Meisle, once member of the Chicago Opera Company, though little known in this city, sang the air "Amour, viens aider," from "Samson and Delilah," and the celebrated "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." It was refreshing to find Miss Meisle choosing this comparatively neglected song from the opera of Saint-Saëns rather than the hackneyed "Mon Cœur s'Quovre a ta Voix." To the singing of this ingratiating music she brought richness of tone and warmth of interpretation, and she bestowed these same gifts on Verdi's air, nowadays heard oftener from the phonograph than from the concert-platform and—outside the opera house—rarely sung with orchestral accompaniment. An obvious theatricalism mars the opening recitative and the final outburst, but between comes one of the most notable of Verdi's inspirations. Not even for "Aida" might he find a melody more sensuously beautiful. W. S. S.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of Oct. 18-1923

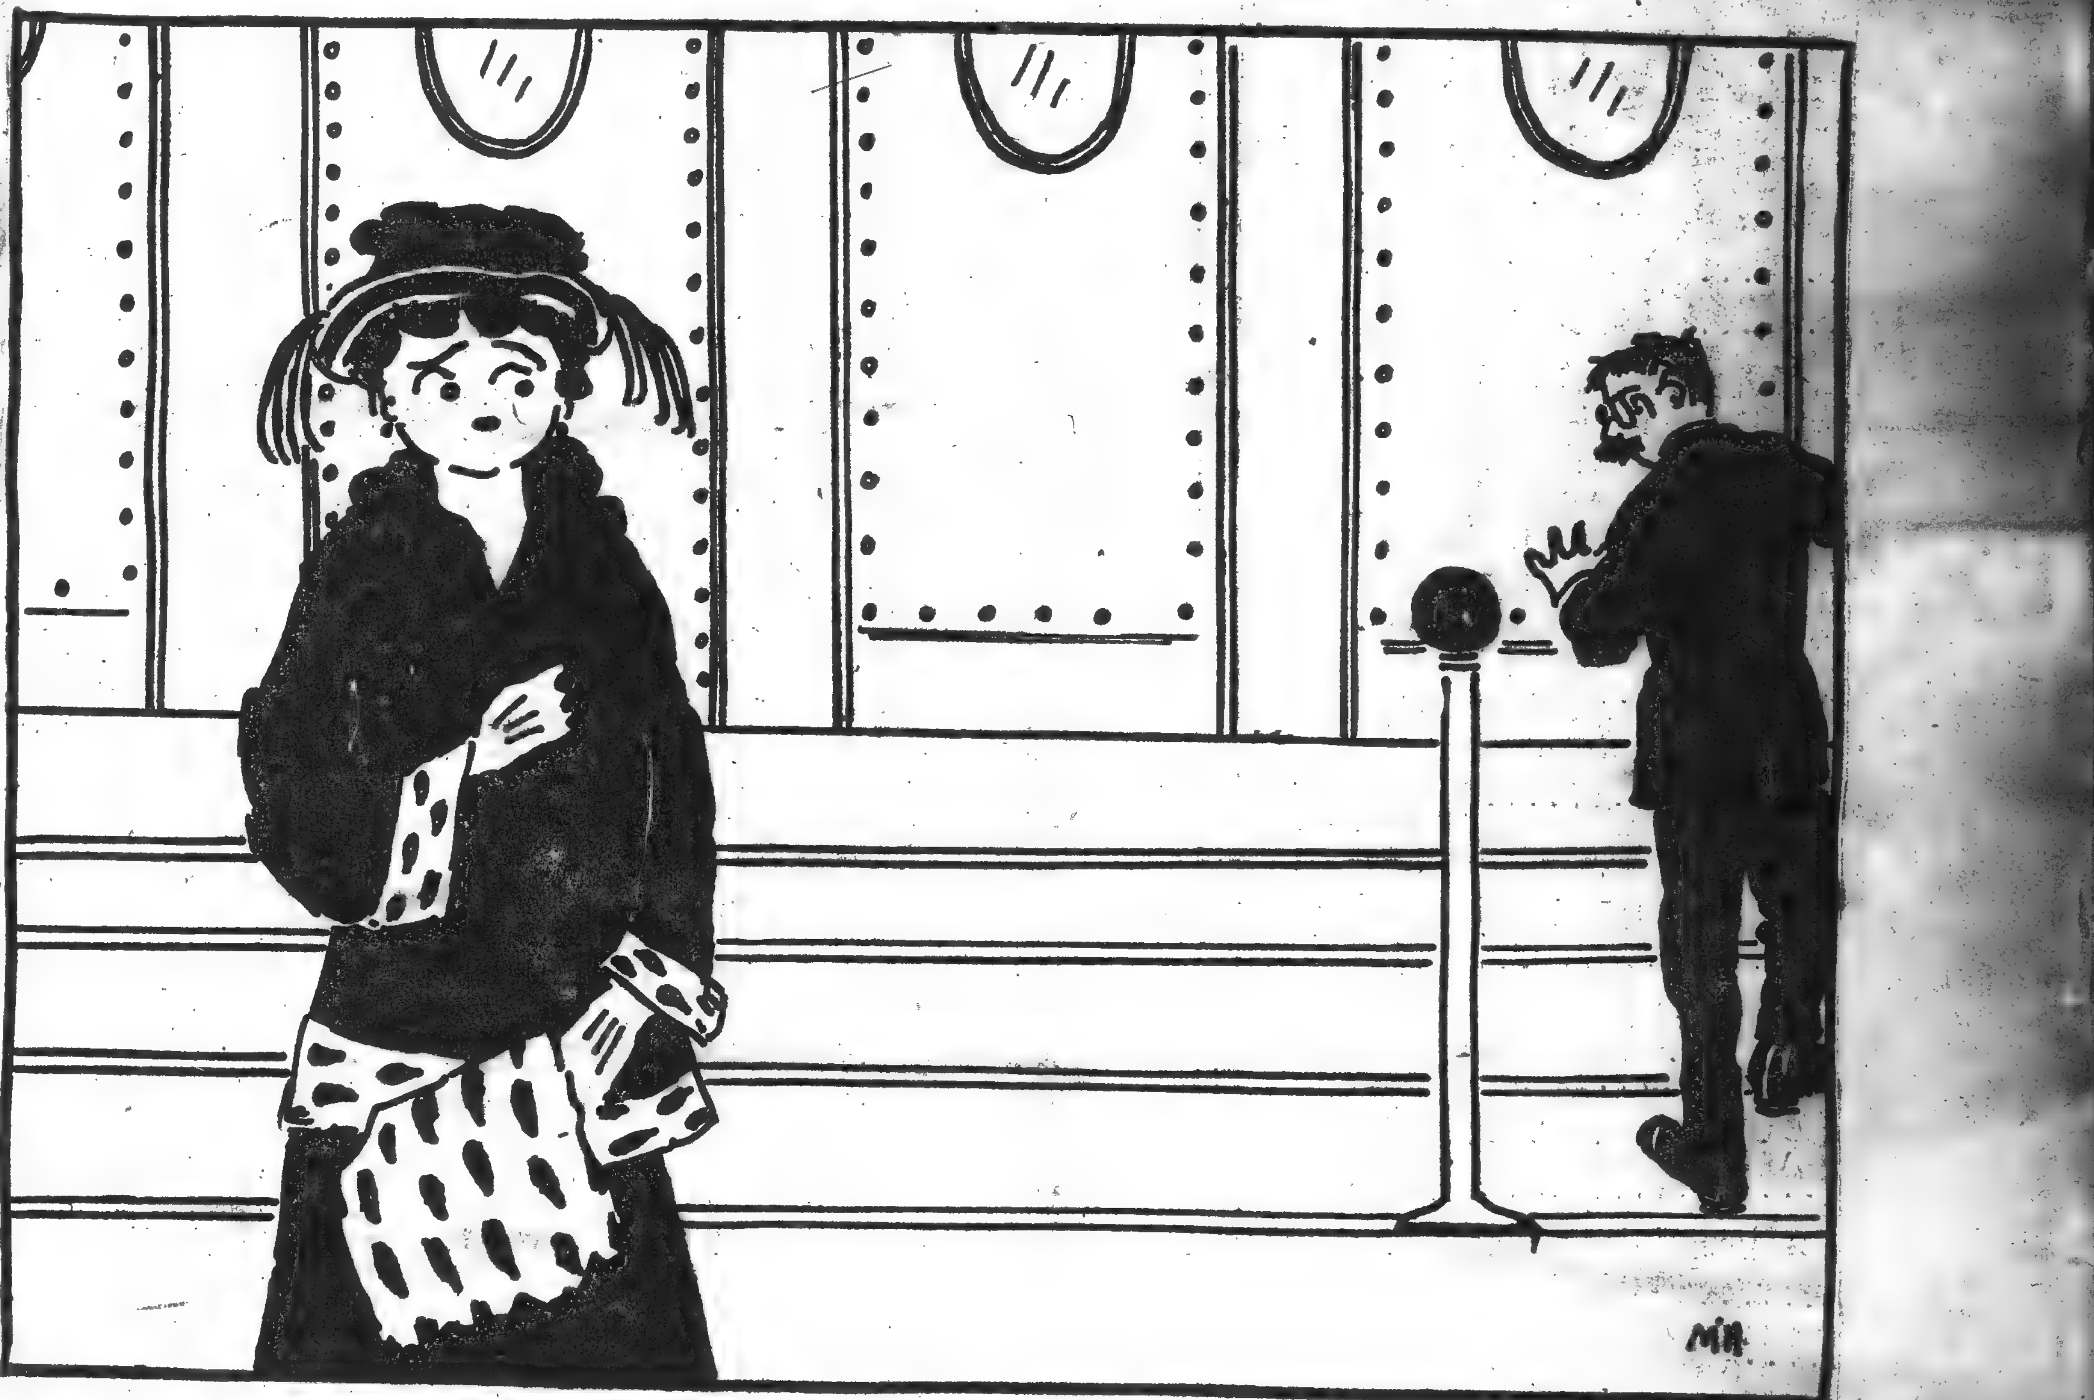
MONTEUX TO PRESENT NEW WORKS AT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

New Works Brought Over from Europe to Be Featured on This Season's Programs—McCormack Thrills Large Audience—San Carlo Repertory—Notes

Boston, October 14.—Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought back from Europe many new and interesting compositions from which he will select several to be played in the course of his fifth and last season as conductor of the orchestra. These scores give further evidence of the catholicity of view, freedom from chauvinism and conscientious search for novel music of interest which has characterized the French conductor's programs during his leadership of the local orchestra.

From Paris Mr. Monteux brings Honegger's A Summer Pastoral; Roussel's ballet, The Spider's Feast, and his tone poem of Spring; Debussy's Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian; Mehul's overture to his opera Joseph; Ravel's Mother Goose and pieces by Aubert and Ropartz. Modern German music will be represented by Mahler's first symphony. Bruckner's seventh symphony, Strauss' Sinfonia Domestica, an overture by Schreker, and an orchestral fragment from Pfitzner's opera, Palestrina, and a probable work of Schönberg. A feature of the year will be the first performance since Dr. Muck's day of Beethoven's ninth symphony with the assistance of the Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs. The Russian composers will include Scriabin's Divine Poem, Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Antar. English music that is likely to be heard during the current season will probably include the Color Symphony of Bliss; Goossen's tone poem, The Eternal Rhythm; Vaughan Williams' Tallis variations, repeated from last year; Elgar's Cockaigne and numbers from Bax and Bridge. From Italy Mr. Monteux brings a suite of dances by Respighi, Tommasini's tone poem, Il Beato Regno, and a piece by Malipiero. The Hungarian Bela Bartok will be represented by a suite, and the Spaniard de Falla also has sent a score. Of American music the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra will probably hear a repetition of Carpenter's Adventures in a Perambulator and Gilbert's Comedy Overture on Negro Themes.

Predicaments of the Concert-Room



The Time, The Place and—The Plight
Time: 3.10 on a Friday Afternoon
Place: Lobby of Symphony Hall
Plight: Absence of Friend Due—with Tickets—at 2.20

TRANS. OCT. 19.

SYMPHONY ASSISTED BY SINGER

Aubert's "Habanera" Given for First Time Fails to Please

BY OLIN DOWNES

Once the composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, said to us that the greatest thing in art was sincerity. The performance of his second symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, brought this remark forcibly to mind.

TRANS. OCT. 19

SINCERE AND EFFECTIVE

For the symphony has a number of faults quite evident now that the work is familiar here, and at the same time it has an irresistible sincerity to which it was impossible for one listener, at any rate, not to respond. True, this symphony is too long. True, it has passages of tearful sentimentality. And the instrumentation is too thick, and there is too much string color throughout.

Very well! Yet this work has a wonderful quality of the heart, by which the composer speaks straight through his instruments to those who hear him. One does not think so much of esthetic values as one thinks, "This man is my brother." Before him one would not hisitate, if occasion rose, to speak from one's inner self, or ask solace. Those who have never seen Sergei Rachmaninoff hear the tones of his voice in this music, and are stirred by his spirit.

Long, But Enjoyable

Moreover, there is the fine Slavic gloom of Rachmaninoff's orchestra, and the great masses of flaming color that occasionally burst through. And he has a great excuse for his lengthiness. That is a very uncommon richness of imagination in developing his ideas. It is an eloquent symphony. We must impenitently admit that we enjoyed it.

Elizabeth Rethberg, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was soloist. She sang the well known scene and aria "Abscheulicher," etc., from Beethoven's "Fidelio," which to say the truth, is becoming pretty flat; and also the rapturous song of Elizabeth, "Dich theure halle," from Tannhauser reputation [illegible] comment from the critical gentlemen of New York. We are sorry to say that we can't see it. She has a fresh voice, a good range, youth, and honesty of intention. Technically she is not brilliant, and more than once shouted to get in her climaxes.

Good, But Not Great

Nor was she emotionally convincing. There are sopranos who make Beethoven's music from his rapidly aging Fidelio eloquent and alive again with mighty meanings. They recreate the music. They feel it as it was felt before the modern day, and communicate the illusion to modern and sophisticated audiences. We had not that reaction to Miss Rethberg's performance, nor did the virginal and youthfully exuberant music of Wagner show her art in much more convincing guise. A good operatic soprano; not, today, a great one.

There was performed for the first time here a most unfortunate effort at musical composition by Louis Aubert, a symphonic poem, "Habanera." The piece was performed at the Pasdeloup concerts in Paris in March, 1920. Emile Vuillermoz has written perfervidly of this music. The piece, he says, "is from beginning to end, a long nostalgic dance, a vast impassioned palpitation, a beautiful musical scarf, whose folds raised by the rhythm become in turn raging and calm, without ceasing to be harmonious."

Ugly and Wholly Empty

Impassioned nonsense! This piece is as empty as music could be. Aubert's opera, "La Foret Bleue," given here years ago by the Boston Opera Company, was weak enough—prettily weak, pallidly weak. This music makes hysterical efforts to be sensuous, violent, languorous, fatalistic. It borrows of Debussy and Ravel. The Habanera fades in the distance as the motive of the dream of the faun vanishes in Debussy's celebrated symphonic poem. Aubert's work is ugly, wholly empty, wholly invertebrate, and it is to be hoped that it will not take up valuable time in a long future of symphony concerts.

The music, the incomparable music, which was the artistic climax of the afternoon was the indescribably gay and riant score which Smetana wrote as prelude to his opera of "The Bartered Bride." That is music. Each flying measure is inhabited by genius, from the highly original opening, and the reckless gayety of the peasant dance, to the echo of a Bohemian love-music at the end. In one moment from Mr. Monteaux's raising of the baton for this performance, all of the dullness, medicority or discursiveness was dispelled, and a new and radiant world revealed by the creative power of a great, simple master.

POST-Oct. 19.

'HABANERA' GIVEN AT SECOND CONCERT

Much Heralded, It Disappoints; Overture Features

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rachmaninov, Symphony No. 2, E minor; Beethoven, Scene and Aria from "Fidelio": Aubert, Habanera; Wagner; Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser"; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride."

Although Mr. Rachmaninov had cut down his Symphony from a length of 65 to 50 or 52 minutes; although the Habanera was played here for the first time and Miss Rethberg made her first appearance here, the feature of the concert was Smetana's overture, which was brilliantly performed. For this overture has life; it sparkles; it promises enjoyment to come for those in the opera house and as it passes, gives pleasure No doubt it is eminently suited to Smetana's opera, but it might be a prelude to any joyous work.

How will Rachmaninov stand as a composer 25 years from now, or even in 1933? It would not be fair, perhaps, to say that the best passages in his symphony are those that are in the Tchaikovskian vein, yet when he is most emotional the hearer is compelled to remember Peter the Cosmopolitan, and throughout the work there are Peter's mannerisms—the vain repetitions; the tossing of themes from one group of instruments to another; above all the sentimentalism. There are effective passages, even when they are inclined to be flamboyant; thus the chief section of the Scherzo is captivating; but there is in every movement the feeling: "If he would only say less, for much of what he says he has already said." M. Monteux and the orchestra did all that was possible for the glorification of the composer.

After the reports from Paris about Louis Aubert's "Habanera," great was the disappointment here. The Habanera bears a motto from one of Baudelaire's prose poems in which the poet expresses a distinct wish to breath the perfume of a woman's hair, to bury his face in her locks, "If you could know all that I see! All that I feel! All that I hear in your tresses! My soul journeys on perfumes, as the souls of other men on music."

Now, what has this to do, however [illegible] the desire of the poet, with [illegible] the composer? But French [illegible] the "Habanera," wrote [illegible] of passion." The [illegible] the dance and M. [illegible] are astonishing [illegible] in an [illegible] Hook, [illegible] pared to palpitate, to be intoxicated. Alas, this "Habanera" is as pale a thing as the composer's "Blue Forest" produced at the Boston Opera House; less tiresome because it is shorter. As for perfume and passion, where are they? In the articles of the French critics. It has been said that the more inferior a novel, play, or opera, the more brilliant should be the article; that a work, in fact, is only an excuse for the reviewer. Hearing yesterday the "Habanera" rhythm, interrupted to give room for some measures in the Debussyian manner, one consoled oneself by recalling the "Habenara" of Chabrier, of Ravel, and of Laparra's opera.

Soloist at the Second Boston Symphony Concert

MISS ELIZABETH RETHBERG

Miss Rethberg appears to be a young singer who has already acquired a certain routine. Her voice is fresh, firm, agreeable in the middle and lower parts of her voice. Her upper notes were shrill yesterday and not always steady. As an interpreter, she was not conspicuous for her emotional expression. It is to be regretted that, as her repertoire is an extensive one, she was content with the thrice-worn arias she chose.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise the first symphony of Sibelius; Ancient Dances and Airs for the lute, freely arranged for orchestra by Respighi (first time at these concerts); and Frank Bridge's Suite "The Sea" (conducted by the composer: first time in Boston).

HERALD. OCT. 20

OPERA SINGER AT SYMPHONY

Boston heard a famous German dramatic soprano, Elizabeth Rethberg, first time at yesterday's Symphony concert.

Mme Rethberg

Mme. Rethberg, who made her first success in opera at Dresden, came last season to the Metropolitan in New York, appearing as Aida on the occasion of her American debut. Later she sang in concert.

A well-trained musician, like all the first-rate German opera singers, tall, blond, statuesque, with a rich, resonant voice, she delighted the Symphony patrons. She sang the "Come, Hope" aria from Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," and the beautiful greeting to the hall aria from Wagner's "Tannhauser." On the whole, the Wagner selection was the more enjoyed. Mme. Rethberg made a most pleasing impression.

Aubert's "Habanera" is the symphonic novelty on the second program of the season, which will be repeated tonight. It is a brilliant, elaborate and dramatic setting of the celebrated Spanish dance. It would be a treat to have this interpreted by Pavlowa and her Ballet Russe. A French critic said that it would never achieve due popularity until some such thing was done with it. It deserves a place in the best ballet repertoires. Mr. Monteux conducted the piece with the utmost enthusiasm.

There was also a capital performance of the Rachmaninoff symphony in E minor, not heard at a symphony conecrt since 1917. At the end of the performance Mr. Monteux and the players were given an ovation.

The final number on the program is the overture to the Smetana opera, "The Sold Bride," a work fit to precede the performance of any classic comedy.

ADVTSR. OCT. 20.

RETHBERG HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Soprano in Boston Debut Pleases in Wagner Air

Aubert's "Habanera," Smetana and Rachmaninoff Played

Yesterday's Symphony concert brought the Boston debut of a singer, Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera, and a new "Habanera" by Louis Aubert, neither of them of more than respectable musical merit. Miss Rethberg was born with a very beautiful voice, of which she did not yesterday make the most.

Aubert's music confirms Richard Strauss' remark that it is only superficially easy to imitate Debussy. Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony was brilliantly played and warmly applauded, but even such a minor classic as Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, the final number played, has merits far less specious and more permanent.

Miss Rethberg, plainly nervous in attacking Leonora's "Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin," from "Fidelio," did not touch the heights or depths of emotion demanded both by the situation in the opera and by Beethoven's music. She made a conscientious effort to be passionately angry and to pass from that state to one of exalted joy the moment after; but neither her perfunctory and none too skilful interpretation nor the equally unsatisfactory orchestral accompaniment did justice to Beethoven.

Elisabeth's "Dich, theure Hakle," from "Tannhauser," simpler in its emotional content, and demanding, or at least commonly receiving, less of perfect bel canto, gave Miss Rethberg an opportunity to achieve something more nearly within her present powers. Her fine and powerful voice made its beauty felt, despite an occassional swooping and slurring of phrases, and a sadly faulty diction.

One wondered why with so short a program the orchestral introduction to this number was cut. Miss Rethberg was politely applauded, and recalled three times by the audience.

Rachmaninoff's E minor Symphony contains much music that would be effective and above the customary level of taste in the opera house. The materials used are too fragmentary and too ordinary for a symphony. The orchestration is of cloying richness. If Rachmaninoff had followed Verdi's practice of not listening to other people's compositions there might have been fewer echoes in the working out portions of this symphony. The themes are not borrowed, but they are elaborated upon in a post-Wagnerian manner like that of Tchaikovsky or Rubinstein. This music is of the end of the 19th century rather than the beginning of the 20th. Possibly that is why the audience liked it.

Aubert's musical ideas and methods are strongly influenced by Debussy, as far as "Habanera" is concerned. But his themes are less vividly delicate and his handling of them far more clumsy than anything Debussy was ever capable of.

Smetana's familiar overture came as the one thoroughly enjoyable thing in the concert. It is not profound or lofty or "in the grand manner," but its aim is rather to please than to astonish. And the contrapuntal skill in its fugue quite equals Rachmaninoff's.

Next week Sibelius' First Symphony, Respighi's suite of ancient dances, played here by Toscanini; and a new suite by Frank Bridge, with the composer conducting, fill the concert program.

GLOBE. OCT. 20

BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 20 1923

Musical Arts Concerts.

The program for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opens the Musical Art series Thursday evening, November 8, in Elmwood Music hall, is one calculated to arouse enthusiasm. The piece de resistance will be the Sibelius E minor symphony, No. 1, Op. 39, a work of rarely exquisite beauty, while the first number on the program will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," written nearly a century ago by the great master of orchestration. Liszt's "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," Symphonic Poem, No. 2, is also promised. This will be the last opportunity local music lovers will have to hear the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux's leadership, as the illustrious conductor will return to his native land after this tour, relinquishing the baton to Serge Koussevitsky.

Mme. Charles Cahier, soloist with the orchestra has been acclaimed by Saint-Saens, Gustav Mahler and many other composers as the greatest contralto living. The following excerpt from the pen of one of the leading Viennese critics gives one an idea of the high regard in which continental Europe holds Mme. Cahier, who was for four years the prima donna contralto of the Royal Opera of Vienna:

"Cahier brings out the old music lovers who, in their anxiety to hear her, will even go hungry rather than miss her concert. They are only afraid she may not come. The largest hall is selected and stage seats are filled. Nowhere is she loved and honored more than in Vienna, nowhere could her great and incomparable art be more highly appreciated than in Vienna. She surpasses herself, if possible. The rich tones flow without visible effort from her lips. In this artist one never perceives, is never conscious of the work, but only of its results."

BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
OCT 20 1923

The Musical Arts series will open with the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 8. Local music lovers will be anxious to hear this concert as Pierre Monteux, distinguished conductor of the orchestra, makes his farewell appearance. Isa Kremer, singing actress whose art has been declared on a plane with that of Duse and Sarah Bernhardt; Beniamino Gigli, premier tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, and Efrem Zimbalist, eminent Russian violinist are on the course.

Season tickets for the Musical Arts series may be procured from Miss Bellanca, No. 230 Delaware avenue. Prices range from $5.50 to $11 for the five concerts.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TRIBUNE
OCT 21 1923

An enthusiastic reception with a sold-out house was given the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux in its first concert of the season on October 12. According to Mr. Philip Hale in "The Boston Herald," the concert was "the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall."

Aubert's 'Habanera' Played by the Boston Symphony

The program of the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was:

Rachmaninoff, Symphony No. 2 in E minor.
Beethoven, Scene and Aria from "Fidelio."
Aubert, "Habañera."
Wagner, Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser."
Smetana, Overture to "The Sold Bride."

Elisabeth Rethberg was the soloist.

Rachmaninoff's symphony is the commonplace raised to the nth degree. It would seem that not a formula dear to Tschaikowsky, not a progression prescribed by the harmony textbooks, has been omitted. Everything is carried out according to rule, and in his desire to introduce all possible examples of thematic development the composer has overloaded his work with cumbersome details. Yet it is not alone in the musical material that this symphony is commonplace. The moods which it seeks to delineate are in themselves of this quality. Beethoven often moves us deeply, stirs the imaginative powers and summons a mood of transcendent beauty with a few simple chords. The greatness, the nobility of his thought is felt in spite of the poverty of the medium through which he would express it. But, alas, the nobility to be found in Rachmaninoff's symphony hardly rings true. Where he would be grandiose he is merely bombastic. Where he would move us by the simplicity and artlessness of his music, as in the opening measures of the slow movement, he is merely affected. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that there is much that is impressive in this symphony. Even platitudes, when hurled at one with almost overwhelming force, are bound to produce a certain effect. So does the orator who atones for the poverty of his thought by the vehemence of his gestures and the violence and passion of his language. Of these three qualities there is not a little in this symphony.

Aubert's "Habañera" is a work of another character entirely; not alone in its outward shape, for here the composer has set himself to work within a small frame, but in the purpose which lies behind it. A single emotion animates the piece from beginning to end, a voluptuous melancholy, and this one idea is elaborated with infinite care and skill. Within its intentionally narrow limits, it is impossible to conceive of a more logical development, a more original conception. But this more intimate and personal music is bound to make a lesser appeal, on a single hearing at least, than a brilliant and effectively written symphony.

Miss Elisabeth Rethberg sang familiar music by Beethoven and Wagner with taste, with skill, with excellent feeling for a well-rounded phrase; in short, she sang as a musician first, as a singer afterward. What more may justly be demanded of an artist? Others there are who bring a greater emotional power to their music, who arouse our enthusiasm to a higher pitch, but as singers come and go, few there are who are on the whole so satisfying to hear as was Miss Rethberg yesterday afternoon.

S. M.

MONITOR. Oct. 20

[133]

Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 30, in Symphony Hall, the first of the annual concerts by the Symphony Orchestra for Young People, this time gathered from the public schools of the metropolitan district. Mr. Monteux will conduct, and the program traverses: The Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz;" an Air and Gavotte of Bach; a fragment of Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus;" Smetana's tone-picture of the river Moldau; the plucked Scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; two pieces from Ravel's "Mother Goose;" Berlioz's Rákóczy March.

Symphony Orchestra

AN established British composer, Frank Bridge, whose music long since made way to the United States, will be guest of Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra at their concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. More particularly he will conduct in his own Suite of sea-pieces—"Seascape," "Sea Foam," "Moonlight" and "Storm"—new numbers to most hearers. For further novelty, Mr. Monteux goes to the ancients of the ancients—sixteenth-century Italian composers, of names now undiscoverable. They wrote three dances; Respighi "freely arranged" them; and Mr. Toscanini and his orchestra once played them in Boston to the pleasure of all who heard. For beginning of this third program, Mr. Monteux has set Sibelius's First Symphony—music of Viking sweep and clang.

TRANS. OCT. 20.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
OCT

It's An
Wi

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA, under Pierre Monteux, carries with it a vague suggestion of Alsace-Lorraine. It is an Orchestra Irridenta. Under Dr. Muck, it was German and German-speaking. Under Mr. Monteux, it is French. After many years, it carries with it a hint of the devastating conquerer. It is not only polite but also truthful to say that under the circumstances Mr. Monteux has done very well. But a gracious follower of a tyrant never has an easy row to hoe.

BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 21 1923

Musical Arts Concerts.

The program aranged for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which opens the Musical Arts series Thursday evening, November 8th, in Elmwood Music Hall, is one calculated to arouse enthusiasm. The piece de resistance will be the Sibelius E minor symphony No. 1, Op. 39, a work of rarely exquisite beauty while the first number on the program will be Weber's overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz" written nearly a hundred years ago by the great master of orchestration. Liszt's "Tasse, Lamonto e Trionfo—Symphonic Poem No. 2, is also promised. This will be the last opportunity local music lovers will have to hear the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteaux's leadership, as the illustrious conductor will return to his native land after this tour, relinquishing the baton to Serge Koussevitsky. Proof of Monteux's genius is to be seen in the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his tireless hand has wrought in the four years past. The great orchestra of 100 musicians has become under his leadership a marvelously perfect instrument and during his term it has brought to the light of ideal performance a great wealth of orchestral music. Mme. Charles Cahier, soloist with the orchestra, has been acclaimed by Saint-Saens, Gustav Mahler and many other composers as the greatest contralto living. The folowing excerpt from the pen of one of the leading Vienese critics gives one an idea of the high regard in which continental Europe holds Mme. Cahier who was for four years the prima donna contralto of the Royal Opera of Vienna.

"Cahier brings out the old music lovers who in their anxiety to hear her will even go hungry rather than miss her concert. They are only afraid she may not come. The largest hall is selected and stage seats are filled. No where is she loved and honored more than in Vienna, nowhere could her great and incomparable art be more highly appreciated than in Vienna. She surpasses herself, if possible. The rich tones flow without visible effort from her lips. In this artist one never perceives, is never conscious of the work but only of its results. At the conclusion of the program the public went mad with enthusiasm. Everyone was loath to leave the concert hall, and after many encores, there was a stage-rush and the great Cahier was literally carried to her car."

* * *

BUFFALO
N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 21 1923

The programme arranged for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opens the Musical Arts series on Thursday evening, November 8th, in Elmwood Music hall, is one calculated to arouse enthusiasm. The piece de resistance will be the Sibelius E minor symphony No. 1, Op. 39, a work of exquisite beauty while the first number on the programme will be Weber's overture to the opera, Der Freischutz. Liszt's Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo— Symphonic Poem No. 2 is also promised. This will be the last opportunity local music lovers will have to hear the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux's leadership as that illustrious conductor will return to his native land after this tour, relinquishing the baton to Serge Koussevitsky. Proof of Monteux's genius is to be seen in the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his tireless hand has wrought in the four years past. The great orchestra of 100 musicians has become under his conductorship a marvelously fine instrument and has brought to the light of ideal performance a wealth of orchestral music. Mme. Charles Cahier, soloist with the orchestra has been acclaimed by Saint-Saens, Gustav Mahler and many other composers as the greatest contralto living.

NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 21 1923

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season—the last season under Mr. Monteux—is called by Philip Hale "the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall," and praise is given to Mr. Monteux as the creator of the orchestra of today. Mr. Monteux plans to play this season Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Scriabin's "Divine Poem," the First Symphony of Mahler and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." Of the newer music Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," works by Malipiero, Respighi, Roussel, Ravel, Aubert, Honegger and Ropartz; also Debussy's Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." German composers will probably include Schönberg, Schreker and Pfitzner; English composers, Eugene Goossens, Arnold Bax and Frank Bridge; others are the Hungarian Bela Bartok and the Spaniard, de Falla, some of this music will be included in the ten programs of the Boston Symphony concerts in New York.

BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 21 1923

The programme arranged for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opens the Musical Arts series Thursday evening, November 8th, in Elmwood Music hall, is one calculated to arouse enthusiasm. The piece de resistance will be the Sibelius E minor symphony No. 1. Op. 39 a work of rarely exquisite beauty, while the first number on the programme will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" written nearly a hundred years ago by the great master of orchestration. Liszt's "Tasse, Lamento e Trionfe—Symphonis Poem No. 2 is also promised. This will be the last opportunity local music lovers will have to hear the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux's leadership as the illustrious conductor will return to his native land after this tour, relinquishing the baton to Serge Koussevitsky. Proof of Monteux's genius is to be seen in the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his tireless hand has wrought in the four years past. Mme. Charles Cahier, soloist with the orchestra has been acclaimed by Saint-Saens, Gustave Mahler and many other composers as the greatest contralto living. Mme Cahier was four years the prima donna contralto of the Royal Opera of Vienna.

Boston Symphony Programme

At the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a composition of particular interest will be the suite, "The Sea," by Frank Bridge, the noted English composer. Mr. Bridge is making his first visit to America and has accepted Mr. Monteux's invitation to conduct his own suite. The score consists of four movements thus described: "Seacape," "Seafoam," "Moonlight," "Storm." Mr. Bridge has composed a number of notable works in small and large forms, and is known to Boston Symphony patrons from his setting of Rupert Brooke's "Blow Out, You Bugles." which was given here several seasons ago.

Mr. Monteux will open this programme with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and likewise conduct the "Ancient Dances" by composers of the 16th century, arranged for modern orchestra by Respighi, the Italian composer.

POST. OCT. 21.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 25 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An event of prime importance will be the visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert in Harmanus Bleecker hall Monday evening, Nov. 5, under the management of Ben Franklin. This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, adminisstrative wisdom and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Pierre Monteux is now the leader, this being his fifth season as such.

For the Albany concert advance orders for seats are now being accepted and filled, and should be sent to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street. The box office sale does not open until next Thursday morning.

BRIDGE'S SEA-MUSIC

A New Suite from the English Composer to Be Heard at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—Moods, Pictures and Moderation

Those who do not mind an occasional sharp dissonance so long as it is agreeably resolved; who prefer that a melody should bear some relation to a major or minor scale; who enjoy the varied hues and rich sonorities of the modern orchestra when these hues and sonorities clothe "sane" harmonies and songful themes, should find much to their liking in Frank Bridge's Suite, "The Sea," in which the composer himself will conduct at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday. Written in 1910-1911 this Suite is hardly representative of his more advanced manner; though under no circumstances is Mr. Bridge to be placed with such modernists among his countrymen as Lord Berners, Bliss or even Goossens. Rather, with Vaughan Williams, Bax and Holst he clings to the safer middle ground, availing himself of what he feels to be sound in the newer ways of music while retaining many forms and formulas of the old. In the words of a recent appraiser of his piano-pieces, Katherine Eggar in "The Music Teacher": Bridge "is not one of those whose predominant feeling is that the time is out of joint and nothing but the past was right; neither is he struggling to grasp an artificial tomorrow for fear of being out of date today."

Within the past few years, not a little of Mr. Bridge's music, both in the larger and the smaller forms has been heard in or near Boston. Once at a pair of Symphony Concerts, Mr. McCormack sang a piece for voice and orchestra, while he and other singers have acquainted us with several of Bridge's numerous songs with piano accompaniment. A Suite for String Orchestra was heard at one of the concerts of the Boston Musical Association, and the London String Quartet has played in Cambridge the excellent Quartet in E minor, which it had previously ventured to much applause at a Berkshire Festival. For final mention, besides a piano-piece or two, there is the Sonata for Violoncello and Piano which played by Miss Berry in Steinert Hall last season seemed to strike a somewhat deeper note than any of the foregoing.

In addition to these chamber-pieces Bridge has written a Trio, a String Sextet and a Piano Quintet; and among his orchestral compositions still unknown to Boston are a "Dance Rhapsody" and a tone-poem "Isabella." As to Frank Bridge the man: he was born in 1879, his principal teacher in composition was Sir Charles Stanford; he is a viola-player of note, and he is not without reputation as conductor.

In the wider use of the term the Suite to be heard here tomorrow might be styled a Symphony. The four movements are bound together by affinity of key, and in character they correspond to the conventional Allegro, Scherzo, Slow Movement and Finale. The first of them, a "Sea Scape," has for main tonality [illegible] tative [illegible] the motion, the brightness, [illegible] y of the sea—not its mystery or its tragedy. In the Scherzo, by title "Sea Foam," the composer makes clear and—if the reading eye does not err—successful, attempt to achieve that gossamer lightness of orchestral effect for which Berlioz's "Queen Mab" set the pattern. "Moonlight" is the name set upon the movement that follows, and here the composer would have his music atmospheric, poetic. The scoring, though subdued, is not without richness, and the chief theme, first sung by flute and ultimately heard from the full orchestra, is appropriately languorous. The Finale discloses Bridge as one of the many who have sought to depict in music the fury of an ocean storm. At the outset woodwind, horns and trumpets over a roll of drums give forth a boldly dissonant motive. Seething chromatic scales are heard in the strings and horns announce "with ferocity" the chief theme. The tempest waxes and wanes and waxes afresh. At length after a mighty outburst the raging elements subside. As sun breaking through clouds is heard the chief theme of the first movement, broad, reliant, propulsive. And upon a long sustained E-major chord the piece comes to resounding end.

W. S. S.

POST. OCT. 26

BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 27 1923

Boston Symphony and Cahier.

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 8, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will afford this city perhaps the last opportunity to hear one of the greatest conductors France has produced. The contract of Pierre Monteux expires after this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony, and the conductor will return to his native land at the end of the season. At the recent opening of the season in Boston, Monteux was praised highly for having brought the historical and traditionally marvelous orchestra to a beauty and perfection of ensemble, and an eloquence of performance scarcely equalled in the finest seasons of the past.

Of Monteux's rendition of "The Dance of Salome" from Strauss' music drama "Salome," which will be given by the orchestra here, the Boston Transcript said: "Mr. Monteux's version of the Dance of Salome is the version of the Straussian theatre. The music exhales langours, weaves repetitions, rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smother of sensuality in the full thick, velvet voices of horns and violincellos; when he would have his wood winds bite as with the little white teeth of Salome in the old chronicles; when the dance ends in a whirr of trills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered, with every thread of instrumental color." The Transcript critic concludes: "Fortunate are composers, since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now give them, their music lives and is charactered."

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted contralto who comes as soloist with the Boston Smyphony orchestra has achieved an extraordinary reputation on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme. Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is an American by birth who has won her way to her present position of eminence on foreign soil and in competition with the finest artists of continental Europe. Elvard Grieg, Gustav Mahler, Camille-Saint-Saens, and other famous composers have paid the highest tribute to her art.

Aside from the remarkable operatic career of Mme. Cahier, she is recognized as one of the foremost lieder singers of the day. In writing of this phase of her art one of the eminent European critics wrote: "Of the masterly way in which this artist raised Schubert's 'Klarden's Lied' (Clara's Song) and the 'Youth at the Spring,' to the level of lyric scenes without the use of gesture to aid the inner action only the auricular witness of this musical wonder, can form a clear idea."

CAMDEN,
N. J.
OCT 26 1923

Reports state that the Boston Symphony is playing better than ever. Philip Hale, Boston critic, termed the last season under Monteux, the most brilliant since Nikisch wielded the baton.

NEWS
OCT 26 1923

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season—the last season under Mr. Monteux—is called by Philip Hale "the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of the old Music Hall," and [illegible] given to Mr. Monteux as the [illegible] of today.

COMMER
Buffalo, N. Y.
OCT 27 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here November 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, known through its long history as one of the finest in the world, will make its only visit to Buffalo this season and will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall, Thursday evening, November 8. This appearance will be one of a week's tour, shortly following the opening of the season, and including concerts at Albany, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh.

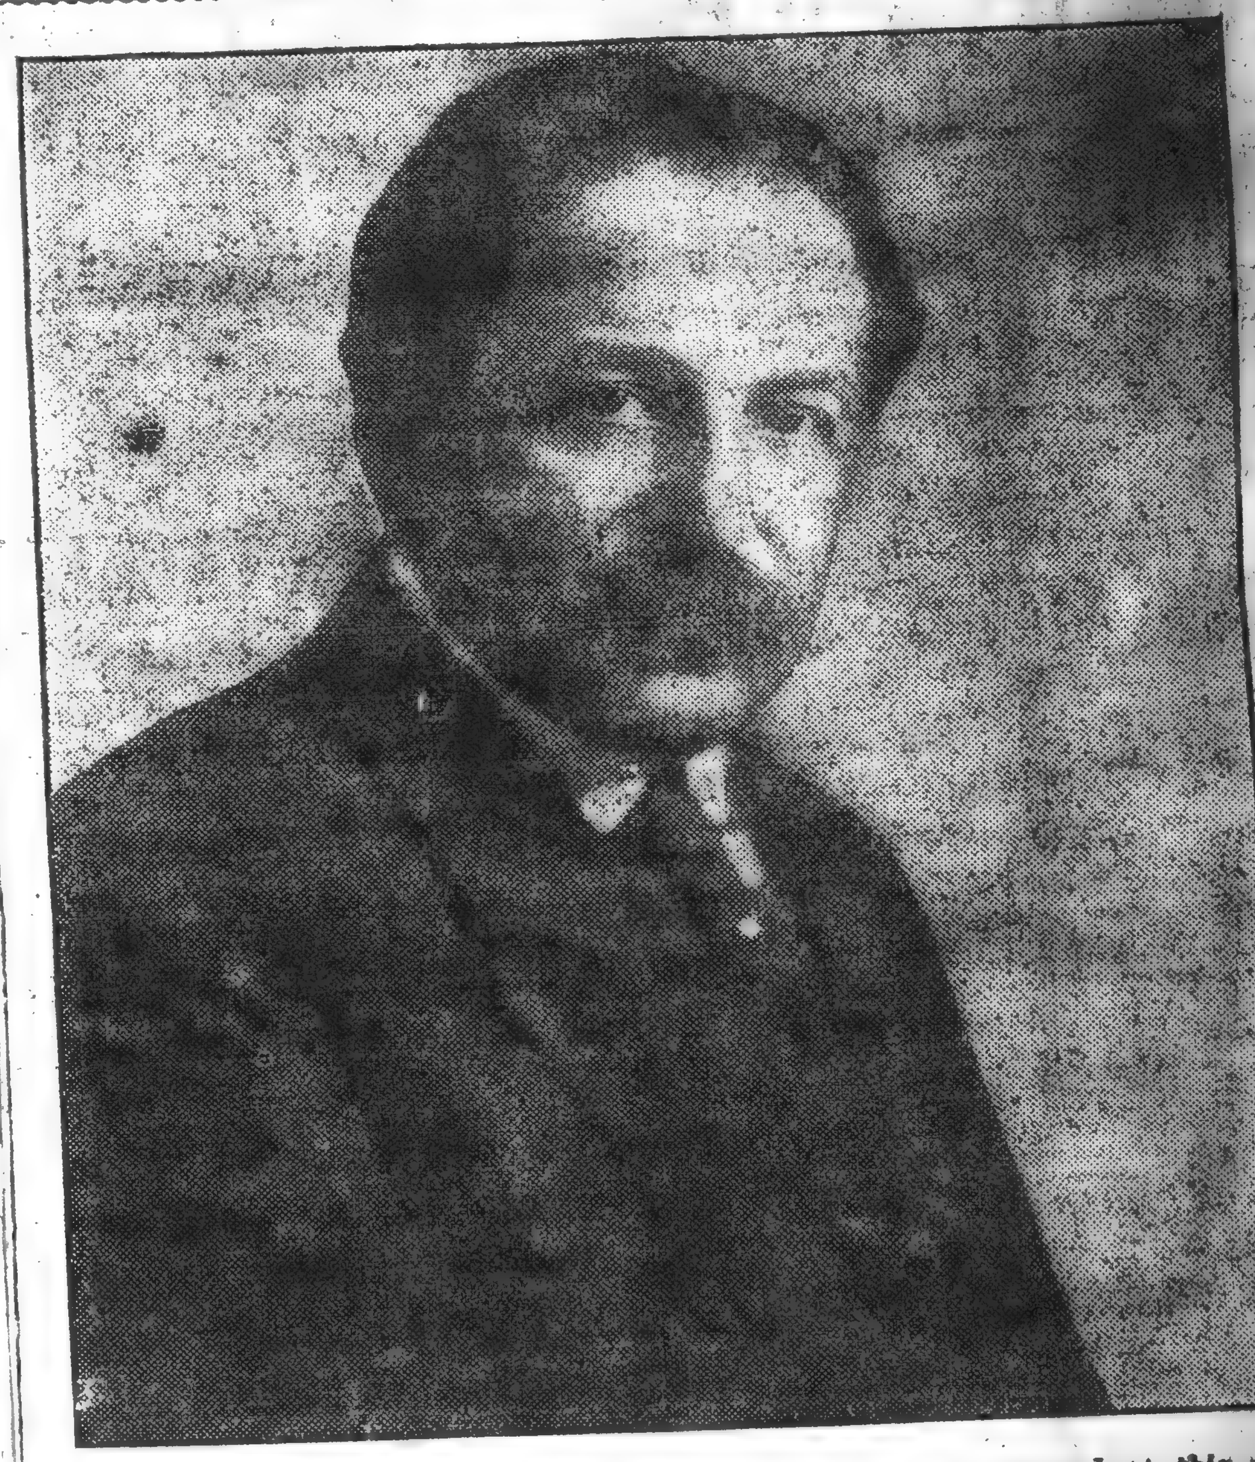
Madame Cahier, celebrated European contralto now coming to this country, will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor, is preparing a program of special interest and musical importance for this occasion.

The Boston Symphony season opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday. The fine reception which this concert was accorded, indicates that the fifth and farewell season under Monteux will be one of the most brilliant in the annals of the organization.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony—Mme. Cahier concert, will be on sale at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue, after October 31.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 27 1923

PIERRE MONTEUX WHO WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY



As all critics agree a concert by one of the great orchestras is the acme of musical enjoyment, and as the Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists is said to be the finest of all orchestras, the appearance of the Boston organization at Harmanus Bleecker hall Monday evening, Nov. 5, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, as soloist, should be one of the finest treats of the year and should attract another great and brilliant audience. This the third splendid musical event of the season will be under the management of Ben Franklin.

Special interest is manifest in this concert for it will be the last time that Albanians will have opportunity to see Pierre Monteux conduct, as this year concludes his five year contract, and at its conclusion he will return to France for engagements in that country. Another reason for special interest is the appearance of Stojowski, piano soloist of the concert, he having a host of friends in this city and vicinity. On account of the wide-spread interest in this concert and so that music-lovers may familiarize themselves with the program, it is announced at this time and will be as follows:

I.
Overture to the opera, "The Bartered Bride" ....Smetana
II.
Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92 ....Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Presto meno assai.
Allegro con brio.
Intermission.
III.
Concerto for piano in C minor, No. 4, Op. 44 ....Saint-Saens Allegro moderato; Andante.
Allegro vivace; Andante.
Finale, Allegro.
Sigismond Stojowski at the piano.
IV.
Dance of Salome, from Music Drama, "Salome" .... Strauss

Advance orders for seats for this concert are now being received by Manager Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, and orders will all be filled before the opening of the box office sale next Thursday morning at Harmanus Bleecker hall.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY DIRECTED BY BRIDGE

Composer Conducts His Own Suite, 'The Sea,' at Concert

Post Oct 27

BY OLIN DOWNES

A composer appeared as conductor also of his music yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season in Symphony Hall. He was Frank Bridge, the Englishman, whose orchestral suite, "The Sea," was then heard for the first time here. Mr. Bridge not only knows very well how to orchestrate, but also how to ~~secure~~ what he wished from the players.

SUITE WELL RECEIVED

The four movements of the suite corresponding in a very general way, perhaps, to the four movements of the symphony, were played without pause between the movements, and they were received with prolonged applause.

Yet we must confess to a poor opinion of this music. Had it not been preceded by a symphony in E minor of one Jean Sibelius, whose voice is of primeval nature and the early gods, and also by a suite of glorious music of the Italian renaissance, it might have appeared less theatrical and essentially middle-class. But, truth to tell, there seemed to us about as much resemblance between the wildness and power of the music of Sibelius and the pompous, manufactured climaxes of Mr. Bridge as there is between the grandeur of an actual tempest and the music the orchestra plays when there is a picture of a storm in a movie theatre. Yes: this would be first-rate storm music for the movie theatre. It moves right along. It whirs and flashes and roars and clicks.

Opening Holds Promise

One gets the best impression of the music from the opening of the first movement. It seems the one living idea of the work. It is as if the theme has crystallized in the composer's conciousness after long contemplation of the sea. It suggests something of the monotone of nature. But half way through the movement Mr. Bridge forsakes his simple and sincere expression, and forthwith his orchestra commences to bluster and bellow in ways which are not as the inevitable accumulation of energy inherent in the music.

This first movement is called "Seascape"; the second "Sea-Foam"; the third, "Moonlight"; the fourth, "Storm." There are passages of a sentimental inflection in "Moonlight," and sounds like the Nile scene in "Aida," but the movement, "Sea-Foam," is trivial, and what, to actualities, is the "Storm" movement but a series of strivings and contortions on the part of a composer trying to lift himself by his bootstraps?

Sibelius' Genius

The memories of the concert are the magnificent symphony of Sibelius, heard here with distrust 15 years ago, and now accepted as a work of unquestioned genius, even though it is not one of the most mature and individual of this master's scores, and the music of the old Italian masters, saturated with beauty, and the sun, and the intoxication of life, wherein we see gorgeous fetes at court and hear the lover praising to the music of his lute his lady so gracious and fair.

It is curious to think how ancient and heroic the music of Sibelius sounds, how much of the period of the sagas of the ninth and 10th centuries—the music of Sibelius, who lives today—and how much nearer the present time sounds the music of Italians, some of them unknown and forgotten, who died more than 300 years ago. Yet that is the case. It is probably because Sibelius echoes nature untamed by man, while the Italian masters are inspired by the spirit of the last great phase of civilization and culture that the world has known. Yet all those compositions are one. They are each part of the music which, as Debussy said, is one music—just one thing, found sometimes in a Strauss waltz, and at other times in a Beethoven symphony. Throughout the afternoon the orchestral performances were of the highest quality.

"THE SEA" PLAYED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Frank Bridge Conducts His Orchestral Suite

Sibelius Symphony and Old Italian Dances Heard

Globe Oct 27

The first guest conductor of the season, Frank Bridge, supplied at yesterday's Symphony concert the "human interest" usually offered by the soloist. Mr Bridge, one of the less radical of the present generation of British composers, led the orchestra in the first Boston performance of his suite, "The Sea," composed in 1910. Sibelius' First Symphony, now become a repertory piece, and Respighi's fine arrangement of three old Italian dances, which certainly should become part of the permanent repertory, were the other numbers on the program.

Mr Bridge has sought the imaginative stimulus necessary to composition where other and greater composers have found it, in the idea of the sea. The subtitles, the only detailed program of the suite, are "Seascape," "Seafoam," "Moonlight" and "Storm." That great model of the elder school of British composers, Mendelssohn, in his "Fingal's Cave" or "Hebrides" overtures, and in the less known but equally fine "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," has pictured the sea in tones as few composers have yet succeeded in doing.

Debussy's "La Mer," for instance, rather curiously lacks the romantic glamour Mendelssohn achieved. Only the opening chords of Schubert's song, "Am Meer," written by a man who never actually saw the sea, have thus far rivaled the opening of the "Hebrides" overture.

Of modern writers Rachmaninoff, whom inspiration seldom visits, has in the opening of his "Isle of the Dead," after Booklin's painting best depicted the "sea's listless chime, time's self made audible."

Mr Bridge's suite lacks rhythmic subtlety, and fails to use harmonies coloristically. That is perhaps why his music, to one listener yesterday, recalled not the sea, but the picture postcards of it one sees at Summer resorts. The audience received the piece politely, and with some signs of cordiality.

Respighi's ancient Italian dances and airs were first played here in 1921 by Toscanini's orchestra. Then, as yesterday they seemed unusually fresh and beautiful, with their colors and lines restored by a skilful hand. Such tasks as this arrangement are a severe test of a composer's taste, but Respighi does not err in any detail.

Sibelius' First Symphony deserves revival less than his fourth. It was in the year 1898, however, a work of great promise. The slow movement is banal. One could find in it neither the "purest folk melody" discovered by Mr Goepp, nor the "memory of a girl amid the simple flowers" of Mr Rosenfeld, whose rhapsodies on musical topics are more remarkable for adjectives than for accuracy. The scherzo is an effective genre piece, there are vivid and deeply felt passages in the other two movements.

The performance of all these numbers was more eloquent than precise. The absolute perfection of ensemble that once characterized this orchestra has not yet been perfectly and permanently recovered. The 100 players do not play quite as one man. Mr Monteux's interpretations, often brilliant, usually lack both classic serenity and that "strangeness" which romanticism, so literary critics tell us, added to beauty.

Next week Mitja Nikisch, son of the former conductor, will play Liszt's A major piano concerto with the orchestra as his Boston debut. An early Mozart symphony in C (K 338), Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture and a novelty by Zeckwer are the other numbers.

THIRD CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Interesting Program — Composer Conducts "The Sea"

Herald Oct 27

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony E minor, No. 1; Respighi, Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, freely arranged for orchestra first time at these concerts); Frank Bridge, Suite in four movements "The Sea" (first time here; conducted by the composer).

Some, judging the music of Sibelius or rhapsodizing over it, have laid great stress on the fact that Finland is a wild and desolate country. They therefore argue that the music of Sibelius must be bleak and grim. They are also convinced that Sibelius himself must be a stern-visaged man, something of a Berserk, savage and unapproachable, to write as he does. But travelers assure us that in Finland there are smiling landscapes, and we know from personal acquaintance that Mr. Sibelius, like Baptista Minola in the comedy, is "an affable and courteous gentleman." We doubt if climatic conditions, the constitutional qualities or the passing mood of a man necessarily affect his music. Beethoven was in doleful dumps when he wrote one of his most cheerful symphonies. We have heard music by contemporaneous Italian composers that is more barbaric, gloomier than the great majority of that by Scandinavian or Russian musicians.

In this first symphony of Sibelius there are passages that show his anxiety to prove that he had made his [illegible] studies; as in the working [illegible] movement where [illegible] measures wholly at variance with the prevailing spirit of the movement, and not affording any contrast; as in the measures in imitation that follow the giving out of the Tchaikovskian theme of the second movement. Fortuniately these passages are very few. As for the first movement is is of splendid savagery, of an elemental sweep in its wildness, nor are the succeeding movements devoid of beauty and strength. Certain passages, as in the opening of the finale, that to the lovers of the sauve are brutal and ugly, have a ruggedness, a granitic quality that excites in the breasts of others enthusiastic admiration. Thomas Hardy long ago pointed out that ideas of beauty change; that at no distant day Ultima Thule may be visited as the Vale of Tempe has drawn ecstatic pilgrims. The symphony was superbly played.

The Old Dances and Airs orchestrated by Respighi were introduced here by Mr. Toscanini. We believe they have been played at a concert of the New England Conservatory. It would be interesting to know how much of these delightful pieces is the work of Respighi; whether he changed materially melodic lines; whether the harmonization is wholly his. Whatever his work may have been, he has preserved the archaic flavor and at the same time satisfied ears accustomed to 19th century music. There is no affectation of antiquity; there is no inconsistent, disturbing modernization; simplicity reigns in the arrangement, as it undoubtedly did in the original. Refreshing music in its frank gaiety and graceful tenderness.

Mr. Bridge conducted his suite in Cleveland on the 18th of this month, the suite was composed 12 years ago and first performed in London in 1912. The movements bear these titles: Seascape, Sea-Foam, Moonlight, Storm. A long list of orchestral sea-music might be drawn up, from Mendelssohn's overture that might portray an agreeable excursion on a Nantasket boat to Debussy's impressionistic sketches; from Paul Gilson's realism to Rimsky-Korsakov's shipwreck. Mr. Bridge, who is a worthy member of the British modern school, has endeavored to be frankly pictorial. As in all program music, given the titles, the hearer easily understands and appreciates the intention. Of the four movements the first two seem to us the most poetic, but the whole work is interesting, for it is not influenced by others working in the same field—say rather, sea—and it is not strainingly pretentious. Mr. Bridge showed himself to be an experienced, authoritative conductor.

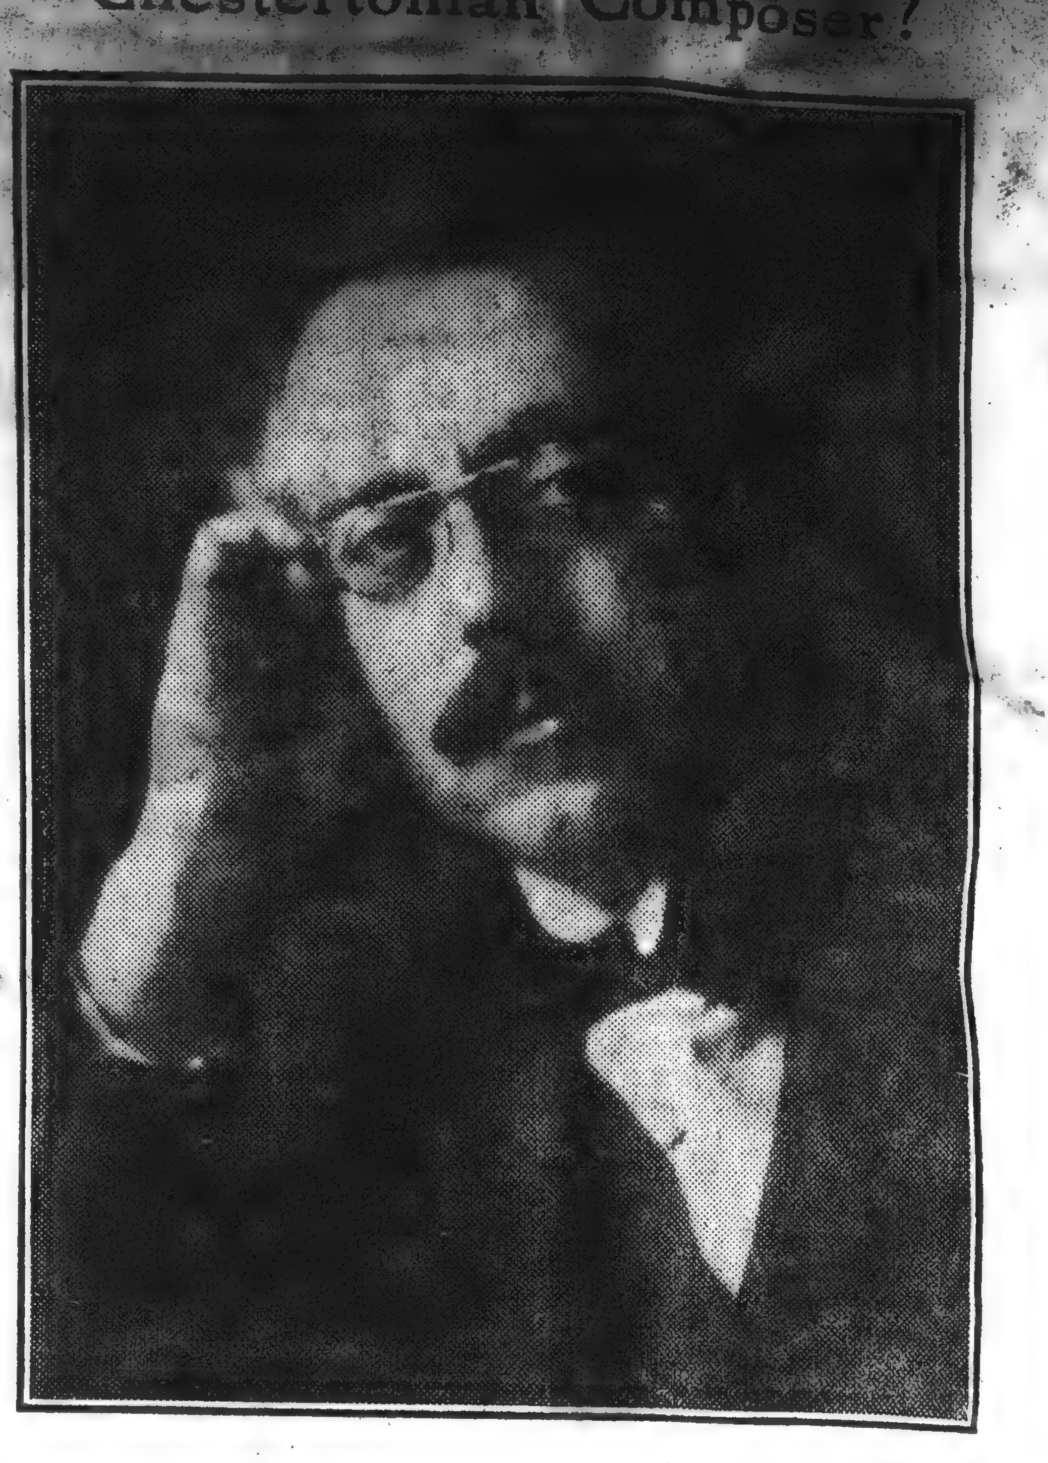
The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of the concerts next week is as follows: Mozart, Symphony C major without a minuet; Liszt, piano concerto, No. 2, A major; Zeekwer, "Jade Butterflies" (first time here); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala." Mr. Nikisch will be the pianist.

ANCIENT DANCES, NEW SEASCAPES, ALSO SIBELIUS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT WIDELY RANGING

Twentieth-Century Distillation of Sixteenth-Century Music — Bridge the Briton, Safe, Sane but Also Pictorial—Another Modern Symphony That Lasts

Chestertonian Composer?



(Photograph by Lambert)

Frank Bridge

English Guest at the Symphony Concerts of Yesterday and Today

A CURIOUS place in contemporary music is that now held by Jan Sibelius. So firmly established in the orchestral repertory are certain of his pieces—in particular the First Symphony which yesterday came to its sixth performance at a pair of Symphony Concerts—that the composer seems almost a classic. Yet spiritually, at least, was he not the first of the moderns, in the immediate application of that fugitive term? 1899 is the date set upon this First Symphony and at that time the stream of music was flowing in two widely divergent channels—one of them German Romanticism, which had reached its fullest and finest flowering in the tone-poems of Strauss and was about to enter upon a period of decadence; the other, French Impressionism which had been born five years before in the exquisite "L'Aprés-Midi d'un Faune" of Debussy. In this Symphony of Sibelius, however, and indeed in all his subsequent music, there is to be found neither the luxuriant extravagancs of the former nor the misty outlines of the latter. From the outset this Finn was, in the fashion of our own day, terse of speech, and economical of resource, sharp of outline and notably free from hysteria, hypersensitiveness and sentimentality.

True there are in this First Symphony passing recollections of Wagner and Chaikovsky, but these are extraneous rather than germane to the music as a whole. And what other young composer at the end of the nineteenth century with the scores of Wagner and Strauss before him would have planned a symphony according to the outmoded instrumental scheme of the symphonies of Brahms, adding only a third trumpet, three instruments of percussion and a harp? No third flute, no English horn, no bass-clarinet, no contra-basson appears in this modest score, yet what a wealth of new and striking color it contains. Mellow without lushness, sonorous without flamboyance, flecked with the drab grays and acid yellows courted by your contemporary orchestrator, here is a score that the emancipated youngster who would turn shuddering from the seductive pages of Strauss or Debussy might ponder with enthusiasm and study with profit. Harmonically and melodically Sibelius is here occasionally greatly in the debt of his predecessors; yet in both these issues the First Symphony is also strikingly prophetic.

It is, of course, precisely where Sibelius leans most heavily upon his forerunners that his First Symphony has begun to fade. Although the long and mounting melody rising from the second theme of the final movement is still well nigh irresistible in sweep and progress, the wary listener is now aware that here the music is essentially retrogressive and therefore less vital, less enduring than in such truly original and singularly inspired passages as the introduction to the first movement; the elemental conflicts and sinister accents heard in the course of the subsequent unconventional "development"; the eerie measures that follow so disquietingly upon the lovely song of the Andante; the wildly primitive gaiety of the Scherzo; the tragic utterances of the Finale, which transcend mere personal lamentation; the bleak and bitter conclusion—perhaps the first manifestation of an afterwards prevalent pessimism and disillusion in music.

By contrast with the eloquences of this turbid, trenchant symphony Galilei's Gagliarda for the lute, rescued from oblivion and orchestrated by Respighi, sounded at first tame and pallid. But before many bars were passed the strangely haunting fragance of this ancient music asserted itself. And when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra turned to the succeeding Villanella of unrecorded authorship an ineluctable spell was laid upon the hearer. An infinite pathos invests these measures, so simple and withal so poignant. In the gentle melancholy of this air of ageless beauty lurks all the mystery and all the sadness of things distant and long forgotten—the sadness that inhabits lonely corridors, dusty and deserted, which once had resounded to youthful footsteps and had rung with youthful laughter. In the succeeding "Passo Mezzo and Mascherada," also from an unknown hand, is sounded a gayer note, but it might not altogether banish the mood inspired by the Villanella. Had Respighi done no other service to the art of music, his resurrection and his sympathetic recreation of the latter piece should earn him gratitude.

Three times in their orchestral form (and at least once as piano-pieces) had these "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute" been played in Boston by Mr. Toscanini and his La Scala band, by the orchestra of the Conservatory and by the People's Symphony under the guidance of Mr Mason. A comparison between any one of these performances and that of yesterday need hardly be made. It is enough to say that Mr. Monteux approached these fragile relics from the sixteenth century in a loving spirit, respecting their limitations, appreciating to the full their potentialities. Naturally he was most eloquent where his opportunity was greatest—in the Villanella. Here without resort to an inappropriate emotionalism he drew from the melody the full measure of its wistful yearning; while he revealed each of the many felicities of Respighi's softly colored, delicately moulded instrumentation.

In the symphony as occasionally in the past, it was possible to feel that Northern dourness and ruggedness and Southern warmth and affability may not quite be reconciled. Here and there it seemed that Mr. Monteux was tempering a little the savagery and mollifying the starkness of Sibelius's music. But for these concessions to temperamental differences he made full amends in his abounding eloquence with the more songful portions of the piece, in his feeling for the varied hues of Sibelius's tonal pallette and in his ability to release a wealth of poetic fantasy.

With the transcriptions by Respighi Mr. Monteux's share in the concert was done, and thereupon he yielded the stick to Frank Bridge, come to conduct his Suite, "The Sea." While harboring only the kindliest, most generous sentiments towards a distinguished visitor who, by report, has made himself liked by all with whom he has come in contact here, it is not possible to praise unreservedly Mr. Bridge's music. His conducting is in different case. Well practiced in the art of orchestral direction, the Englishman from the first rehearsal Wednesday morning through the concert of yesterday, had the band "under his thumb"—not by any exercise of despotism, nor by the impress of his genial personality, but by sheer proficiency, by thorough knowledge of the ins and outs of the conductor's craft. In appearance Mr. Bridge strikingly suggests the orchestra's quondam concert-master, Anton Witek, and probably for this reason looks more the Teuton than the Britisher. Less sparing of physical effort than certain other conductors Mr. Bridge, nevertheless makes no vain show. Rather his display of energy is but the outward manifestation of an inner enthusiasm that is immediately communicated to the players before him. In this case it may not be said that the composer is but lame interpreter of his own music. Yesterday by every sign the four pieces that make "The Sea" gave forth all that was in them, and accordingly they may be unequivocally appraised.

For the programme-book Mr. Bridge has provided a few lines in explanation of the content of his music. Thus, of the first piece: "Seascape," paints the sea on a summer morning. From high cliffs is seen a great expanse of waters lying in the sunlight. Warm breezes play over the surface." Here, as the expression goes, is pure stuff for music, and in the main the composer has done well with the opportunity offered him. With simple, even conventional means, he suggests, and vividly, the spaciousness of the waters and their brightness under a summer sun. But he accomplishes this in the first few pages of his score and much that follows weakens rather than enforces the initial impression—though at the end this is recaptured. Taken as a whole the second number, "Sea Foam," is the most successful of the four. To quote again the composer's annotations: "The sea foam froths among the low-lying rocks and pools on the shore, playfully, not stormily." Wholly unpretentious, frankly pleasing, this is an orchestral Scherzo that might stand without title and that is yet not inappropriate to the one it bears.

If we are to demand only that music be agreeable, squarely melodious, richly harmonized and warmly colored there can be no quarrelling with the ensuing piece that would depict, "A Calm Sea at Night," with moonbeams "struggling to pierce through dark clouds, which eventually pass over, leaving the sea shimmering in full moonlight." There is no great distinction in this music, no marked evidence of originality, no stamp of rare imagination. Yet in its unassuming way it pleases, even charms; and if it brings the thought of what a Debussy might have made of such tonal picturing, it by no means fails to fit the scene that was in the composer's mind as he wrote.

But in the final movement, by title "Storm," Mr. Bridge's powers are too plainly inadequate to the task before them. A fluent and scholarly writer of highly agreeable chamber music, the author of many delightful songs, the creator of numerous engaging short pieces for various instruments, Mr. Bridge may hardly follow in the footsteps of Wagner, though he has assimilated some of that master's tricks of orchestral speech. Inevitably any attempt to depict in music a storm at sea suggests comparison with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a piece that in its particular domain is still unparalleled, even unapproached. And where Wagner almost causes the responsive listener to feel the sting of icy sleet, to see the scudding wrack, to hear less the tones of instruments than the hissing of waters and the shrieking of wind, to know the mingled terror and exaltation of an ocean storm, Mr. Bridge with more than a half-century of musical progress to aid him can give us only the spectacle of a hundred men working with might and main to create sound and fury that signifies nothing. We hear in his music chromatic scales in the strings, shoutings and strident clamors in the brass, crashes of cymbals and booming of bass drum. And we remain securely in our chairs with walls about us and a roof above our heads. . . . But after all, where Mr. Bridge has failed many another, more richly endowed than he, might likewise have failed. We may hardly reproach him for not being a Wagner.

W. S.

TRANS. Oct. 27

[135]

oday
rance Mr. Bridge orchestra's quon-n Witek, and probmore the Teuton sparing of physi-conductors Mr.
kes no vain show.
energy is but the
of an inner entely communicated
n. In this case it
e composer is but own music. Yes-four pieces that rth all that was gly they may be

k Mr. Bridge has explanation of the
Thus, of the first
the sea on a sum-cliffs is seen a great in the sunlight.
he surface." Here,
is pure stuff for
the composer has unity offered him.
ntional means, he spaciousness of ghiness under a complishes this in s score and much her than enforces hough at the end n as a whole the am," is the most o quote again the
"The sea foam
g rocks and pools not stormily."
rankly pleasing, herzo that might
that is yet not it bears.
ly that music be , richly harthere can be nsuing piece that a at Night," with pierce through tually pass over,
ng in full moon-
eat distinction in vidence of in-imagination. Yet it pleases, on the thought of ave made of such means fails to fit composer's mind

ovement, by title powers are too task before them, writer of highly the author of the creator of nu-pieces for various may hardly follow
ner, though he has at master's tricks nevitably any at-a storm at sea
the Overture to a piece that is still unparalleled where Wagner ive listener to feel see the scudding tones of instru-f waters and the new the mingled an ocean storm an a half-century aid him can give f a hundred men main to create a nifies nothing. We natic scales in the strident clamors in mbals and booming remain securely in bout us and a roof
. But after all,
failed many an-wed than he, might
We may hardly r
g a Wagner.
W.

Oct. 27.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 16, in Symphony Hall, the fifth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Roland Hayes for assisting singer, and Mahler's first Symphony probably upon the programme.

Saturday evening, Nov. 17, in Symphony Hall, the fifth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, Roland Hayes for assisting singer, and Mahler's first Symphony probably upon the programme.

TRANS. Oct. 27.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Next Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 30 and 31, at 4 o'clock, Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a pair of concerts for young people.

NIKISCH SOLOIST

Mitja Nikisch, talented son of Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as the soloist with this orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 2 and 3. The young genius will take the pianoforte part in Liszt's Concerto in A major.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Mozart's Symphony in C major K No. 338, Zeckwer's "Jade Butterflies," after the verses of Louis Untermver, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture.

TRAV. Oct. 27.

Bridge Conducts 'Sea' Suite With the Boston Orchestra

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Sibelius—Symphony No. 1 in E minor.
Respighi—Old Dances and Airs for the Lute.
Bridge—Suite, "The Sea."

The first symphony of Sibelius is interesting music for several reasons. First, as music pure and simple, it moves by its sincerity and directness of utterance, the beauties of its melodies and its harmonic originality. Then, again, it is interesting to observe in it those characteristics which, more fully developed and more sharply delineated, give to the later works of this composer a peculiarly arresting individuality. And to the musician it is also interesting to compare it with these later compositions, and to observe how the composer has contrived to rid himself of those earlier influences, particularly those of Tschaikowsky and Brahms, which beset him, and to allow his own personality to assert itself. To the general public this symphony will no doubt always appeal, because of its rhythmic vitality and the simplicity and clarity with which its themes are developed. The performance yesterday was brilliant, yet restrained and thoughtful. This music may easily be overemphasized and the slightest amount of overemphasis may destroy the mood of the music and cause it to become blatant and theatrical. Not once did Mr. Monteux and the orchestra err in this direction.

By far the finest playing of the afternoon, and of the season thus far, for that matter, was in Resphigi's free transcriptions of old dances and airs for the lute, three of a set of four being played. When Toscanini and the "Scala" orchestra appeared here two years ago, playing among other things these very pieces, there was much marvel at the pianissimo effects which he obtained from the string section of his orchestra. He was surely equaled, if not outdone, in this regard by Mr. Monteux yesterday in the Villanella from this suite. As an example of orchestral technic it was most striking and once again calls to mind the wonders which he has wrought with this band of players. These pieces are models of the transcriber's art. They have been translated into modern idiom so delicately that nothing of their archaic charm has been lost, yet the crudities (to modern ears) of the originals have been carefully eliminated.

Frank Bridge, one of the group of English modernists, conducted his suite, "The Sea," in person. These sketches after nature contain many agreeable pages. They are written with a skillful hand, by a composer who seems to have been mainly influenced by the objective side of his subject. These "sea pieces" inevitably invite comparison with those of Debussy. The Frenchman, by far the greater artist, suggests, where the Englishman would unduly emphasize. The day of orchestral storms is long past, so too that of moonlight on the waters. Perhaps these pieces suffer from their titles. Mr. Bridge conducted with authority, though somewhat picturesquely. It is always interesting to see a composer conduct his own works, yet they often suffer thereby, and it is quite possible that the suite would have gained much in vividness of effect had its performance been intrusted to the more experienced hand of Mr. Monteux.

S. M.

MONITOR. Oct. 27

NIKISCH MAKES BOSTON DEBUT

Young Pianist Scores Hit at Symphony Concert

By E. F. HARKINS.

Mitja Nikisch

Two special features of this week's Symphony program are the Boston debut of Mitja Nikisch, pianist, son of a former conductor of the orchestra, and the first performance here of "Jade Butterflies," a prize-winning orchestral suite by Camille Zeckwer, one of the directors of the Philadelphia Musical Academy.

Young Nikisch—tall, blond of the matinee-idol type, and very much unlike his famous father in appearance—played with orchestra the brilliant and melodious Liszt concerto in A major. He is in a fair way to become one of the celebrated poets of the piano with his sound sense of rhythm and melody and his splendid technical equipment. A most romantic young artist! The audience was delighted with his work and recalled him half a dozen times. He courteously shook hands with Mr. Monteux, whose conducting was also brilliant.

CHARMING NOVELTY

"Jade Butterflies," the Zeckwer piece, was suggested by Louis Untermeyer's like-named poem, which is sub-titled "Paraphrases from the Japanese." This extremeely piquant composition in the modern French style won the $1,000 prize offered last year by the Chicago North Shore Festive Association, the judges deciding unanimously that it was the best of the 73 works submitted. It consist of five musical cameos, all "frail as porcelain," as Zechwer has described them; impressionistic, mystic, Oriental delicacies, at times suggesting the music of Debussy, Stravinsky, Delibes.

GOOD ORCHESTRAL WORK

Few novelties introduced at Symphony concerts in recent years have made so charming an impression. The orchestra played it in virtuoso style—especially the soloists. The applause might have been warmer. Evidently the audience was somewhat fatigued after its enthusiasm over the fair-haired Leipsic pianist.

Mozart's beautiful C major symphony and Goldmark's romantically Oriental "Sakuntala" overture were also capitally performed. The concert will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR. NOV. 3-

NIKISCH SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Son of Former Leader Creates Impression as Pianist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mitja Nikisch, whose father, Arthur Nikisch, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, appeared as solo pianist with that organization yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He gave a fiery performance of the Liszt concerto in A major, a concerto not based on Hungarian folk tunes, yet as Hungarian, perhaps, and more rhapsodic than the most Hungarian of the famous composer's rhapsodies.

WARMLY APPLAUDED

The son of Arthur Nikisch, whose death was so great a loss to the musical world, is tall, auburn haired, of a strong build, and a little awkward from his height when he appears on the stage. Many concert goers present who remembered the father well, observed that the son resembled much more his mother.

There was, however, much more than a flash of the former Nikisch in the furious energy and dash of the final pages of the concerto yesterday. Elsewhere the young Nikisch was unexpectedly conservative in his interpretation—not as Hungarian, we think, as the concerto demands. He has a brilliant technic, strength, a singing tone in melodic passages—the makings of a great pianist when he is a few years older than 22. At present it is the sincerity, the force, the contagion of his youth, and the evident soundness of his preparation, which commend Mitja Nikisch to concert audiences. One does not do more at 22, and few do nearly as much. Mr. Nikisch was very warmly applauded when he entered, for the memory of his father; when he finished, for himself.

Philadelphian's Five Pieces

There were played for the first time here five pieces, "Jade Butterflies," by Camille Zwecker. Explaining his pieces to an interviewer recently, Mr. Zwecker was uncommonly and refreshingly frank about himself as a composer. He said, in effect, he had received a classic, even conventional, training as a composer; that he could not because of his period—he was born in Philadelphia in 1875—compose music of "futuristic" tendencies; that, like many another American composer, he was conscious of his indebtedness in his own work to European influences, such as Debussy and Strawinsky, and he thought it would be many years before America would develop a music of her own.

With such honesty and clearness of self-criticism to his credit, Mr. Zwecker writes these five little pieces after poems of Louis Untermeyer. There are many things to be said for these pieces. They are unpretentious in form and length. They are unpretending, frankly leaning toward the French school of harmonization, and showing not a little of that remarkable knowledge that Frenchmen have and American composers have not, of knowing how to score for wind instruments, and how to get much color from a small orchestra.

Parts Really Poetic

And finally there are moments when the music is really poetic, and not merely pretty. Among these are the second of the pieces, "Silence," which has the hot languor and peacefulness of noontide and some very good orchestral atmosphere; the opening of the third piece, "Butterfly Courtship . . . there on the river bank," and parts of the song of the English horn in the more sentimental piece, "Return." The pieces need not be taken too seriously. The composer would probably be the first to insist upon this. On the other hand, they are pieces by a composer who knows his business, and by an artist with a decorative sense.

A C major symphony by Mozart—not the great one in C, the "Jupiter," but a lesser though beautiful work—and a rather sleepy performance of Goldmark's 'Sakuntala" overture, completed this programme.

POST. NOV. 3,

NIKISCH PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Son of Former Conductor in Boston Debut

Zeckwer's "Jade Butterflies" Novelty on Program

Mitja Nikisch, son of Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. The elder generation of Bostonians still talks of Nikisch as the most brilliant conductor the Symphony ever had, so that his son was assured in advance of a friendly reception.

Mitja Nikisch is, however, a pianist who will not have to rely on his father's friends for a following. His playing of Liszt's A-major concerto, one of the most effective show pieces ever written, combined brilliance with sound and subtle musicianship. The novelty on the program was an American prize composition, "Jade Butterflies," by Camille Zeckwer of Philadelphia. The symphony was Mozart's in C major, without minuet. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture was the final number.

Nikisch was born in 1900, long after his father had left Boston. He scarcely looked his 23 years as he walked shyly out on to the stage and bowed his response to applause unusually cordial for a newcomer. His youth and ingenuous modesty made an instant favorable impression. There were no annoying "stagey" mannerisms. Here obviously was a pianist who thought more of the music than of the audience.

Since his father trained him in interpretation, Nikisch has musicianship of a matured perfection not usual at his age. He thinks his performance out not measure by measure, but in the larger units, phrases, periods, what you will, in which a composer thinks. He knows that there are such things as "inner voices," even in Liszt.

His mastery of the resources of the piano is remarkable, though more warmth of tone than he used yesterday would have been fitting in certain passages. He is no made musician, having learned by rote, but has inherited a large measure of his father's musical instincts and imagination. He was recalled five times, enthusiastically.

Zeckwer's "Jade Butterflies" is a well written, competently orchestrated piece of music, by a man capable of using the technique of more than one school of music skillfully. Mr Zeckwer has not been able to eliminate hints at this or familiar masterpiece. One caught glimpses of the Rhine maidens in his "Balance."

Mr. Monteux wisely used a small orchestra in the Mozart, though reducing the number of strings cannot make the music sound in so large a hall as it must have sounded to the composer's generation. This symphony is not a major work of Mozart, but Mozart wrote no music without individuality and grace. It is historically interesting as marking a transition in the development of the symphony as a form.

Goldmark's overture is one of the few [illegible] Wagner's technique [illegible] employed without sacrifice of [illegible] man's individuality. "Sakuntala" will be in orchestral repertories when many more pretentious works are forgotten. It may, for instance, easily outlast Richard Strauss, because it has more emotion back of it.

There are no concerts next week. Nov 16 and 17, Roland Hayes, tenor, will be the soloist, and Roussel's "Pour un Fete de Printemps" the novelty.

HERALD. NOV. 3

4TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Mozart Piece Beautifully—Interesting Program

SON OF FORMER CONDUCTOR PLAYS

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux conducted. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony No. 34, C major (without a minuet); Liszt, Piano Concerto, A major, No. 2; Zeckwer, "Jade Butterflies" (first time in Boston); Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala." Mitja Nikisch, the pianist, played in Boston for the first time.

Seldom, if ever, has the music of Mozart been so beautifully played in Symphony hall. We do not remember hearing in this country or in foreign countries a performance that was so truly Mozartian. The symphony is not reckoned among his great works, but is there any one more charming in its innocent gaiety, its tender grace, in the apparent spontaneity when it is most artfully contrived? It was probably of this work that Mozart wrote when he said that 40 violins played, 10 violas, 10 double-basses, six bassoons and so on; an annoying statement for those who insist that the symphonies of Mozart should be played by a comparatively small orchestra.

Mr. Zeckwer's "Jade Butterflies" was awarded a prize offered by the Chicago North Shore Festival Association last year. Seventy-three compositions were entered in competition. Music that is thus crowned is as a rule, open to suspicion; it has its little day of triumph and is then forgotten. Even on the day of triumph, there may be wonder as to the precise inferiority of the pieces that were often honored. The successful competitor often endeavors to impress the judges by his technical knowledge; to show them that he has been a diligent student and is familiar with the iron-clad rules; or he is afraid to be original, lest his audacity set the judges a-frowning.

But Mr. Zeckwer was neither timorous nor recklessly daring. Not that he steered a middle course for safety. Having read verses by Louis Untermeyer—"Paraphrases from the Japanese"—he was moved to give his musteal impressions of them. Sound schooling, however, kept him from being vague, and delighting solely in agreeable sounds. He had musical ideas that were also poetic; furthermore he had a sense of color, of tints and demi-tints, and in his use of uncommon instrumentation he was sincere, not a man solely seeking to astonish the hearer. The Suite is in five movements. We think the fourth, "Return," and the fifth "Motion" are too much alike in mood to endure successfully the juxtaposition, delightful as each one is. Perhaps Mr. Zeckwer wished the mood to continue, to lull the hearer to the end, to dismiss him as one soothed by pleasant dreams, whereas another might have forgotten Mr. Untermeyer and constructed an "imposing apotheosis" calling in the aid of cymbals and bass drum, sure applause—traps for the unthinking.

The good old overture to "Sakuntala" now seems in spots a little too old. One wishes that much of the "working-out" measures might be dropped; yet the sensuousness of the chief theme which is finally turned into the expression of tumultuous joy leads one to forget the purely academic measures and the rather conventional hunting or war fanfares.

Mr. Nikisch was warmly greeted, for the sake of his father, whose leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra is still memorable, also for his own sake. The report of his ability as a pianist had long preceded his arrival. He gave an uncommonly brilliant and mature performance of the concerto for a young man—he is in his 24th year. Not that his technical proficiency is so remarkable; young pianists and violinists now possess a mechanism that would have seemed astonishing 25 years ago; but very few pianists of Mr. Nikisch's age show the musical intelligence, the poise, the poetic feeling in lyrical measure that characterized yesterday his interpretation. The orchestra gave him eloquent support.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program of the concerts on Nov. 16, 17 is as follows: Dvorak's Symphony No. 2, D minor; Roussel's "For a Spring Festival" (first time here), and Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain." Roland Hayes of Boston, returning from a tour in Europe, will sing Franck's "Procession," an aria fram Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ" and two negro "Spirituals."

HERALD NOV. 3.

Bearer of Famous Name, at Symphony Concert

MITJA NIKISCH
Pianist, Son of Former Symphony Conductor

HERALD. NOV. 3.

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON TO OPEN NOV. 20

Series of Five Entertainments to be Given at Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony concert season will open at Infantry Hall on Nov. 20 and will include five concerts, to be given Tuesday evenings, Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29.

The soloists to appear at each are Madame Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage; Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

This coming season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent.

It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonnez concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 3 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO BE HERE ON THURSDAY

A feature of the program to be given by the Boston symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 8, under management of Bessie Bellanca, will be the First symphony in E minor of the noted Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius. This is probably the most popular score of this master, and its popularity is easily understood in view of the great melodic beauty, the haunting and melancholy melodies which seem most characteristic of the desolate land of its composer.

Another number of special interest will be Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils, drawn from the music drama of the same name by Richard Strauss. This is considered one of this master's most brilliant achievements in suggestion and striking characterization.

The soloist of the evening will be the celebrated European contralto Madame Cahler. She will sing with the Orchestra Tschaikovsky's aria, "Adieu, foret," from the Opera "Jeanne d'Arc," and Berlioz' Revery "La Captive."

Pierre Monteux will open the program with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" and close it with Liszt's brilliant and impressive symphonic poem "Tasso: Lomento e Trionfo."

MUSICOGRAMS

Russian dressing will add piquancy to the orchestral fare that will be offered to Bostonians in 1924 by the revered Boston Symphony. Beginning with that season, the Hub's famous orchestra will have for its conductor the Russian cosmopolite, Serge Koussevitzky, whose latest fame has been won in Paris. Boston critics see the engagement as a definite national cycle in the leadership of the orchestra. That is to say, another national cycle. Before the war all the orchestra's conductors with one exception were German. After the wartime disrupting of the Symphony's ranks, its trustees chose a new broom to sweep away its troubles—that broom being labelled "Made in France" and wielded, first, by Henri Rabaud and of recent years by Pierre Monteux. One of the Boston critics, H. T. Parker, of the "Transcript," declares that there has been a certain disposition in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and a permanent dependency of Parisian conductors. With the engagement of Koussevitzky that illusion vanishes. "To Paris, as well as to Berlin," says Mr. Parker, "it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice." Our big symphony orchestras are evidently not yet ready to show that independence of Europe by engaging an American as conductor. At all events, the appointment is generally regarded by friends of the Boston band as a step forward.

NAT. BUR. ADVCMNT
MUSIC.

From
TIMES UNION NOV 1 1923
Albany, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The seat sale opened this morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker Hall for the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, Monday night, and with such a demand that it leaves no doubt of the big audience that will attend the event.

The symphony for this occasion will be the "Seventh in A Major," by Beethoven, one of the most beautiful and imposing of that master's famous nine symphonies. The evening will open with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," a brilliant tour de force for the string orchestra which stands as one of the finest works from a Czeck composer. The closing number will be the "Dance of the Seven Veils," from the music drama "Salome," which Richard Strauss based on the play of Oscar Wilde—a descriptive excerpt which exacts the utmost resources of the largest symphony orchestra. Mr. Stojowski will be heard with the orchestra in Saint-Saens, formidably difficult, but engagingly melodious "Concerto in C Minor, No. 4."

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 -1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony Concert.

This morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall, the seat sale opened with such an energetic demand for the concert of the Boston Symphony Monday night that it leaves no doubt of the large and brilliant audience that will attend the event.

A program of imposing brilliance and engaging beauty will make notable this event, and an additional attraction upon the program will be the appearance, as soloist, of Sigismund Stojowski, the celebrated pianist.

The symphony for this occasion will be the "Seventh in A major," by Beethoven, one of the most beautiful and imposing of that master's famous nine symphonies. The evening will open with Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," a brilliant tour de force for the string orchestra which stands as one of the finest works from a Czeck composer. The closing number will be the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from the music drama "Salome," which Richard Strauss based on the play of Oscar Wilde — a descriptive excerpt which exacts the utmost resources of the largest symphony orchestra. Mr. Stojowski will be heard with the orchestra in Saint-Saens's formidably difficult, but engagingly melodious "Concerto in C minor, No. 4."

[137]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 3 - 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The coming season of Boston symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will include five concerts on the following Friday evenings: Nov. 30, Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4. The soloists to appear at each of these are Madame Sigrid Onegin and Madame Elizabeth Rethberg, leading contralto and soprano respectively at the Metropolitan Opera House, both of which singers have made a generally fine impression in concerts and appearances with orchestra. The pianist will be Moriz Rosenthal, the European celebrity, who is returning to America after 17 years absence. The other soloists will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, and Jacques Thibaud, the noted French violinist. This coming season, which will be the 42d of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, who will at its conclusion complete his five year period as leader. He is then expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

From
NEWS, NOV 2 1923
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON SOLOISTS SELECTED

Season Will Begin in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, November 20

A list of solists of the first distinction are now announced to appear at the five Boston Symphony concerts for the Providence season to be given in Infantry Hall on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29.

This will be the last season under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor, who, at the expiration of his fifth year term, intends to return to France. Mr. Monteux has music of especial interest which he plans to include upon the Providence programs. The orchestra retains the splendid personnel of last season with the addition of several brass players.

The soloists which include a contralto, baritone, two piainsts and a 'cellist, should afford much interest and variety as well as musical importance to these concerts.

The contralto will be Sigrid Onegin, the famous Swedish singer who first came to America last autumn to join the Metropolitan Opera Company. She left behind her a supreme European reputation which was amply confirmed in her New York debut in concert and opera. She easily and immediately took the first place among the contraltos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone, will also be a soloist. This singer has been on the concert stage for about two years and has in this time established himself as unexcelled and scarcely rivalled in sheer beauty of voice.

The pianists will be Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who are among the most conspicuous of the younger generation. Miss Robinson has been before the public only for a short while but has in this time [illegible] for herself [illegible] York, Chi-

Madame Leginska has been before the public for several years, touring America several times. She extended her public last season by a tour of Europe which won her the highest praise from each capital. Her command of her instrument combines a surprising strength with every softer dynamic gradation of an artist's poetic consept.

The 'cellist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of that section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By his appearance as soloist with this orchestra and by his recitals he has firmly established himself in the favor of our public as one of the very finest living masters of his instrument.

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 3 1923

Director and Soloist Coming With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux.

Sigrid Onegin.

Programs of imposing brilliance and engaging beauty will make notable the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque next Friday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. An additional atraction will be the appearance as soloist of Sigrid Onegin, the celebrated singer. The Friday program will consist of the "Second Symphony," by Rachmaninoff (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Hayden" and the "Overture to Wagner's Rienzi." Madame Onegin is to sing the aria from this same opera and the aria from Bruch's "Achilles." At the Saturday matinee Pierre Monteux will conduct the great "Seventh Symphony," by Beethoven (in A major). Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," will also be performed. The program will open with a series of dances and airs of the late sixteenth century in Italy, which the modern Italian composer, Respighi, has arranged in the freer instrumentation of the twentieth century. Madame Onegin will sing a concert aria of Gluck's and Schubert's songs, "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig." The program will close with perhaps the most striking piece of the afternoon, "The Dance of the Seven Veils," from Richard Strauss' music drama, "Salome," based on the play of Oscar Wilde. This descriptive excerpt requires the fullest resources of the modern symphony orchestra.

PITTSBURGH,
SUN
NOV 3 1923

To Analyze Symphony Programs.

The first in the series of analytical talks on the symphony programs will be given next Thursday evening at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. The speaker will Charles N. Boyd and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed. Admission is free and all interested patrons of the [illegible] are invited to attend.

From Co
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Comes to Buffalo Nov. 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra, known through its history as one of the finest in the world, will make its only visit to Buffalo this season and will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall, Thursday evening, November 8. This appearance will be one of a week's tour, shortly after the opening of the season. The tour will include concerts at Albany, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh.

Madame Cahier, celebrated European contralto coming to this country, will be soloist with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, illustrious conductor, is preparing a program of special interest and musical importance for this occasion.

The Boston Symphony season opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday, October 12. The splendid reception which the concert had augurs that the fifth and farewell season under Mr. Monteux will be one of the most brilliant in the annals of the orchestra.

The program for the Buffalo concert follows:

Overture in the Opera Der Freischultz
Weber
Sibelius
Symphony in E. minor, No. 1, Op. 39
I Andante ma non troppe; Allegro energico
II Andante ma non troppe lento
III Allegro
IV Finale (Quasi una Fantasia)
Andante: Allegro molto.
(Intermission of ten minutes after the symphony)
Tschaikovsky
Air Aideu, foret from the Opera Jeanne d' Arc
Strauss
Dance of Salome from the Music Drama Salome
Berlioz
La Captive, Revery, O . 12 (after Hugo)
Liszt
Tasso, Lamento e Trion e, Symphonic Poem No. 2.
Soloist
MADAME CAHIER

Tickets for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mme. Cahier may be obtained at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue, and at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Pleasuring the Youngsters

As valuable innovation at the first of the Concerts for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette spoke briefly, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, in explanation of the pieces to be played, and on the proper attitude in listening to music. Several days in advance of the concert Mr. Burk's more detailed notes had been distributed among the children who were to make up the audience, so that Mr. Surette's comments were designed to be suggestive rather than fully informative. Despite the limited time at his disposal, he contrived to be both explanatory and stimulating. . . . But was it altogether wise of Mr. Surette to tell the assembled youngsters that Bach was the greatest of all composers? Why thus plant in youthful minds the seed of æsthetic snobbishness? There have been at least a half a dozen "greatest composers"—and there will no doubt be more.

Before Mr. Surette had been invited as prologue, Mr. Monteux had made his programme, with result that the concert lasted beyond the sixty minutes judiciously set for these occasions. Yet had the conductor decided to eliminate one of his chosen numbers, he would have been hard put to find that which might best be spared. To strike out the Overture to "Der Freischütz" would have deprived the concert of preliminary flourish and of music romantic and colorful; while surely Bach's Air from the Suite in D major, and his paired Gavottes deserved place as examples of classic beauty and restraint. The Adagio (Ballet No. 5) from Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus" is scarcely remarkable as music, but in it Mr. Bedetti, Mr. Laurent, Mr. Sand, Mr. Laus and Mr. Holy might display to advantage their prowess as solo performers upon the violoncello, the flute, the clarinet, the bassoon and the harp, respectively. Again bringing diversity, Smetana's "The Moldau" stressed the pictorial element; while the two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" embodied the delicately fanciful and imaginative. Had the Scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony been passed by these youngsters could not have heard—and seen—a bow-less string-section, in appearance like a dismasted ship, plucking its way now playfully, now ominously, through an entire piece. Finally to have banned the "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz would have cost the concert brilliant, sonorous and exciting end and deprived the children of the piece that provoked the warmest applause.

Seemingly it is by wind instruments and percussion that youthful attention is most easily stirred. With the first notes of the horn quartet in Weber's Overture came a lifting of heads and a craning of necks, and a like show of interest greeted Mr. Piller's contra-bassoon in Ravel's "Beauty and the Beast," the tam-tam and other oriental furnishings of his "Laideronette," and the sharp cry from four trumpets with which Berlioz begins his ever-exhilarating March. Strings are familiar experience, even though not in such numbers. But tam-tams, French horns and contra-bassoons—these are the "real show." W. S. S.

TRANS. OCT. 31.

KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

Saturday night, "Richelieu."

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An event of musical importance is the coming concert of the Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists at Harmanus Bleecker hall next Monday night, under the management of Ben Franklin. Advance orders for seats may be sent to him at 18 Chestnut street, the box office sale not opening until Thursday morning. Pierre Monteux will conduct the concert and the soloist will be Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, personally known to many Albanians. This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than forty years of endeavor.

PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
OCT 28 1923

Boston Symphony Coming To Mosque Nov. 9 and 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 10. Madame Sigrid Onegin, controlto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as a soloist at each of the two concerts.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 29 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony.

Perhaps the most important number on the program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, when this internationally celebrated organization plays in Harmanus Bleecker hall Monday evening, Nov. 5, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major. This score some consider the greatest of the master's glorious nine symphonies.

The soloist of the evening will be Sigismund Stojowski, the celebrated piano virtuoso and composer. This will be the first time that Stojowski has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, although his compositions are not strange to this organization, for his symphony was performed recently at the regular Boston concerts, and several years ago Paderewski appeared with this orchestra in Stojowski's Concerto. The concerto of the coming concert, however, will be the formidably difficult yet melodious and charming concerto of Saint-Saens No. 4 in C minor.

Advance orders for seats for this concert must be sent to Ben Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, at once, if they are to be filled before the opening of the box office sale at the hall Thursday morning.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony.

There is no opportunity for fault finders when the Boston Symphony visits a city on tour, for this orchestra takes its full complement of artists on tour, and in Albany there will be exactly 104 men on the stage, the largest orchestral body that ever appeared here. Pierre Monteux, celebrated conductor, will lead the orchestra, and the famous composer-pianist, Sigismond Stojowski, will be the soloist of the occasion. The concert will take place at Harmanus Bleecker hall next Monday evening under the management of Ben Franklin. The seat sale at the box office will open on Thursday morning. Those desiring to secure seats in advance of the box office sale should communicate with Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street. The concert in every way will be one of the most important and enjoyable musical events of the season, and will long be remembered by the immense audience that is anticipated for attendance.

MUSICOGRAMS

Russian dressing will add piquancy to the orchestral fare that will be offered to Bostonians in 1924 by the revered Boston Symphony. Beginning with that season, the Hub's famous orchestra will have for its conductor the Russian cosmopolite, Serge Koussevitzky, whose latest fame has been won in Paris. Boston critics see the engagement as a definite national cycle in the leadership of the orchestra. That is to say, another national cycle. Before the war all the orchestra's conductors with one exception were German. After the wartime disrupting of the Symphony's ranks, its trustees chose a new broom to sweep away its troubles—that broom being labelled "Made in France" and wielded, first, by Henri Rabaud and of recent years by Pierre Monteux. One of the Boston critics, H. T. Parker, of the "Transcript," declares that there has been a certain disposition in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and a permanent dependency of Parisian conductors. With the engagement of Koussevitzky that illusion vanishes. "To Paris, as well as to Berlin," says Mr. Parker, "it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice." Our big symphony orchestras are evidently not yet ready to show that independence of Europe by engaging an American as conductor. At all events, the appointment is generally regarded by friends of the Boston band as a step forward.

NAT. BUZ. ADVCMT
MUSIC.

From
TIMES UNION NOV 1 1923
Albany, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The seat sale opened this morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker Hall for the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, Monday night, and with such a demand that it leaves no doubt of the big audience that will attend the event.

The symphony for this occasion will be the "Seventh in A Major," by Beethoven, one of the most beautiful and imposing of that master's famous nine symphonies. The evening will open with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," a brilliant tour de force for the string orchestra which stands as one of the finest works from a Czeck composer. The closing number will be the "Dance of the Seven Veils," from the music drama "Salome," which Richard Strauss based on the play of Oscar Wilde—a descriptive excerpt which exacts the utmost resources of the largest symphony orchestra. Mr. Stojowski will be heard with the orchestra in Saint-Saens, formidably difficult, but engagingly melodious "Concerto in C Minor, No. 4."

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony Concert.

This morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall, the seat sale opened with such an energetic demand for the concert of the Boston Symphony Monday night that it leaves no doubt of the large and brilliant audience that will attend the event.

A program of imposing brilliance and engaging beauty will make notable this event, and an additional attraction upon the program will be the appearance, as soloist, of Sigismund Stojowski, the celebrated pianist.

The symphony for this occasion will be the "Seventh in A major," by Beethoven, one of the most beautiful and imposing of that master's famous nine symphonies. The evening will open with Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," a brilliant tour de force for the string orchestra which stands as one of the finest works from a Czeck composer. The closing number will be the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from the music drama "Salome," which Richard Strauss based on the play of Oscar Wilde — a descriptive excerpt which exacts the utmost resources of the largest symphony orchestra. Mr. Stojowski will be heard with the orchestra in Saint-Saens's formidably difficult, but engagingly melodious "Concerto in C minor, No. 4."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 3 - 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The coming season of Boston symphony concerts in the Academy of Music will include five concerts on the following Friday evenings: Nov. 30, Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4. The soloists to appear at each of these are Madame Sigrid Onegin and Madame Elizabeth Rethberg, leading contralto and soprano respectively at the Metropolitan Opera House, both of which singers have made a generally fine impression in concerts and appearances with orchestra. The pianist will be Moriz Rosenthal, the European celebrity, who is returning to America after 17 years absence. The other soloists will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, and Jacques Thibaud, the noted French violinist. This coming season, which will be the 42d of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, who will at its conclusion complete his five year period as leader. He is then expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

FROM
NEWS, NOV 2 1923
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON SOLOISTS SELECTED

Season Will Begin in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening, November 20

A list of solists of the first distinction are now announced to appear at the five Boston Symphony concerts for the Providence season to be given in Infantry Hall on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29.

This will be the last season under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor, who, at the expiration of his fifth year term, intends to return to France. Mr. Monteux has music of especial interest which he plans to include upon the Providence programs. The orchestra retains the splendid personnel of last season with the addition of several brass players.

The soloists which include a contralto, baritone, two plainsts and a 'cellist, should afford much interest and variety as well as musical importance to these concerts.

The contralto will be Sigrid Onegin, the famous Swedish singer who first came to America last autumn to join the Metropolitan Opera Company. She left behind her a supreme European reputation which was amply confirmed in her New York debut in concert and opera. She easily and immediately took the first place among the contraltos of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone, will also be a soloist. This singer has been on the concert stage for about two years and has in this time established himself as unexcelled and scarcely rivalled in sheer beauty of voice.

The pianists will be Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who are among the most conspicuous of the younger generation. Miss Robinson has been before the public only for a short while but has in this time made an enviable name for herself in New York, Chi-

Madame Leginska has been before the public for several years, touring America several times. She extended her public last season by a tour of Europe which won her the highest praise from each capital. Her command of her instrument combines a surprising strength with every softer dynamic gradation of an artist's poetic consept.

The 'cellist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of that section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By his appearance as soloist with this orchestra and by his recitals he has firmly established himself in the favor of our public as one of the very finest living masters of his instrument.

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 3 1923

Director and Soloist Coming With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux.

Sigrid Onegin.

Programs of imposing brilliance and engaging beauty will make notable the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Syria Mosque next Friday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. An additional atraction will be the appearance as soloist of Sigrid Onegin, the celebrated singer. The Friday program will consist of the "Second Symphony," by Rachmaninoff (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Hayden" and the "Overture to Wagner's Rienzi." Madame Onegin is to sing the aria from this same opera and the aria from Bruch's "Achilles." At the Saturday matinee Pierre Monteux will conduct the great "Seventh Symphony," by Beethoven (in A major). Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," will also be performed. The program will open with a series of dances and airs of the late sixteenth century in Italy, which the modern Italian composer, Respighi, has arranged in the freer instrumentation of the twentieth century. Madame Onegin will sing a concert aria of Gluck's and Schubert's songs, "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig." The program will close with perhaps the most striking piece of the afternoon, "The Dance of the Seven Veils," from Richard Strauss' music drama, "Salome," based on the play of Oscar Wilde. This descriptive excerpt requires the fullest resources of the modern symphony orchestra.

PITTSBURGH,
SUN
NOV 3 1923

To Analyze Symphony Programs.

The first in the series of analytical talks on the symphony programs will be given next Thursday evening at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute. The speaker will Charles N. Boyd and piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. The programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque next Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be analyzed. Admission is free and all interested patrons of the concert are invited to attend.

From COMMERCIAL
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Comes to Buffalo Nov. 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra, known through its history as one of the finest in the world, will make its only visit to Buffalo this season and will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall, Thursday evening, November 8. This appearance will be one of a week's tour, shortly after the opening of the season. The tour will include concerts at Albany, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh.

Madame Cahier, celebrated European contralto coming to this country, will be soloist with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux, illustrious conductor, is preparing a program of special interest and musical importance for this occasion.

The Boston Symphony season opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday, October 12. The splendid reception which the concert had augurs that the fifth and farewell season under Mr. Monteux will be one of the most brilliant in the annals of the orchestra.

The program for the Buffalo concert follows:

Overture in the Opera Der Freischultz
Weber
Sibelius
Symphony in E. minor, No. 1, Op. 39
I Andante ma non troppe; Allegro energico
II Andante ma non troppe lento
III Allegro
IV Finale (Quasi una Fantasia)
Andante: Allegro molto.
(Intermission of ten minutes after the symphony)
Tschaikovsky
Air Aideu, foret from the Opera Jeanne d' Arc
Strauss
Dance of Salome from the Music Drama Salome
Berlioz
La Captive, Rovery, O . 12 (after Hugo)
Liszt
Tasso, Lamento e Trionfe, Symphonic Poem No. 2.
Soloist
MADAME CAHIER

Tickets for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Cahier may be obtained at the Colonial Flower shop, 220 Delaware avenue, and at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Pleasuring the Youngsters

As valuable innovation at the first of the Concerts for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette spoke briefly, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, in explanation of the pieces to be played, and on the proper attitude in listening to music. Several days in advance of the concert Mr. Burk's more detailed notes had been distributed among the children who were to make up the audience, so that Mr. Surette's comments were designed to be suggestive rather than fully informative. Despite the limited time at his disposal, he contrived to be both explanatory and stimulating. . . . But was it altogether wise of Mr. Surette to tell the assembled youngsters that Bach was the greatest of all composers? Why thus plant in youthful minds the seed of æsthetic snobbishness? There have been at least a half a dozen "greatest composers"—and there will no doubt be more.

Before Mr. Surette had been invited as prologue, Mr. Monteux had made his programme, with result that the concert lasted beyond the sixty minutes judiciously set for these occasions. Yet had the conductor decided to eliminate one of his chosen numbers, he would have been hard put to find that which might best be spared. To strike out the Overture to "Der Freischütz" would have deprived the concert of preliminary flourish and of music romantic and colorful; while surely Bach's Air, from the Suite in D major, and his paired Gavottes deserved place as examples of classic beauty and restraint. The Adagio (Ballet No. 5) from Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus" is scarcely remarkable as music, but in it Mr. Bedetti, Mr. Laurent, Mr. Sand, Mr. Laus and Mr. Holy might display to advantage their prowess as solo performers upon the violoncello, the flute, the clarinet, the bassoon and the harp, respectively. Again bringing diversity, Smetana's "The Moldau" stressed the pictorial element; while the two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" embodied the delicately fanciful and imaginative. Had the Scherzo from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony been passed by these youngsters could not have heard—and seen—a bow-less string-section, in appearance like a dismasted ship, plucking its way now playfully, now ominously, through an entire piece. Finally to have banned the "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz would have cost the concert brilliant, sonorous and exciting end and deprived the children of the piece that provoked the warmest applause.

Seemingly it is by wind instruments and percussion that youthful attention is most easily stirred. With the first notes of the horn quartet in Weber's Overture came a lifting of heads and a craning of necks, and a like show of interest greeted Mr. Piller's contra-bassoon in Ravel's "Beauty and the Beast," the tam-tam and other oriental furnishings of his "Laideronette," and the sharp cry from four trumpets with which Berlioz begins his ever-exhilarating March. Strings are familiar experience, even though not in such numbers. But tam-tams, French horns and contra-bassoons—these are the "real show." W. S. S.

TRANS. OCT. 31.

KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

Saturday night, "Richelieu."

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An event of musical importance is the coming concert of the Boston Symphony of 104 instrumentalists at Harmanus Bleecker hall next Monday night, under the management of Ben Franklin. Advance orders for seats may be sent to him at 18 Chestnut street, the box office sale not opening until Thursday morning. Pierre Monteux will conduct the concert and the soloist will be Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, personally known to many Albanians. This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than forty years of endeavor.

PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
T 2 1923

Boston Symphony Coming To Mosque Nov. 9 and 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 10. Madame Sigrid Onegin, controlto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as a soloist at each of the two concerts.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 29 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony.

Perhaps the most important number on the program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, when this internationally celebrated organization plays in Harmanus Bleecker hall Monday evening, Nov. 5, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major. This score some consider the greatest of the master's glorious nine symphonies.

The soloist of the evening will be Sigismund Stojowski, the celebrated piano virtuoso and composer. This will be the first time that Stojowski has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, although his compositions are not strange to this organization, for his symphony was performed recently at the regular Boston concerts, and several years ago Paderewski appeared with this orchestra in Stojowski's Concerto. The concerto of the coming concert, however, will be the formidably difficult yet melodious and charming concerto of Saint-Saens No. 4 in C minor.

Advance orders for seats for this concert must be sent to Ben Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, at once, if they are to be filled before the opening of the box office sale at the hall Thursday morning.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony.

There is no opportunity for fault finders when the Boston Symphony visits a city on tour, for this orchestra takes its full complement of artists on tour, and in Albany there will be exactly 104 men on the stage, the largest orchestral body that ever appeared here. Pierre Monteux, celebrated conductor, will lead the orchestra, and the famous composer-pianist, Sigismond Stojowski, will be the soloist of the occasion. The concert will take place at Harmanus Bleecker hall next Monday evening under the management of Ben Franklin. The seat sale at the box office will open on Thursday morning. Those desiring to secure seats in advance of the box office sale should communicate with Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street. The concert in every way will be one of the most imprtant and enjoyable musical events of the season, and will long be remembered by the immense audience that is anticipated for attendance.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRENTON,
N. J.
TIMES
OCT 1923

Curren

Russian dressing will add piquancy to the orchestral fare that will be offered to the Bostonians in 1924 by the revered Boston Symphony. Beginning with that seson, the Hub's famous orchestra will have for its conductor the Russian cosmopolite, Serge Koussevitzky, whose latest fame has been won in Paris. Boston critics see the engagement as a definite national cycle in the leadership of the orchestra. That is to say, another national cycle.

Before the war all the orchestra's coductor's with one exception were German. After the wartime disrupting of the Symphony's ranks, its trustees chose a new broom to sweep away its trouble—that broom being labeled "Made in France" and wielded, first, by Henri Rabaud and of recent years by Pierre Monteux. One of the Boston critics, H. T. Parker, of the "Transcript," declares that there has been a certain disposition in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and a permanent dependency of Parisian conductors. With the engagement of Koussevitzky that illusion vanishes. "To Paris as well as to Berlin," says Mr. Parker, "it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice." Our big symphony orchestras are evidently not yet ready to show that independence of Europe by engaging an American as conductor. At all events, the appointment is generally regarded by friends of the Boston band as a step forward.

19

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 31 1923
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

STOJOWSKI COMING MONDAY

There is special interest among Albanians in regard to the concert of the Boston symphony, next Monday night at Harmanus Bleecker hall, on account of the fact that the soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, who is personally and artistically known to a large number of our musical fraternity. Stojowski is one of the most famous musicians of the United States. As a composer he ranks as high as he does as a pianist, and he is known where music is appreciated. As an evidence of his ability as a composer it need only be said that the Boston symphony has performed his symphony and that none other than Paderewski has played his concerto with the same orchestra, and higher words of praise could not be spoken. But the concert on Monday night will mark his first apperance with the orchestra as soloist and this appearance is awaited special interest and pleasure, as a gr feature of the concert is anticipated.

ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 31 1923
From
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

John G. Myers Company shows how celebrates a Great Anniversary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tomorrow morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker Hall the seat sale will open for the concert of the celebrated orchestra, the Boston Symphony, at the Hall next Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The immense interest in the event, as indicated by the great demand for tickets that has been going on for the past week through the mail and phone, gives reason for expectation that the demand will be very large and will guarantee the usual large and brilliant audience that this organization always attracts.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 31 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall the seat sale will open for the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra that takes place at the Hall Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The interest in the event, its importance from the musical viewpoint, and the demand for tickets during the past week, indicate a big sale at the box office, assuring the usual large and brilliant audience that this orchestra always attracts.

The concert marks the last appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux, his five year contract expiring this season. The soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, the famous pianist and composer. The concert is presented under the management of Ben Franklin.

Globe Oct 31 23

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Children Enjoy Program of Orchestral Classics

The chance adult present at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first young people's concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra necessarily envied the naive uncritical enjoyment of the youngsters who filled the house. They liked what they liked; not what they had heard one ought to like.

T. W. Surette of Concord, well-known authority on musical subjects, made a few explanatory remarks on the varied program; following the custom at such concerts in other cities. Hitherto in Boston there has been no speechmaking to the young people, but Mr Surette's well-chosen phrases undoubtedly aided the more thoughtful among his hearers to understand what the orchestra played.

Yet despite warning that Bach is by musicians held to be the greatest of all composers the young people obviously cared more for the adagio from Beethoven's early and not especially characteristic ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; and for the pizzicato from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony than they did for the Bach air known from the violin solo arrangement as "for the g string."

One might have expected the numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, with a story for each explained in the program, to meet with a better reception. Like all the composer's works, these selections are clever, piquant; suggesting pictures to the sophisticated imagination.

Perhaps, however, the very cleverness of Ravel, by which he plays the sedulous ape to so many other and better composers, deceives adult hearers into an admiration so largely factitious, that the more honest emotions of youth are rightly not betrayed into sharing it.

In the audience were three little boys, typical of many others. They laughed at the Bach, shuffled their feet very audibly, dropped pennies to have an excuse for wriggling under their neighbors' seats, and in general proved lacking in the decorum expected of grown-up audiences at Symphony concerts.

But in Smetana's "The Moldau" there came a rather ridiculous passage for tuba. As it blared forth they sat in rapture, and when it was over one turned to another and said aloud "Gee, that was great." Some day that boy will hear Siegfried's horn call sounding amid the "Magic Fire" music in "Die Walkure," and be prepared to thrill as only an adolescent can.

Even in outwardly unpromising auditors these concerts are paving the way for deeper appreciation. And the majority of yesterday's audience of schoolboys and schoolgirls listened with an attentiveness many of their elders might well copy.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

Sunday: Symphony hall, 3:30 P. M., Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto. See special notice.

Symphony hall, 8 P. M., Fisk University Jubilee Singers. See special notice.

Monday: Symphony hall, 8:15 P. M., Sistine Chapel Choir, Monsignor Antonio Rolla, conductor. An entirely different program from the first is promised.

Tuesday: Symphony hall, 4 P. M., Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert for young people, Mr. Monteux, conductor.

---

228 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

Brooklyn Music.

"Andrea Chenier," by Metropolitan stars, will open the Brooklyn opera season at the Academy of Music on Tuesday, Nov. 6. In the cast are Peralta, Perini, Dalossy and Howard, Gigli, De-Luca, Didur, Paltrinieri, Bada, Reschiglian, Picco, D'Angelo, Malatesta and Ananian; conductor, Moranzoni.

Brooklyn recitals are promised this season by Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Miss Farrar, Mme. Homer, Percy Grainger, May Korb, Alma Beck, Francis Moore and Hugo Kortschak.

The Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras will play, respectively, five Friday evenings and six Saturday afternoons at the Brooklyn Academy.

---

360 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
OCT 28 1923

The Winter organ course, opening auspiciously last week with Laurent, flutist, and Helen Yorke, vocalist, as assisting artists, aroused interest in the Municipal Concert Series which ends with the great attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony has a record subscription sale for this season, the 43rd year of its concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. The concert series began October 12 and will extend through 24 weeks, two concerts being given each week.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts are Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera; Eva Gauthier, mezzo-soprano, Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos; Roland Hayes, tenor; Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikisch, Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, pianists; Pablo Casals, 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

With the Orchestras.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten Carnegie Hall concerts take place Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, Jan. 3 and 5, Jan. 31 and Feb. 2, March 13 and 15, and April 3 and 5.

---

33 Concert

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 28 1923
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

Boston Symphony at Hall, Monday, Nov. 5.

One of the events of the season in Albany, and perhaps the only opportunity to enjoy an orchestral concert by one of the celebrated orchestras, will be the concert of the Boston Symphony of exactly 104 instrumentalists, under the leadership of Bierre Monteux and with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist as soloist of the event, at Harmanus Bleecker hall, Monday evening, November 5, under the management of B Franklin. The Boston Symphony w present the full strength of the orga zation. Incidentally it will be the la opportunity to see Pierre Monteux co duct, for this season closes his f year contract with the orchestra, a at its conclusion he will return France for other engagements. On a count of the interest in this event, a so that all interested may familiariz themselves with the program it is give thus early and will include:

I—Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride" (Smetana).

II—Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op 92 (Beethoven): Poco sostenuto; Vivace. Allegretto. Presto: Presto men assai. Allegro con brio.

Intermission.

III—Concerto for piano in C minor No. 4, Op. 44 (Saint-Saens): Allegr moderato; Andante. Allegro vivace Andante. Finale, Allegro. Sigismond Stojowski at piano.

IV—Dance of Salome, from musi drama, "Salome" (Strauss).

Advance orders for seats may now be sent to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, these orders to be filled before the opening of the public sale at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall next Thursday morning.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
OCT 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Programs of brilliance and beauty will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the two concerts here in Syria Mosque on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 10. A feature of the first program will be the second symphony of Rachmaninov. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the variation of Brahms on Haydn's beautiful melody, "The Chorale of Saint Anthony." The evening will close with Wagner's rousing overture to "Rienzi." Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at each of the two concerts. On Friday she will sing the Lament of Andromache, from Bru oratorio, "Achilles," likewise the ari "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," fro Wagner's "Rienzi." At the Saturda matinee she will sing the two songs Schubert, "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig in orchestral arrangement, and the be known aria from Mozart's "Clemenza Tito." The principal number on t program will be the seventh sympho in A major, by Beethoven. Anot number will be an arrangement acc ing to modern orchestration by Re ghi, the Italian composer, of t dances from his compatriots (in s cases unknown) of the sixteenth tury. The French school will be r sented by Debussy's two noctu "Clouds" and "Festivals," which considered to have an authoritativ eloquent interpretation at the han the illustrious French conductor, was a friend of the late compose the first exponent of more than o his scores. The finale number o afternoon program will be Sa Dance of the Seven Veils, fro music drama of the same nam Richard Strauss.

---

76 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~STAR~~ Public Ledger
OCT 28 1923

Musical Boston pays tribute to Philadelphia this week by giving for the first time in that city "Jade Butterflies" at the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Jade Butterflies" is the work of Camille W. Zeckwer, of the Zeckwer-Hahn Philadelphia Musical Academy. It was recently awarded a prize at a hearing of modern compositions in Chicago.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 28 1923

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 8, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will affor this city perhaps the past opportunit to hear one of the greatest, if not th greatest, conductor France has produced. The contract of Pierre Monteux expires in this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony an the great French conductor will return to his native land at the end of th season.

Of Monteux's rendering of "The Dance of Salome," from Strauss music drama "Salome," which will given by the orchestra in their concert here, the Boston Transcript sai "Mr. Monteux's version of "The Dance of Salome" is version of the Straussian theater. The music exhales languors, weaves repetitions, rustles ar prickles. When Strauss would ha it a smoother of sensuality in th full, thick, velvet voices of horns a violincellos; when he would have h wood winds bite as with "the littl white teeth of Salome" in the ol chronicles; when the dance ends a whirr of thrills, high and shri darting and piercing, the conduct was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingere with every thread of instrument color." The Transcript critic concludes: "Fortunate are compose since in such voice as Mr. Monteu and his forces now give them, th music lives and is charactered."

(Continued on Page 86)

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted contralto, who comes as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, has achieved an extraordinary reputation on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is a American by birth, who has won her way to her present position of eminence on foreign soil and in competition with the finest artists of continental Europe. Rivard Grieg, Gust Mahler, Camille-Saint-Saens and ot famous composers have paid the highest tribute to her art. Walter Damrosch said: "Mme. Cahier is one the finest artists that America produced. She unites a lovely vo with perfect and subtle comprehension of the music she interprets."

Aside from the remarkable operatic career of Mme. Cahier, she is recognized as perhaps the greatest lieder singer of the present day in Europe. In writing of this phase of her one of the eminent European critic wrote: "Of the masterly way in which this artist raised Schubert's 'Klarden's Lied' (Clara's Song) and the "Youth at the Spring," to the level of lyric scenes without the use of gesture to aid the inner action, only the auricular witness of this musical wonder can form a clear idea."

Seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mme. Cahier will be on sale at the Colonial Shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue, October 31.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRENTON,
N. J.
TIMES
OCT 1923

Curren

Russian dressing will add piquancy to the orchestral fare that will be offered to the Bostonians in 1924 by the revered Boston Symphony. Beginning with that seson, the Hub's famous orchestra will have for its conductor the Russian cosmopolite, Serge Koussevitzky, whose latest fame has been won in Paris. Boston critics see the engagement as a definite national cycle in the leadership of the orchestra. That is to say, another national cycle.

Before the war all the orchestra's coductor's with one exception were German. After the wartime disrupting of the Symphony's ranks, its trustees chose a new broom to sweep away its trouble—that broom being labeled "Made in France" and wielded, first, by Henri Rabaud and of recent years by Pierre Monteux. One of the Boston critics, H. T. Parker, of the "Transcript," declares that there has been a certain disposition in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and a permanent dependency of Parisian conductors. With the engagement of Koussevitzky that illusion vanishes.

"To Paris as well as to Berlin," says Mr. Parker, "it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice." Our big symphony orchestras are evidently not yet ready to show that independence of Europe by engaging an American as conductor. At all events, the appointment is generally regarded by friends of the Boston band as a step forward.

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 31 '23
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

STOJOWSKI COMING MONDAY

There is special interest among Albanians in regard to the concert of the Boston symphony, next Monday night at Harmanus Bleecker hall, on account of the fact that the soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, who is personally and artistically known to a large number of our musical fraternity. Stojowski is one of the most famous musicians of the United States. As a composer he ranks as high as he does as a pianist, and he is known where music is appreciated. As an evidence of his ability as a composer it need only be said that the Boston symphony has performed his symphony and that none other than Paderewski has played his concerto with the same orchestra, and higher words of praise could not be spoken. But the concert on Monday night will mark his first apperance with the orchestra as soloist and this appearance is awaited special interest and pleasure, as a gr feature of the concert is anticipated.

STABLISHED 1881 OCT 31 1923
rom
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

n G. Myers Company shows how celebrates a Great Anniversary. *

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tomorrow morning at the box office Harmanus Bleecker hall the seat will open for the concert of the celebrated orchestra, the Boston Symphony, at the Hall next Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The immense interest in the event, as indicated by the great demand for tickets that has been going on for the past week through the mail and phone, gives reason for expectation that the demand will be very large and will guarantee the usual large and brilliant audience that this organization always attracts.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 31 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall the seat sale will open for the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra that takes place at the Hall Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The interest in the event, its importance from the musical viewpoint, and the demand for tickets during the past week, indicate a big sale at the box office, assuring the usual large and brilliant audience that this orchestra always attracts.

The concert marks the last appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux, his five year contract expiring this season. The soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, the famous pianist and composer. The concert is presented under the management of Ben Franklin.

Globe Oct 31 '23

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Children Enjoy Program of Orchestral Classics

The chance adult present at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first young people's concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra necessarily envied the naive uncritical enjoyment of the youngsters who filled the house. They liked what they liked, not what they had heard one ought to like.

T. W. Surette of Concord, well-known authority on musical subjects, made a few explanatory remarks on the varied program; following the custom at such concerts in other cities. Hitherto in Boston there has been no speechmaking to the young people, but Mr Surette's well-chosen phrases undoubtedly aided the more thoughtful among his hearers to understand what the orchestra played.

Yet despite warning that Bach is by musicians held to be the greatest of all composers the young people obviously cared more for the adagio from Beethoven's early and not especially characteristic ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; and for the pizzicato from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony than they did for the Bach air known from the violin solo arrangement as "for the g string."

One might have expected the numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, with a story for each explained in the program, to meet with a better reception. Like all the composer's works, these selections are clever, piquant, suggesting pictures to the sophisticated imagination.

Perhaps, however, the very cleverness of Ravel, by which he plays the sedulous ape to so many other and better composers, deceives adult hearers into an admiration so largely factitious, that the more honest emotions of youth are rightly not betrayed into sharing it.

In the audience were three little boys, typical of many others. They laughed at the Bach, shuffled their feet very audibly, dropped pennies to have an excuse for wriggling under their neighbors' seats, and in general proved lacking in the decorum expected of grown-up audiences at Symphony concerts.

But in Smetana's "The Moldau" there came a rather ridiculous passage for tuba. As it blared forth they sat in rapture, and when it was over one turned to another and said aloud "Gee, that was great." Some day that boy will hear Siegfried's horn call sounding amid the "Magic Fire" music in "Die Walkure," and be prepared to thrill as only an adolescent can.

Even in outwardly unpromising auditors these concerts are paving the way for deeper appreciation. And the majority of yesterday's audience of schoolboys and schoolgirls listened with an attentiveness many of their elders might well copy.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

Sunday: Symphony hall, 3:30 P. M., Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto. See special notice.

Symphony hall, 8 P. M., Fisk University Jubilee Singers. See special notice.

Monday: Symphony hall, 8:15 P. M., Sistine Chapel Choir, Monsignor Antonio Rolla, conductor. An entirely different program from the first is promised.

Tuesday: Symphony hall, 4 P. M., Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert for young people, Mr. Monteux, conductor.

---

338 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

Brooklyn Music.

"Andrea Chenier," by Metropolitan stars, will open the Brooklyn opera season at the Academy of Music on Tuesday, Nov. 6. In the cast are Peralta, Perini, Dalossy and Howard, Gigli, De-Luca, Didur, Paltrinieri, Bada, Reschiglian, Picco, D'Angelo, Malatesta and Ananian; conductor, Moranzoni.

Brooklyn recitals are promised this season by Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Miss Farrar, Mme. Homer, Percy Grainger, May Korb, Alma Beck, Francis Moore and Hugo Kortschak.

The Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras will play, respectively, five Friday evenings and six Saturday afternoons at the Brooklyn Academy.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
OCT 28 1923

The Winter organ course, opening auspiciously last week with Laurent, flutist, and Helen Yorke, vocalist, as assisting artists, aroused interest in the Municipal Concert Series which ends with the great attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony has a record subscription sale for this season, the 43rd year of its concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. The concert series began October 12 and will extend through 24 weeks, two concerts being given each week.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts are Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera; Eva Gauthier, mezzo-soprano, Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos; Roland Hayes, tenor; Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikisch, Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, pianists; Pablo Casals, 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

With the Orchestras.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten Carnegie Hall concerts take place Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, Jan. 3 and 5, Jan. 31 and Feb. 2, March 13 and 15, and April 3 and 5.

---

33 Concert

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 28 1923
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

Boston Symphony at Hall, Monday, Nov. 5.

One of the events of the season in Albany, and perhaps the only opportunity to enjoy an orchestral concer by one of the celebrated orchestras, will be the concert of the Boston Symphony of exactly 104 instrumentalists, under the leadership of Bierre Monteux, and with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist as soloist of the event, at Harmanus Bleecker hall, Monday evening, November 5, under the management of B Franklin. The Boston Symphony w present the full strength of the orga zation. Incidentally it will be the la opportunity to see Pierre Monteux co duct, for this season closes his fi year contract with the orchestra, a at its conclusion he will return France for other engagements. On account of the interest in this event, a so that all interested may familiariz themselves with the program it is give thus early and will include:

I—Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride" (Smetana).

II—Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op 92 (Beethoven): Poco sostenuto; Vivace. Allegretto. Presto: Presto men assai. Allegro con brio.

Intermission.

III—Concerto for piano in C minor No. 4, Op. 44 (Saint-Saens): Allegr moderato; Andante. Allegro vivace Andante. Finale, Allegro. Sigismond Stojowski at piano.

IV—Dance of Salome, from music drama, "Salome" (Strauss).

Advance orders for seats may now be sent to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, these orders to be filled before the opening of the public sale at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall next Thursday morning.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
OCT 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Programs of brilliance and beauty will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the two concerts here in Syria Mosque on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 10. A feature of the first program will be the second symphony of Rachmaninov. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the variation of Brahms on Haydn's beautiful melody, "The Chorale of Saint Anthony." The evening will close with Wagner's rousing overture to "Rienzi." Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at each of the two concerts. On Friday she will sing the Lament of Andromache, from Br oratorio, "Achilles," likewise the ari "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," fro Wagner's "Rienzi." At the Saturda matinee she will sing the two songs Schubert, "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig in orchestral arrangement, and the be known aria from Mozart's "Clemenza Tito." The principal number on t program will be the seventh sympho in A major, by Beethoven. Anot number will be an arrangement acco ing to modern orchestration by Re ghi, the Italian composer, of t dances from his compatriots (in s cases unknown) of the sixteenth tury. The French school will be re sented by Debussy's two noctu "Clouds" and "Festivals," which considered to have an authoritativ eloquent interpretation at the han the illustrious French conductor, was a friend of the late compose the first exponent of more than his scores. The finale number o afternoon program will be Sa Dance of the Seven Veils, fron music drama of the same nam Richard Strauss.

---

76 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YO
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~STAR~~
OCT 28 1923

Musical Boston pays tribute to delphia this week by giving for the first time in that city "Jade Butterflies" at the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Jade Butterflies" is the work of Camille W. Zeckwer, of the Zeckwer-Hahn Philadelphia Musical Academy. It was recently awarded a prize at a hearing of modern compositions in Chicago.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 28 1923

The coming concert of the Bosto Symphony orchestra in Elmwoo Music hall, Thursday evening, November 8, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will affor this city perhaps the past opportunit to hear one of the greatest, if not th greatest, conductor France has pro duced. The contract of Pierre Mon teux expires in this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony an the great French conductor will retur to his native land at the end of th season.

Of Monteux's rendering of "Th Dance of Salome," from Straus music drama "Salome," which will given by the orchestra in their co cert here, the Boston Transcript sai "Mr. Monteux's version of "The Da of Salome" is version of the Strau sian theater. The music exhales la guors, weaves repetitions, rustles a prickles. When Strauss would ha it a smoother of sensuality in t full, thick, velvet voices of horns a violincellos; when he would have h wood winds bite as with "the littl white teeth of Salome" in the ol chronicles; when the dance ends a whirr of thrills, high and shr darting and piercing, the conduct was heightening voice to the con poser and as quick, sure-fingere with every thread of instrument color." The Transcript critic co cludes: "Fortunate are compose since in such voice as Mr. Monte and his forces now give them, th music lives and is charactered."

(Continued on Page 86)

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted co tralto, who comes as soloist with Boston Symphony orchestra, ha achieved an extraordinary reputatio on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is a American by birth, who has won he way to her present position of em inence on foreign soil and in compe tition with the finest artists of co tinental Europe. Rivard Grieg, Gus Mahler, Camille-Saint-Saens and ot famous composers have paid the hi est tribute to her art. Walter D rosch said: "Mme. Cahier is one the finest artists that America produced. She unites a lovely vo with perfect and subtle comprehension of the music she interprets."

Aside from the remarkable operatic career of Mme. Cahier, she is recognized as perhaps the greatest lieder singer of the present day in Europe. In writing of this phase of her ar one of the eminent European critic wrote: "Of the masterly way in which this artist raised Schubert's 'Klarden's Lied' (Clara's Song) and the "Youth at the Spring," to the level of lyric scenes without the use of gesture to aid the inner action, only the auricular witness of this musical wonder can form a clear idea."

Seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Mme. Cahier will be on sale at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue, after October 31.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PRESS

chellen

PHONY,

importance is the Boston Symnext Monday ement of Ben for seats
18 Chestnut not opening Pierre Mon-
ncert and the Stojowski, to many Al-has been for the most re-its kind stands for the in musical perform-qualifies are the than forty years of

BURGH
PA.
TIMES
CT 28 1923

hony Coming e Nov. 9 and 10

ymphony Orchestra
Syria Mosque Fri-
aturday afternoon,
10. Madame Sigrid of the Metropolitan will appear as a
the two concerts.

BANY
Y.
RNAL
1923

N CONCERT.
Symphony.

ost important number to be given by the orchestra, when this lebrated organization
Bleecker hall Mon-
5, under the leader-onteux, will be the
of Beethoven in A me consider the glorious nine evening will be celebrated composer. This that Stojowski oist with the Bosestra, although his ot strange to this is symphony was at the regular Bosseveral years ago

with this orches-oncerto. The con-concert, however, difficult yet concerto of minor.
or seats for this to Ben Franklin
at once, if they re the opening of the hall Thurs-

ANY
Y.
NAL
0 1923

CONCERT.
mphony.

ortunity for fault
Boston Symphony
for this orchestra
ement of artists on there will be ex-
e stage, the larges at ever appeared x, celebrated con orchestra, and th ianist, Sigismond
the soloist of th
rt will take plac
ker hall next Mon
he management o eat sale at the bo
Thursday morning
ecure seats in ad
office sale should Franklin at 18
concert in every most important
the ered tici

TRENTON,
N. J.
TIMES
OCT 1923

Curren

Russian dressing will add piquancy to the orchestral fare that will be offered to the Bostonians in 1924 by the revered Boston Symphony. Beginning with that seson, the Hub's famous orchestra will have for its conductor the Russian cosmopolite, Serge Koussevitzky, whose latest fame has been won in Paris. Boston critics see the engagement as a definite national cycle in the leadership of the orchestra. That is to say, another national cycle.

Before the war all the orchestra's coductor's with one exception were German. After the wartime disrupting of the Symphony's ranks, its trustees chose a new broom to sweep away its trouble—that broom being labeled "Made in France" and wielded, first, by Henri Rabaud and of recent years by Pierre Monteux. One of the Boston critics, H. T. Parker, of the "Transcript," declares that there has been a certain disposition in Paris to regard the Boston Symphony as one of the incidental conquests of the late war and a permanent dependency of Parisian conductors. With the engagement of Koussevitzky that illusion vanishes.

"To Paris as well as to Berlin," says Mr. Parker, "it is good to proclaim our free and independent choice." Our big symphony orchestras are evidently not yet ready to show that independence of Europe by engaging an American as conductor. At all events, the appointment is generally regarded by friends of the Boston band as a step forward.

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 31
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

will show the difference.

STOJOWSKI COMING MONDAY

There is special interest among Albanians in regard to the concert of the Boston symphony, next Monday night at Harmanus Bleecker hall, on account of the fact that the soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, who is personally and artistically known to a large number of our musical fraternity. Stojowski is one of the most famous musicians of the United States. As a composer he ranks as high as he does as a pianist, and he is known where music is appreciated. As an evidence of his ability as a composer it need only be said that the Boston symphony has performed his symphony and that none other than Paderewski has played his concerto with the same orchestra, and higher words of praise could not be spoken. But the concert on Monday night will mark his first apperance with the orchestra as soloist and this appearance is awaited special interest and pleasure, as a gr feature of the concert is anticipated.

Sun Yat Sen

STABLISHED 1881 OCT 31 1923
rom
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.

ohn G. Myers Company shows how celebrates a Great Anniversary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tomorrow morning at the box office Harmanus Bleecker hall the seat sale will open for the concert of the celebrated orchestra, the Boston Symphony, at the Hall next Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The immense interest in the event, as indicated by the great demand for tickets that has been going on for the past week through the mail and phone, gives reason for expectation that the demand will be very large and will guarantee the usual large and brilliant audience that this organization always attracts.

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 31 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow morning at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall the seat sale will open for the concert of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra that takes place at the Hall Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The interest in the event, its importance from the musical viewpoint, and the demand for tickets during the past week, indicate a big sale at the box office, assuring the usual large and brilliant audience that this orchestra always attracts.

The concert marks the last appearance in this city of Pierre Monteux, his five year contract expiring this season. The soloist of the occasion will be Sigismond Stojowski, the famous pianist and composer. The concert is presented under the management of Ben Franklin.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Children Enjoy Program of Orchestral Classics

The chance adult present at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first young people's concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra necessarily envied the naive uncritical enjoyment of the youngsters who filled the house. They liked what they liked, not what they had heard one ought to like.

T. W. Surette of Concord, well-known authority on musical subjects, made a few explanatory remarks on the varied program; following the custom at such concerts in other cities. Hitherto in Boston there has been no speechmaking to the young people, but Mr Surette's well-chosen phrases undoubtedly aided the more thoughtful among his hearers to understand what the orchestra played.

Yet despite warning that Bach is by musicians held to be the greatest of all composers the young people obviously cared more for the adagio from Beethoven's early and not especially characteristic ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; and for the pizzicato from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony than they did for the Bach air known from the violin solo arrangement as "for the g string."

One might have expected the numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, with a story for each explained in the program, to meet with a better reception. Like all the composer's works, these selections are clever, piquant, suggesting pictures to the sophisticated imagination.

Perhaps, however, the very cleverness of Ravel, by which he plays the seculous ape to so many other and better composers, deceives adult hearers into an admiration so largely factitious, that the more honest emotions of youth are rightly not betrayed into sharing it.

In the audience were three little boys, typical of many others. They laughed at the Bach, shuffled their feet very audibly, dropped pennies to have an excuse for wriggling under their neighbors' seats, and in general proved lacking in the decorum expected of grown-up audiences at Symphony concerts.

But in Smetana's "The Moldau" there came a rather ridiculous passage for tuba. As it blared forth they sat in rapture, and when it was over one turned to another and said aloud "Gee, that was great." Some day that boy will hear Siegfried's horn call sounding amid the "Magic Fire" music in "Die Walkure," and be prepared to thrill as only an adolescent can.

Even in outwardly unpromising auditors these concerts are paving the way for deeper appreciation. And the majority of yesterday's audience of schoolboys and schoolgirls listened with an attentiveness many of their elders might well copy.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

Sunday: Symphony hall, 3:30 P. M., Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto. See special notice.

Symphony hall, 8 P. M., Fisk University Jubilee Singers. See special notice.

Monday: Symphony hall, 8:15 P. M., Sistine Chapel Choir, Monsignor Antonio Rolla, conductor. An entirely different program from the first is promised.

Tuesday: Symphony hall, 4 P. M., Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert for young people, Mr. Monteux, conductor.

---

228 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

Brooklyn Music.

"Andrea Chenier," by Metropolitan stars, will open the Brooklyn opera season at the Academy of Music on Tuesday, Nov. 6. In the cast are Peralta, Perini, Dalossy and Howard, Gigli, DeLuca, Didur, Paltrinieri, Bada, Reschiglian, Picco, D'Angelo, Malatesta and Ananian; conductor, Moranzoni.

Brooklyn recitals are promised this season by Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Miss Farrar, Mme. Homer, Percy Grainger, May Korb, Alma Beck, Francis Moore and Hugo Kortschak.

The Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras will play, respectively, five Friday evenings and six Saturday afternoons at the Brooklyn Academy.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
OCT 28 1923

The Winter organ course, opening auspiciously last week with Laurent, flutist, and Helen Yorke, vocalist, as assisting artists, aroused interest in the Municipal Concert Series which ends with the great attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony has a record subscription sale for this season, the 43rd year of its concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. The concert series began October 12 and will extend through 24 weeks, two concerts being given each week.

The soloists engaged to appear at the regular concerts are Sigrid Onegin and Elisabeth Rethberg of the Metropolitan Opera; Eva Gauthier, mezzo-soprano, Marya Freund and Vera Janacopulos, sopranos; Roland Hayes, tenor; Moriz Rosenthal, Mitja Nikisch, Harold Bauer and E. Robert Schmitz, pianists; Pablo Casals, 'cellist; Jacques Thibaud and Carl Flesch, violinists, and Lionel Tertis, the English viola virtuoso, who is coming to America for the first time.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 28 1923

With the Orchestras.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten Carnegie Hall concerts take place Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, Jan. 3 and 5, Jan. 31 and Feb. 2, March 13 and 15, and April 3 and 5.

---

33 Concert

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 28 1923
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

Boston Symphony at Hall, Monday, Nov. 5.

One of the events of the season in Albany, and perhaps the only opportunity to enjoy an orchestral concert by one of the celebrated orchestras, will be the concert of the Boston Symphony of exactly 104 instrumentalists, under the leadership of Bierre Monteux and with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist as soloist of the event, at Harmanus Bleecker hall, Monday evening, November 5, under the management of Ben Franklin. The Boston Symphony will present the full strength of the organization. Incidentally it will be the last opportunity to see Pierre Monteux conduct, for this season closes his five year contract with the orchestra, and at its conclusion he will return to France for other engagements. On account of the interest in this event, and so that all interested may familiariz themselves with the program it is give thus early and will include:

I—Overture to the opera "The Bartered Bride" (Smetana).

II—Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op 92 (Beethoven): Poco sostenuto; Vivace. Allegretto. Presto: Presto men assai. Allegro con brio.

Intermission.

III—Concerto for piano in C minor No. 4, Op. 44 (Saint-Saens): Allegro moderato; Andante. Allegro vivace Andante. Finale, Allegro. Sigismond Stojowski at piano.

IV—Dance of Salome, from music drama, "Salome" (Strauss).

Advance orders for seats may now be sent to Mr. Franklin at 18 Chestnut street, these orders to be filled before the opening of the public sale at the box office of Harmanus Bleecker hall next Thursday morning.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST
OCT 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Programs of brilliance and beauty will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the two concerts here in Syria Mosque on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 9 and 10. A feature of the first program will be the second symphony of Rachmaninov. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the variation of Brahms on Haydn's beautiful melody, "The Chorale of Saint Anthony." The evening will close with Wagner's rousing overture to "Rienzi." Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will appear as soloist at each of the two concerts. On Friday she will sing the Lament of Andromache, from Bruch's oratorio, "Achilles," likewise the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi." At the Saturday matinee she will sing the two songs of Schubert, "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig" in orchestral arrangement, and the best known aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito." The principal number on the program will be the seventh symphony in A major, by Beethoven. Another number will be an arrangement according to modern orchestration by Respighi, the Italian composer, of the dances from his compatriots (in some cases unknown) of the sixteenth century. The French school will be represented by Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," which are considered to have an authoritative and eloquent interpretation at the hands of the illustrious French conductor, who was a friend of the late composer and the first exponent of more than one of his scores. The finale number on the afternoon program will be Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils, from the music drama of the same name, by Richard Strauss.

---

76 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YO

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~STAR~~
OCT 28 1923

Musical Boston pays tribute to Philadelphia this week by giving for the first time in that city "Jade Butterflies" at the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Jade Butterflies" is the work of Camille W. Zeckwer, of the Zeckwer-Hahn Philadelphia Musical Academy. It was recently awarded a prize at a hearing of modern compositions in Chicago.

BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 28 1923

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall, Thursday evening, November 8, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will afford this city perhaps the past opportunity to hear one of the greatest, if not the greatest, conductor France has produced. The contract of Pierre Monteux expires in this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony and the great French conductor will return to his native land at the end of the season.

Of Monteux's rendering of "The Dance of Salome," from Strauss music drama "Salome," which will be given by the orchestra in their concert here, the Boston Transcript said: "Mr. Monteux's version of "The Dance of Salome" is version of the Straussian theater. The music exhales languors, weaves repetitions, rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smoother of sensuality in the full, thick, velvet voices of horns a violincellos; when he would have his wood winds bite as with "the little white teeth of Salome" in the old chronicles; when the dance ends in a whirr of thrills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered with every thread of instrumental color." The Transcript critic concludes: "Fortunate are composers since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now give them, the music lives and is charactered."

(Continued on Page 86)

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted contralto, who comes as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, has achieved an extraordinary reputation on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is an American by birth, who has won her way to her present position of eminence on foreign soil and in competition with the finest artists of continental Europe. Rivard Grieg, Gustav Mahler, Camille-Saint-Saens and other famous composers have paid the highest tribute to her art. Walter Damrosch said: "Mme. Cahier is one of the finest artists that America has produced. She unites a lovely voice with perfect and subtle comprehension of the music she interprets from the [illegible] of Mme per th

BROOKLYN

63 Boston Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original R meike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 28 1923

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL OPEN HERE ON NOVEMBER 20

Distinguished Soloists to be Brought Here by Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just opened it 43rd season, will give its usual five concerts in Infantry Hall in this city during the next few months on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. This will be the last season of the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who intends to return to France at the expiration of his five-year term of service.

The orchestra retains its personnel of last year, with the addition of several brass players, and Conductor Monteux has music of especial interest which he plans to include in his Providence programmes. The soloists, who include a contralto, baritone, two pianists and a 'cellist, are artists of distinction.

The contralto will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish singer who came to America last fall to join the Metropolitan Opera Company. John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone, will also be a soloist, and the pianists will be Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson. Mme. Leginska has toured America several times. While Miss Robinson has been before the public but a short time, she has made a reputation in New York, Chicago and elsewhere. The 'cellist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of that section in the orchestra and called one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

---

41 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS

OCT 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR 2 DAYS NEXT WEEK.

Programs of especial brilliance will be given by the Boston Symphony in the two concerts here Friday night and Saturday matinee of next week. A feature of the first program will be the second Symphony of Rachmaninof. Pierre Monteaux will conduct the Variations of Brahms on Haydan's melody, "The Chorale of Saint Anthony." The program will close with Wagner's rousing overture to "Rienzi."

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan will appear as soloist at both concerts. On Friday she will sing the "Lament of Andromache" from Bruch's oratorio "Achilles;" also the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossoms" from Wagner's "Rienzi." At the Saturday matinee she will sing two songs of Schubert, "Allmacht" and Erlkonig" with orchestral arrangement and the aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the matinee program will be the Seventh Symphony in A major by Beethoven, also an arrangement according to modern orchestration by Respighi, the Italian composer, of three dances from his compatriots of the sixteenth century. The French school will be represented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," with the final number Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils from the music-drama of the same name by Richard Strauss.

---

7 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
EXPRESS

OCT 28 1923

dering of The Dance of Salome from Strauss's music drama, Salome, which will be given by the orchestra in its concert here, the Boston Transcript said: "Mr. Monteux's version of the Dance of Salome is the versian of the Straussian theater. The music exhales langours, weaves repetitions, rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smother of sensuality in the full, thick, velvet voices of horns and violoncellos; when he would have his wood winds bite as with the little white teeth of Salome in the old chronicles; when the dance ends a whirr of trills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered, with every thread of instrumental color." The Transcript critic concludes: "Fortunate are composers, since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now gi en them, their music lives and is charactered."

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted contralto, who comes as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, has achieved an extraordinary reputation on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme. Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is an American by birth who has won her way to her present position of eminence on foreign soil and in competition with the finest artists of continental Europe. Grieg, Mahler, Saint-Saens and other famous composers have paid the highest tribute to her art. Walter Damrosch said: "Mme. Cahier is one of the finest artists that America has produced. She unites a lovely voice with perfect and subtle comprehension of the music she interprets."

Aside from the operatic career of Mme. Cahier, she is recognized as perhaps the greatest lieder singer of the present day in Europe. In writing of this phase of her art one of the eminent European critics wrote: "Of the masterly way in which this artist raised Schubert's Clara's Song and the Youth at the Spring, to the level of lyric scenes without the use of gesture to aid the inner action, only the auricular witness of this musical wonder can form a clear idea; and those who have not heard Brahm's Der Schmied sung by Mme. Cahier have, in fact, never heard it sung. A passion bridled and ennobled, with the finest taste, spoke to us in her classic rendering of Brahm's Nachtigal like the voice of a glorified soul." Mme. Cahier's re-entry into the concert field in this country is apt to prove one of the musical sensations of the season, and local music lovers are fortunate in the opportunity to hear her and Monteux's splendid orchestra at the same concert.

(Continued on tenth page.)

(Continued from third page.)

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 8th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will afford this city probably the last opportunity to hear one of the greatest, if not the greatest, conductor France has produced. The contract of Pierre Monteux expires in this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony, and the great French conductor will return to his native land at its close. At the recent opening of the season in Boston, Monteux was praised highly for having brought the historical and tradi tionally marvelous orchestra to a beauty and perfection of ensemble and an eloquence of performanc scarcely equalled in the finest se sons of the past. Of Monteux's ren

17X

---

13 Concert Boston Symp

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 28 1923

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra Dates

The Boston Symphony's series of co certs in Providence is announced to beg Nov. 20, and includes the usual five Tu day evening performances in Infant Hall, coming on Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Fe 26 and April 29. This season will mark t farewell appearances of Mr. Monteux wi the orchestra, this announcement havi been made before the season began.

The same personnel has been retaine with the addition of a few players in th brass section, making it more full equipped for the exactions of certain modern scores. Providence will hear as soloists, Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone; two pianists of the younger generation, Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, and the orchestra's own 'cellist, Jean Bedetti.

Mme. Onegin sang here last April as soloist with the Providence Music League. She came to this country last season to sing with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The high reputation she held abroad was amply confirmed in this country upon her appearances in opera and concert.

Mr. Thomas was also here last year singing with the Rhode Island Symphony Orchestra in May. He was well known on the musical comedy stage before he entered the concert field some two years ago.

Ethel Leginska has toured this country several times in recitals and as soloist with orchestras among them being the Boston Symphony. Last year she gave recitals in England, Italy and Germany. Miss Robinson is a comparative newcomer, but her concerts in New York, Chicago and other cities have won her a high place among American pianists. She is said to be the foremost pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and is a composer of note. Mr. Bedetti, who needs no introduction to Providence audiences, is considered one of the finest 'cellists on this side of the water.

* * *

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL

OV 3 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Monday night at Harmanus Bleecker hall will take place the much anticipated concert of the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, and with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, as soloist of the occasion. A very large and brilliant audience is expected. The seat sale is now in progress at the theater box office.

When Arthur Nikisch came from Europe to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, and found at the first rehearsal the marvelously perfect instrument which Wilhelm Gericke had left him, he exclaimed: "Now all I have to do is to poetize!" Pierre Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitsky next autumn under much the same conditions, for the illustrious conductor and splendid musician whose term is to expire next spring, is particularly noted for the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his tireless hand has wrought in the four years past.

---

27 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeik
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW Y

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW ORLEANS
LA.
ITEM

NOV 4 1923

Music

A new suite of sea-music English composer, Frank Bridg played in America last week Boston symphony under the di of Mr. Bridge.

"Bridge," says the critic of t ton Transcript, "clings to the o dle ground although he fre avails himself of what is of v the newer paths of musical co tion. Bridge is not one of thos feel that the times are out of and that only the past was good

"In the wider use of the continues the critic, "the suite be termed a symphony. The movements are bound together finity of key, and in characte correspond to the conventional gro, Slow Movement and Final first of them, a 'Sea Scape', h main tonality E-major. Pi rather than interpretative, the would seem to suggest the motic brightness, even the majesty sea—not its mystery or its tr In the Scherzo, by title "Sea F the composer makes clear and— reading eye does not err—succ attempt to achieve that gossamer ness of orchestral effect for Berlioz's "Queen Mab" set the tern. "Moonlight" is the name s on the movement that follows here the composer would hav music atmospheric, poetic. The ing though subdued, is not w richness and the chief theme, sung by flute and ultimately from the full orchestra, is app ately languorous. The Finale closes Bridge as one of the many have sought to depict in musi fury of an ocean storm. At the set woodwind, horns and triu over a roll of drums give fo boldly dissonant motive. Se chromatic scales are heard i strings and horns announce ferocity" the chief theme. The t est waxes and wanes and waxes af At length after a mighty out the raging elements subside. As breaking through clouds is heard chief theme of the first movem broad, reliant, propulsive. And a long sustained E-major chord piece comes to resounding end.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeik
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YC
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 4 1923

GREAT LEADER

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra Will Give Buffalo Music Lovers a Great Treat Next Thursday Evening.

---

8 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 4 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An event of prime importance will be the concert of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening November 8th, in Elmwood Music Hall. This concert, which is the first in Bessie Bellanca's "Musical Arts" series of five, will give to local music lovers the last opportunity to hear the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's direction as the great French conductor, in this his fifth season, completes his term and will return to France at the close of the season. It also affords to Buffalo concert-goers the opportunity to hear Mme. Charles Cahier, world-famous contralto, who, though an American by birth, has become the idol of the Viennese public, and indeed of all continental Europe. For four years the prima donna contralto of the Royal Opera of Vienna, and for several years the leading contralto of the Wagner and Mozart festivals in Munich, she has won an enviable reputation. It is significant that Mme. Cahier has received more decorations and titles from European Royalty as a tribute to her superb art than any woman in the world. Mme. Cahier has the distinction of being hailed by the great Wilhelm Mangelberg as "the greatest living interpreter of Gustave Mahler's works." Mahler himself, and other great composers, including Grieg, Saint Saens and Strauss, have paid hig tribute to the great contralto. Mme Cahier's voice is one of amazing powe and range, possessing a uniformly bea tiful texture, and she possesses to an extraordinary degree the power to lift the spectator into a region of elemental passion.

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, under Mr. Monteux's direction will present is one of exceptional interest.

Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz" .... Weber

Symphony in E Minor, No. 1, Op. 39 .... Sibelius

1. Andante ma non troppe; Allegro energico.
2. Andante ma non troppe lento.
3. Allegro.
4. Finale (Quasi una Fantasia) Andante: Allegro molto.

(Intermission of ten minutes after the symphony).

Air, "Adieu, foret," from the Opera "Jeanne d'Arc" .... Tschaikowsk

"Dance of Salome," from the Music Drama "Salome" .... Straus

"La Captive," Revery, Op. 12 (after Hugo) .... Berlio

Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic poem No. 2 .... Lisz

Soloist, Madame Cahier.

Tickets for the concert may be ob Colonial Flower Shop, N or

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 4 19

Mme. Gauthier and "Jazz"

Mme. Eva Gauthier's inclusion of some American "jazz" numbers by Berlin, Kern and Gershwin, with the latter at the piano, caused a good deal of preliminary comment on her recital in New York last week. The event came too late for mention in this department as to just what the "reaction" was to the novelty. Mme. Gauthier chose her "jazz" group to round out a programme of "Ancient and Modern Music," believing that they were "representative" and fitting. So Berlin, Kern and Gershwin found their names listed along with Bartok, Schonberg and Milhaud on a recital programme. Local concert-goers have also had their interest aroused by what is considered a rather daring innovation on the part of the Canadian mezzo-soprano. She will sing here Churchill House on Monday evening, Nov 19.

* * *

Season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will go on sale tomorrow in the stationery store of The Company, the first concert coming on Nov. 20. The season is expected by music-lovers to be of exceptional interest, because it brings the culmination of Mr. Monteux's five-year work with the organization. This is his last season in Boston, after which Paris will claim him again. This week the orchestra takes its first long trip of the season, visiting Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh, two concerts being scheduled for the latter city. The soloist for the first Providence concert will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto.

Noted

Piere (for he period a phony O the highe formance leader ha opening o prospect.
tation an maker, a which he grams in interest orchestra
The gr expected the con demand France
attentio
He be over t most well four Russe leader
sequer
Metro
From Symp
genera finest
The five co
Tuesda
cember
April
concert
Swedis
Thoma bariton cess re Legins
among younge leader
orches

Mad sing noon
the fore few and aud yea won cree Fe hav such ence singe famo musi holds
Th Bohen
an It fame Vienn was a Wagn
these
Amer
Ame
Oper nie
the
a

[139]

63

BEST BY ATTEST

Original R meike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 28 1923

SYMPHONY CONCERTS WILL OPEN HERE ON NOVEMBER 20

Distinguished Soloists to be Brought Here by Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just opened it 43rd season, will give its usual five concerts in Infantry Hall in this city during the next few months on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. This will be the last season of the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who intends to return to France at the expiration of his five-year term of service.

The orchestra retains its personnel of last year, with the addition of several brass players, and Conductor Monteux has music of especial interest which he plans to include in his Providence programmes. The soloists, who include a contralto, baritone, two pianists and a 'cellist, are artists of distinction.

The contralto will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish singer who came to America last fall to join the Metropolitan Opera Company. John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone, will also be a soloist, and the pianists will be Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson. Mme. Leginska has toured America several times. While Miss Robinson has been before the public but a short time, she has made a reputation in New York, Chicago and elsewhere. The 'cellist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of that section in the orchestra and called one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS

OCT 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR 2 DAYS NEXT WEEK.

Programs of especial brilliance will be given by the Boston Symphony in the two concerts here Friday night and Saturday matinee of next week. A feature of the first program will be the second Symphony of Rachmaninof. Pierre Monteaux will conduct the Variations of Brahms on Haydan's melody, "The Chorale of Saint Anthony." The program will close with Wagner's rousing overture to "Rienzi."

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan will appear as soloist at both concerts. On Friday she will sing the "Lament of Andromache" from Bruch's oratorio "Achilles;" also the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossoms" from Wagner's "Rienzi." At the Saturday matinee she will sing two songs of Schubert, "Allmacht" and Erlkonig" with orchestral arrangement and the aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the matinee program will be the Seventh Symphony in A major by Beethoven, also an arrangement according to modern orchestration by Respighi, the Italian composer, of three dances from his compatriots of the sixteenth century. The French school will be represented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," with the final number Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils from the music-drama of the same name by Richard Strauss.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 28 1923

dering of The Dance of Salome from Strauss's music drama, Salome, which will be given by the orchestra in its concert here, the Boston Transcript said: "Mr. Monteux's version of the Dance of Salome is the versian of the Straussian theater. The music exhales langours, weaves repetitions, rustles and prickles. When Strauss would have it a smother of sensuality in the full, thick, velvet voices of horns and violoncellos; when he would have his wood winds bite as with the little white teeth of Salome in the old chronicles; when the dance ends in a whirr of trills, high and shrill, darting and piercing, the conductor was heightening voice to the composer and as quick, sure-fingered, with every thread of instrumental color." The Transcript critic concludes: "Fortunate are composers, since in such voice as Mr. Monteux and his forces now gi en them, their music lives and is charactered."

Mme. Charles Cahier, noted contralto, who comes as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, has achieved an extraordinary reputation on the operatic stage in Europe. Mme. Cahier (Sara Layton Walker) is an American by birth who has won her way to her present position of eminence on foreign soil and in competition with the finest artists of continental Europe. Grieg, Mahler, Saint-Saens and other famous composers have paid the highest tribute to her art. Walter Damrosch said: "Mme. Cahier is one of the finest artists that America has produced. She unites a lovely voice with perfect and subtle comprehension of the music she interprets."

Aside from the operatic career of Mme. Cahier, she is recognized as perhaps the greatest lieder singer of the present day in Europe. In writing of this phase of her art one of the eminent European critics wrote: "Of the masterly way in which this artist raised Schubert's Clara's Song and the Youth at the Spring, to the level of lyric scenes without the use of gesture to aid the inner action, only the auricular witness of this musical wonder can form a clear idea; and those who have not heard Brahm's Der Schmied sung by Mme. Cahier have, in fact, never heard it sung. A passion bridled and ennobled, with the finest taste, spoke to us in her classic rendering of Brahm's Nachtigal like the voice of a glorified soul." Mme. Cahier's re-entry into the concert field in this country is apt to prove one of the musical sensations of the season, and local music lovers are fortunate in the opportunity to hear her and Monteux's splendid orchestra at the same concert.

(Continued on tenth page.)

The coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 8th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will afford this city probably the last opportunity to hear one of the greatest, if not the greatest, conductor France has produced. The contract of Pierre Monteux expires in this, his fifth season as head of the Boston Symphony, and the great French conductor will return to his native land at its close. At the recent opening of the season in Boston, Monteux was praised highly for having brought the historical and traditionally marvelous orchestra to a beauty and perfection of ensemble and an eloquence of performance scarcely equalled in the finest seasons of the past. Of Monteux's ren

17x

---

13 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 28 1923

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra Dates

The Boston Symphony's series of concerts in Providence is announced to begin Nov. 20, and includes the usual five Tuesday evening performances in Infantry Hall, coming on Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. This season will mark the farewell appearances of Mr. Monteux with the orchestra, this announcement having been made before the season began.

The same personnel has been retained with the addition of a few players in the brass section, making it more fully equipped for the exactions of certain modern scores. Providence will hear as soloists, Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the young American baritone; two pianists of the younger generation, Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, and the orchestra's own 'cellist, Jean Bedetti.

Mme. Onegin sang here last April as soloist with the Providence Music League. She came to this country last season to sing with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The high reputation she held abroad was amply confirmed in this country upon her appearances in opera and concert.

Mr. Thomas was also here last year singing with the Rhode Island Symphony Orchestra in May. He was well known on the musical comedy stage before he entered the concert field some two years ago.

Ethel Leginska has toured this country several times in recitals and as soloist with orchestras among them being the Boston Symphony. Last year she gave recitals in England, Italy and Germany. Miss Robinson is a comparative newcomer, but her concerts in New York, Chicago and other cities have won her a high place among American pianists. She is said to be the foremost pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and is a composer of note. Mr. Bedetti, who needs no introduction to Providence audiences, is considered one of the finest 'cellists on this side of the water.

* * *

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
OV 3 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Monday night at Harmanus Bleecker hall will take place the much anticipated concert of the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, and with Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, as soloist of the occasion. A very large and brilliant audience is expected. The seat sale is now in progress at the theater box office.

When Arthur Nikisch came from Europe to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, and found at the first rehearsal the marvelously perfect instrument which Wilhelm Gericke had left him, he exclaimed: "Now all I have to do is to poetize!" Pierre Monteux will relinquish the baton to Serge Koussevitsky next autumn under much the same conditions, for the illustrious conductor and splendid musician whose term is to expire next spring, is particularly noted for the rare ensemble and beauty of tone which his tireless hand has wrought in the four years past.

---

27 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeik
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YO

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW ORLEANS
LA.
ITEM
NOV 4 1923

Music

A new suite of sea-music English composer, Frank Bridg played in America last week Boston symphony under the di of Mr. Bridge.

"Bridge," says the critic of t ton Transcript, "clings to the o dle ground although he fre avails himself of what is of v the newer paths of musical co tion. Bridge is not one of thos feel that the times are out of and that only the past was good

"In the wider use of the continues the critic. "the suite be termed a symphony. The movements are bound together finity of key, and in characte correspond to the conventional gro, Slow Movement and Final first of them, a 'Sea Scape', h main tonality E-major. Pi rather than interpretative, the would seem to suggest the moti brightness, even the majesty sea—not its mystery or its t In the Scherzo, by title "Sea the composer makes clear and— reading eye does not err—succ attempt to achieve that gossamer ness of orchestral effect for Berlioz's "Queen Mab" set the tern. "Moonlight" is the name s on the movement that follows here the composer would hav music atmospheric, poetic. The ing though subdued, is not w richness and the chief theme, sung by flute and ultimately from the full orchestra, is app ately languorous. The Finale closes Bridge as one of the many have sought to depict in music fury of an ocean storm. At the set woodwind, horns and triu over a roll of drums give fo boldly dissonant motive. Se chromatic scales are heard in strings and horns announce ferocity" the chief theme. The t est waxes and wanes and waxes af At length after a mighty out the raging elements subside. As breaking through clouds is heard chief theme of the first movem broad, reliant, propulsive. And a long sustained E-major chord piece comes to resounding end.

BEST BY ATTEST

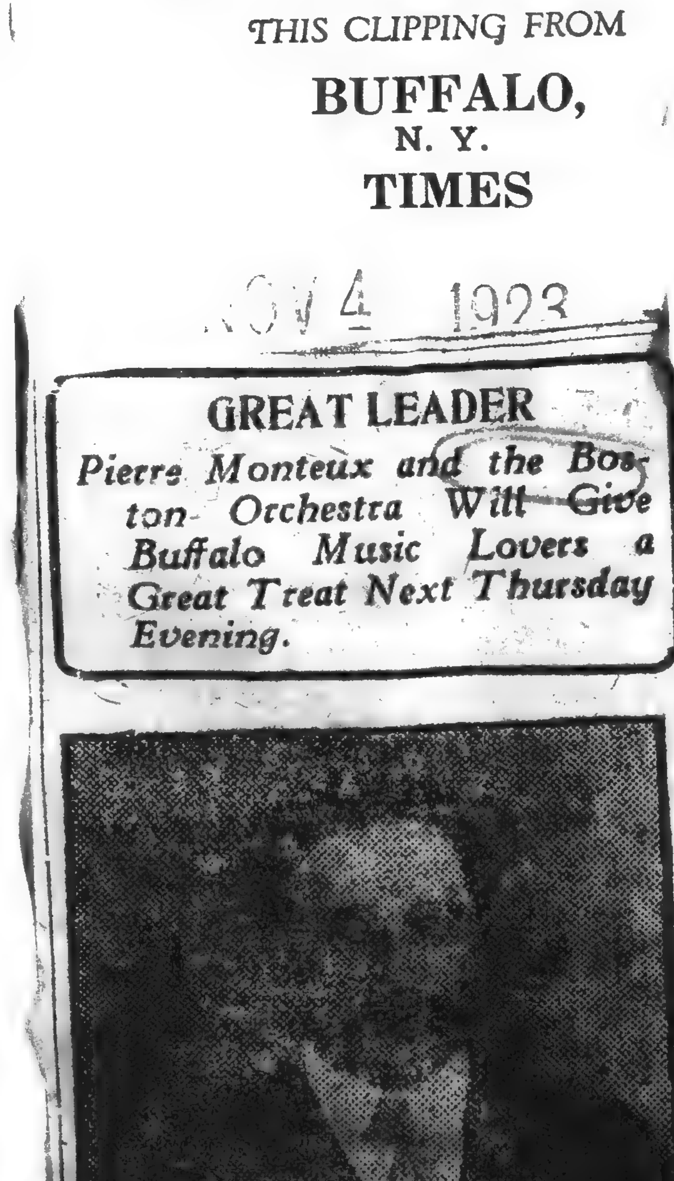
Original Romeik
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YC
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

OV 4 1923

GREAT LEADER

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra Will Give Buffalo Music Lovers a Great Treat Next Thursday Evening.



---

8 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 4 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An event of prime importance will be the concert of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening November 8th, in Elmwood Music Hall. This concert, which is the first in Bessie Bellanca's "Musical Arts" series of five, will give to local music lovers the last opportunity to hear the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's direction as the great French conductor, in this his fifth season, completes his term and will return to France at the close of the season. It also affords to Buffalo concert-goers the opportunity to hear Mme. Charles Cahier, world-famous contralto, who, though an American by birth, has become the idol of the Vienese public, and indeed of all continental Europe. For four years the prima donna contralto of the Royal Opera of Vienna and for several years the leading contralto of the Wagner and Mozart festivals in Munich, she has won an enviable reputation. It is significant that Mme. Cahier has received more decorations and titles from European Royalty as a tribute to her superb art than any woman in the world. Mme. Cahier has the distinction of being hailed by the great Wilhelm Mangelberg as "the greatest living interpreter of Gustave Mahler's works." Mahler himself, and other great composers, including Grieg, Saint Saens and Strauss, have paid high tribute to the great contralto. Mme. Cahier's voice is one of amazing power and range, possessing a uniformly beautiful texture, and she possesses to an extraordinary degree the power to lift the spectator into a region of elemental passion.

The program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, under Mr. Monteux's direction will present is one of exceptional interest.

Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz" .... Weber

Symphony in E Minor, No. 1, Op. 39 .... Sibelius

1. Andante ma non troppe; Allegro energico.
2. Andante ma non troppe lento.
3. Allegro.
4. Finals (Quasi una Fantasia) Andante: Allegro molto.

(Intermission of ten minutes after the symphony).

Air, "Adieu, foret," from the Opera "Jeanne d'Arc" .... Tschaikowsky

"Dance of Salome," from the Music Drama "Salome" .... Strauss

"La Captive," Revery, Op. 12 (after Hugo) .... Berlioz

Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo, Symphonic poem No. 2 .... Liszt

Soloist, Madame Cahier.

Tickets for the concert may be ob Colonial Flower Shop, N

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 4

Mme. Gauthier and "Jazz"

Mme. Eva Gauthier's inclusion of some American "jazz" numbers by Berlin, Kern and Gershwin, with the latter at the piano, caused a good deal of preliminary comment on her recital in New York last week. The event came too late for mention in this department as to just what the "reaction" was to the novelty. Mme. Gauthier chose her "jazz" group to round out a programme of "Ancient and Modern Music," believing that they were "representative" and fitting. So Berlin, Kern and Gershwin found their names listed along with Bartok, Schonberg and Milhaud on a recital programme. Local concert-goers have also had their interest aroused by what is considered a rather daring innovation on the part of the Canadian mezzo-soprano. She will sing here at Churchill House on Monday evening, Nov. 19.

* * * *

Season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra series will go on sale tomorrow in the stationery store of The Shepard Company, the first concert coming on Nov. 20. The season is expected by music-lovers to be of exceptional interest, because it brings the culmination of Mr. Monteux's five-year work with the organization. This is his last season in Boston, after which Paris will claim him again. This week the orchestra takes its first long trip of the season, visiting Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh, two concerts being scheduled for the latter city. The soloist for the first Providence concert will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto.

* * *

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TEST
Romeike
PPINGS
ST., NEW YORK
lsea 8860
PING FROM FFALO,
N. Y.
IMES
1923

Orchestra.
e importance will be internationally cele phony Orchestra next November 8th, in Hall. This concert in Bessie Bellanca's ies of five, will give the last opportunity a under Pierre Mon-
, the great French his fifth season, com will return to France e season. It also af-concert-goers the op-
Mme. Charles Cahier,
ralto, who, though an
, has become the idol blic and indeed of all
. For four years the tralto of the Royal and for several years to of the Wagner and Munich, she has won tion. It is significant has received more dec-s from European Roy-to her superb art than e world. Mme. Cahier
of being hailed by the ngelberg as "the great-eter of Gustave Mahler himself, and other including Grieg, Saint auss, have paid high reat contralto. Mme
one of amazing powe sing a uniformly beau
she possesses to an gree the power to life
a region of elemental which the Boston Sym of 100 musicians, under ection will present i

interest.
Opera "Der Frei-
.... Weber
on, No. 1, Op. 39
.... Sibelius
non troppe; Allegr non troppe lento.
si una Fantasia) An gro molto.
ten minutes after th
mphony).
," from the Opera
e"........Tschaikovsk e," from the Music me"........... Straus very, Op. 12 (after
.... Berlio
e Trionfo, Sym-
No. 2............Lisz
adame Cahier.
concert may be o
Flower Shop, N
to

TEST
omeike
PINGS
NEW YORK
8860
ROM THE NCE
L
3 inclusion of some rs by Berlin, Kern

he latter at the eal of preliminary in New York last too late for men-as to just what the e novelty. Mme.
zz" group to round ncient and Modern the were "repre-
Berlin, Kern names listed g and Milhaud
e. Local concert-ir interest aroused rather daring in-the Canadian sing here in evening, Nov.

Boston Symphony
on sale to-morof The Shepard
coming on Nov.

d by music-interest, be-ation of Mr.
with the orast season in will claim him stra takes its visiting Alto and Pittscheduled for for the first grid Onegin,

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 4 - 1923

MUSICAL MENTION

Noted Soloists in Boston Symphony Concert

Pierre Monteux in his farewell season (for he is now completing his five year period as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) may well be heard at the highest degree of eloquence and performance to which the orchestra and leader have risen. The quality of the opening concerts in Boston confirm this prospect. Mr. Monteux has made a reputation and set a precedent as a program maker, and certain scores of importance which he plans to include upon his programs in Providence should lend unusual interest to this, the 43rd season of the orchestra.

The greatest of French conductors is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of the season where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting. He became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux Concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The Providence season will consist of five concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of November 20, December 11, January 22, February 26 and April 29. The soloists to appear at each concert are Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish, contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage, Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

The Second Steinert Series

Madam Schumann-Heink, who will sing at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18th, in the first concert of the second Steinert Series, has been before the public for 45 years. There are few singers who have reigned so long and with such complete sway over their audience than she, and each succeeding year sees the popularity of this wonder woman not only undiminished but increased.

Few artists in the history of music have been endowed with so many and such varied attributes that win the audiences as she has. Equally at home as a singer of songs or of operatic arias, the famous contralto gives the public the music it wants and at the same time upholds the high traditions of her art.

This unsurpassed artist was born in Bohemia of a Czecho-Slovak father and an Italian mother, and won her first fame in the Imperial Opera Houses of Vienna and Berlin. For many years she was a distinguished annual guest in the Wagner seasons at Beyreuth, continuing these visits even after becoming an American. Her first appearance in America was with the Metropolitan Opera Company, in which she was immediately placed in the highest rank by the press and public, a position which she has maintained ever since in opera and concert.

A striking exception to a general rule, Mme. Schumann-Heink insists that on her programs there shall be a liberal representation of American songs. Intensely American herself, she believes native composers have contributely richly to musical art and that no singer should ignore their works.

This marvelous singer stands to-day at the height of a most brilliant career. The voice has gained in expression while the power to satisfy her audiences is more potent and inescapable than before. Her voice is still that of the Schumann-Heink which has thrilled opera goers for more than half a century.

The two remaining concerts of the second series will be a concert Jan. 6th by Feodor Chaliapin and a violin recital 2nd by Efrem Zimbalist.

The last concert of the first series will be a piano recital by Vladimir DePachmann Nov. 25th.

The Triangle Chorus is composed of "Harmony" Male Chorus of Boston, Worcester Male Chorus, and "Verdandi" of Providence, making a chorus of nearly 100 voices.

These singers gave their first joint concerts last year, and met with such success that they decided to give three concerts annually. Consequently, the first concert was given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Columbus Day. The concert in Strand Theatre to-day will be the second of the series, and the third will be given in Worcester on Armistice Day.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 4 - 1923

Orchestral Plans.

Soloists with the Boston Symphony in its Thursday evening concerts at Carnegie Hall will include Sigrid Onegin, Richard Burgin and Moriz Rosenthal. In the Saturday afternoon series will appear Elizabeth Rethberg, Jean Bedetti and Jacques Thibaud. Five soloists for the Brooklyn Academy series are Mmes. Onegin and Rethberg, Messrs. Thibaud, Bedetti and Rosenthal.

John McCormack will sing with the State Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 19 at Carnegie Hall. An added soloist on Jan. 27 will be the pianist, Mitja Nikisch. Mr. Stransky will conduct a "educational" series starting Jan. 6 a the Brooklyn Commercial High School.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 4 1923

PROGRAM TALKS FEATURE ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

Added interest is given the orchestral concerts to be offered in Syria Mosque this season by the announcement of a series of "program talks" to be given by Charles Boyd, of the Pittsburgh Musical institute, 13 Bellefield ave., the night prior to each concert.

Thursday night at 8:30 Mr. Boyd will talk upon the program to be given by the Boston Symphony in the Mosque Friday night. Illustrations upon the piano will be demonstrated by Messrs. Russel and Oetting of the institute faculty. There is no charge for these lectures and the public is invited.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 4 - 1923

Soloists in Boston Symphony's Brooklyn Season

Pierre Monteux in his farewell season (for he is now completing the his 5-year period as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) may well be heard at the highest degree of eloquence and performance to which the orchestra and leader have risen. The quality of the opening concerts in Boston confirm this prospect. Mr. Monteux has made a reputation and set a precedent as a program maker, and certain scores of importance which he plans to include upon his programs in Brooklyn should lend unusual interest to this, the 43d season of the orchestra.

This greatest of French conductors is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of the season where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting. He became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The Brooklyn season will consist of five concerts in the Academy of Music on the Friday evenings of November 30, January 4, February 1, March 14 and April 4. The soloists to appear at each concert are Sigrid Onegin, the fine Swedish contralto, and Elizabeth Rethberg, the famous soprano, both of whom are leading singers at the Metropolitan Opera House. The pianist will be Moriz Rosenthal, the great European artist, who is returning to America after an absence of 17 years; Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 4 1923

Noted Conductor and Soloist To Appear With Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux, conductor, and Sigrid Onegin, soloist, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays in Syria mosque Friday night and Saturday matinee.

Pittsburgh's orchestra season will be opened Friday night with the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra numbering 104 musicians is recognized as one of the leading musical organizations of the day and its appearance in this city should be the signal for a brilliant assemblage.

Two concerts will be given, Friday night and Saturday matinee with Sigrid Onegin, soloist at both. The programs follow:

FRIDAY NIGHT.

No. 2 in E Minor, Opp 27 .... Rachmaninoff
Aria (Lament of Andromache), from Achilles .... Bruch
Variations on a Theme by Hayden, Op. 56a .... Brahms
Scene, Just God! and Aria, My Life Fades in its Blossom, from Rienzi .... Wagner Overture to Rienzi .... Wagner

SATURDAY MATINEE.

Ancient Dances and Airs (Freely arranged) .... Respighi
Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 92 .... Beethoven
Songs with Orchestra .... Shubert
  (a) Allmacht.
  (b) Erlkonig.
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
  (a) Clouds.
  (b) Festivals.
Aria, Ach nur einmal noch in Leben, from the Opera La Clemenza di Tito .... Mozart
Dance of Salome from the Music Drama, Salome .... Strauss

---

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 4 1923

Mme. Cahier, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming to the Elmwood Music Hall, November 8th.

15 Concert Boston

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
P/
Chronicle-Telegraph

NOV 5 1923

NOTED SINGER TO BE HEARD AT CONCERTS

ABOVE—MME. SIGRID ONEGIN
BELOW—PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux's reputation as a program maker of discrimination and catholicity is confirmed by the programs he has made for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be given in the Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. The interest of the occasion will be enhanced by the appearance as soloist of Mme. Sigrid Onegin, celebrated singer.

The Friday program will consist of the Second Symphony by Rachmaninoff, in E minor; Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the [illegible] Wagner's "Rienzi."

---

20 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 5 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Albany to-day, together with Pierre Monteux, their conductor, in readiness for their sole concert of the season here, which will be given in Harmanus Bleecker hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock sharp. Pierre Monteux and his illustrious orchestra will present the following program: Smetana's overture of "The Bartered Bride," Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major). Strauss's Dance of Salome from "Salome," and Saint-Saens's "Fourth Pianoforte Concerto" (in C minor) in which the piano soloist will be Sigismond Stojowski.

The event is given under the man[illegible] of Ben Franklin, and in the [illegible] attention will be called to [illegible] important musical treat [illegible] in the near fu- [illegible] left

---

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA

Intended for 17 Concert

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From COMMERCIAL
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays in City Thursday

Pierre Monteux's reputation as a program maker of discrimination and catholicity is confirmed by the program he has made for the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Elmwood Music hall, next Thursday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The interest of the occasion will be enhanced by the appearance as soloist of Madame Cahier, celebrated singer.

The principal number on the program will be the hauntingly melodious, First Symphony in D minor, by Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer. The concert will open with Weber's Overture to Der Frieschutz, a score notably for the quartet of hunting horns in it's opening measures. In mnay ways the most striking piece of the evening will be the Dance of the Seven Veils, from Richard Strauss' music drama Salome, based on the play of Oscar Wilde. This descriptive excerpt requires the fullest resources of the modern symphony orchestra. Madam Cahier will sing the air. Adieu foret from Jeanne d'Arc, and Berlioz's song, La Captive. The evening will close with Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Tasso.

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 5 1923
From
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

[illegible] program.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert tonight at Harmanus Bleecker hall with Pierre Monteuz conducing. The orchestra, consisting of more than one hundred men, will arrive in Albany this afternoon. The concert is expected to attract a large audience of music lovers from all over The Capitol District, and the program already announced assures a delightful evening. Seats are on sale at the Hall and there are good locations available at all prices. The concert is under the management of Ben Franklin.

BY ATTEST

[illegible]l Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
7 1923

Boston Symphony Here This Week

When Sigred Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, made her debut in New York, the critics pronounced her one of the greatest singers who has arrived from Europe in many years. Mme. Onegin is the soloist to be heard with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, and her appearance here bids fair to create a stir in musical circles.

The program for the symphony numbers will be analyzed tomorrow night at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

---

6 Concert Boston

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS

NOV 7 -1923

Box Parties for Concert.

An event of social and musical importance will be the opening of the symphony season Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Syria mosque. The Boston Symphony orchestra and Sigrid Onegin, Metropolitan grand opera contralto, will attract a brilliant audience. Among the box holders for the concerts this week, which are under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, are Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. E. W. Mudge, Mrs. T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. R. B. Kernohan, Mrs. John Freeman, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Dr. E. A. Weiss, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Joseph W. Marsh, Mrs. H. P. Davis, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, W. A. Herron, Mrs. William McKelvy, Mrs. Frederick W. Winter, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Roy H. Davis, Dr. Ellen Patterson, J. E. Crowley, Mrs. R. E. Hellmund, Mrs. R. J. Cleland, Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. George F. Wood-Smith, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Helen Hassler, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. W. N. Frew, James J. Turner, Mrs. O. D. Thompson, Mrs. James Todd, Mrs. W. E. Frick, Mrs. Charles Ramsburg, Mrs. George H. Hutchinson, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. John A. Kerr, Mrs. J. H. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. Paul Straub, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Carl Cosolowsky and Mrs. E. J. House. Mrs. Joseph A. Herron of Monongahela is entertaining a box party at the Saturday matinee, and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski of Steubenville, O., is hostess for a party of 15 from that city. Mrs. D. C. Lindley and Mrs. Allan W. Urmson, from New Castle, will also entertain a box party.

---

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph

7 1923

Concert Boxholders Announced.

Among the boxholders for the concerts to be held Friday night and Saturday afternoon in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sigrid Onegin, Metropolitan Grand Opera contralto, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, are: Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. E. W. Mudge, Mrs. T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. R. B. Kernohan, Mrs. John Freeman, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Dr. E. A. Weiss, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Joseph W. Marsh, Mrs. H. P. Davis, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, W. A. Herron, Mrs. William McKelvy, Mrs. Frederick W. Winter, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Roy H. Davis, Dr. Ellen Patterson, J. E. Crowley, Mrs. R. E. Hellmund, Mrs. R. J. Cleland, Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. George F. Wood-Smith, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Miss Helen Hassler, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. W. N. Frew, James J. Turner, Mrs. O. D. Thompson, Mrs. James Todd, Mrs. W. E. Frick, Mrs. Charles Ramsburg, Mrs. George H. Hutchinson, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. John A. Kerr, Mrs. J. H. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. Paul Straub, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Carl Cosolowsky and Mrs. E. J. House. Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, of Monongahela, is entertaining a box party at the Saturday matinee and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski, of Steubenville, O., is hostess for a party of 15 from that city. Mrs. D. C. Lindley and Mrs. Allan W. Urmson, of New Castle, will also entertain a box party.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 7 1923

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With Pierre Monteux, conductor and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall tomorrow night under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Charles Cahier, world-famous contralto will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu, foret" from Tschaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E minor" of Sebilius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing admirably the melancholy of the oppressed people of bleak Finland.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony—Mme Cahier concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels or at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

SEWERAGE CONTRACTS

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 1923

Comparatively few cities can support a symphony orchestra, but in many it would be possible to organize a smaller orchestra complete in instrumentation, something along the lines of the Boston Symphony Ensemble. In any event, there is room for the improvement of our smaller orchestras, and there is reason to believe that the New England Conservatory of Music will accomplish something helpful and practical in the new courses which it has recently established for the development of small orchestras, for the training of musicians to play in them and of conductors to lead them. At any rate, the experiment is one which it will be interesting to watch.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SYRACUSE
N. Y.
POST STANDARD

7 1923

Boston Symphony Here.

Boston Symphony orchestra, 110 players, passed through Syracuse by special train yesterday, bound from Boston to Ithaca where a concert was given last night.

15 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph

NOV 5 1923

NOTED SINGER TO BE HEARD AT CONCERTS

ABOVE—MME. SIGRID ONEGIN
BELOW—PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux's reputation as a program maker of discrimination and catholicity is confirmed by the programs he has made for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be given in the Syria Mosque Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. The interest of the occasion will be enhanced by the appearance as soloist of Mme. Sigrid Onegin, celebrated singer.

The Friday program will consist of the Second Symphony by Rachmaninoff, in E minor; Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the [illegible] Wagner's "Rienzi."

---

20 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ALBANY
N. Y.
JOURNAL

NOV 5 1923

FRANKLIN CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Albany to-day, together with Pierre Monteux, their conductor, in readiness for their sole concert of the season here, which will be given in Harmanus Bleecker hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock sharp. Pierre Monteux and his illustrious orchestra will present the following program: Smetana's overture of "The Bartered Bride," Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Strauss's Dance of Salome from "Salome," and Saint-Saens's "Fourth Pianoforte Concerto" (in C minor) in which the piano soloist will be Sigismund Stojowski.

The event is given under the management of Ben Franklin, and in the [illegible] attention will be called to [illegible] important musical treat [illegible] near fu- [illegible] left

---

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA

Intended for 12 Concert

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK

CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From COMMERCIAL
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 5 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays in City Thursday

Pierre Monteux's reputation as a program maker of discrimination and catholicity is confirmed by the program he has made for the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Elmwood Music hall, next Thursday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. The interest of the occasion will be enhanced by the appearance as soloist of Madame Cahier, celebrated singer.

The principal number on the program will be the hauntingly melodious, First Symphony in D minor, by Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer. The concert will open with Weber's Overture to Der Frieschutz, a score notably for the quartet of hunting horns in it's opening measures. In mnay ways the most striking piece of the evening will be the Dance of the Seven Veils, from Richard Strauss' music drama Salome, based on the play of Oscar Wilde. This descriptive excerpt requires the fullest resources of the modern symphony orchestra. Madam Cahier will sing the air. Adieu foret from Jeanne d'Arc, and Berlioz's song, La Captive. The evening will close with Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Tasso.

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 5 1923
From
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
Albany, N. Y.

program.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert tonight at Harmanus Bleecker hall with Pierre Monteuz conducing. The orchestra, consisting of more than one hundred men, will arrive in Albany this afternoon. The concert is expected to attract a large audience of music lovers from all over The Capitol District, and the program already announced assures a delightful evening. Seats are on sale at the Hall and there are good locations available at all prices. The concert is under the management of Ben Franklin.

BY ATTEST

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN

7 1923

Boston Symphony Here This Week

When Sigred Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, made her debut in New York, the critics pronounced her one of the greatest singers who has arrived from Europe in many years. Mme. Onegin is the soloist to be heard with the Boston Symphony orchestra at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, and her appearance here bids fair to create a stir in musical circles.

The program for the symphony numbers will be analyzed tomorrow night at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

---

6 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS

NOV 7 - 1923

Box Parties for Concert.

An event of social and musical importance will be the opening of the symphony season Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Syria mosque. The Boston Symphony orchestra and Sigrid Onegin, Metropolitan grand opera contralto, will attract a brilliant audience. Among the box holders for the concerts this week, which are under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, are Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. E. W. Mudge, Mrs. T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. R. B. Kernohan, Mrs. John Freeman, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Dr. E. A. Weiss, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Joseph W. Marsh, Mrs. H. P. Davis, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, W. A. Herron, Mrs. William McKelvy, Mrs. Frederick W. Winter, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Roy H. Davis, Dr. Ellen Patterson, J. E. Crowley, Mrs. R. E. Hellmund, Mrs. R. J. Cleland, Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. George F. Wood-Smith, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Helen Hassler, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. W. N. Frew, James J. Turner, Mrs. O. D. Thompson, Mrs. James Todd, Mrs. W. E. Frick, Mrs. Charles Ramsburg, Mrs. George H. Hutchinson, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. John A. Kerr, Mrs. J. H. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. Paul Straub, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Carl Cosolowsky and Mrs. E. J. House. Mrs. Joseph A. Herron of Monongahela is entertaining a box party at the Saturday matinee, and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski of Steubenville, O., is hostess for a party of 15 from that city. Mrs. D. C. Lindley and Mrs. Allan W. Urmson, from New Castle, will also entertain a box party.

---

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph

7 1923

Concert Boxholders Announced.

Among the boxholders for the concerts to be held Friday night and Saturday afternoon in Syria Mosque by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Sigrid Onegin, Metropolitan Grand Opera contralto, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, are: Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. E. W. Mudge, Mrs. T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. R. B. Kernohan, Mrs. John Freeman, Mrs. R. R. Huggins, Mrs. Charles A. Dickson, Dr. E. A. Weiss, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Joseph W. Marsh, Mrs. H. P. Davis, Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson, W. A. Herron, Mrs. William McKelvy, Mrs. Frederick W. Winter, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Alfred Hunt, Mrs. Roy Hunt, Mrs. D. E. Jackman, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Roy H. Davis, Dr. Ellen Patterson, J. E. Crowley, Mrs. R. E. Hellmund, Mrs. R. J. Cleland, Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. George F. Wood-Smith, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Charles Bruckman, Miss Helen Hassler, Mrs. John F. Casey, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. W. N. Frew, James J. Turner, Mrs. O. D. Thompson, Mrs. James Todd, Mrs. W. E. Frick, Mrs. Charles Ramsburg, Mrs. George H. Hutchinson, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. McCague, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. John A. Kerr, Mrs. J. H. Davidson, Mrs. H. V. Blaxter, Mrs. Paul Straub, Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. John S. Sloan, Mrs. Carl Cosolowsky and Mrs. E. J. House. Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, of Monongahela, is entertaining a box party at the Saturday matinee and Mrs. S. J. Podlewski, of Steubenville, O., is hostess for a party of 15 from that city. Mrs. D. C. Lindley and Mrs. Allan W. Urmson, of New Castle, will also entertain a box party.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER

NOV 7 1923

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With Pierre Monteux, conductor and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music hall tomorrow night under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Charles Cahier, world-famous contralto will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu, foret" from Tschaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E minor" of Sebilius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing admirably the melancholy of the oppressed people of bleak Finland.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony—Mme Cahier concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels or at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

SEWERAGE CONTRACTS

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOWELL
MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1923

Comparatively few cities can support a symphony orchestra, but in many it would be possible to organize a smaller orchestra complete in instrumentation, something along the lines of the Boston Symphony Ensemble. In any event, there is room for the improvement of our smaller orchestras, and there is reason to believe that the New England Conservatory of Music will accomplish something helpful and practical in the new courses which it has recently established for the development of small orchestras, for the training of musicians to play in them and of conductors to lead them. At any rate, the experiment is one which it will be interesting to watch.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SYRACUSE
N. Y.
POST STANDARD

7 1923

Boston Symphony Here.

Boston Symphony orchestra, 110 players, passed through Syracuse by special train yesterday, bound from Boston to Ithaca where a concert was given last night.

[141]

13 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER

NOV 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS CONCERT TONIGHT

With Pierre Monteux, conductor, and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard in Elmwood Music hall tonight under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Cahier, world-famous contralto, will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu foret," from Tschaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E minor" of Sibelius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing admirably the melancholy of the oppressed people of bleak Finland.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony-Mme. Cahier concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, or at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

---

3 concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST

NOV 8 1923

PROGRAM ANALYZED

Tonight at 8:30 o'clock, in the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Charles N. Boyd will analyze the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon. Piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. The Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E minor, which is the principal work for Friday night, and the Beethoven Symphony in A major, No. 7, the Saturday afternoon work, will be illustrated, as well as other numbers on both programs. Sigrid Onegin, the Metropolitan grand opera contralto, will be soloist at both Friday night and Saturday afternoon concerts. The lecture tonight is free to the public and all interested persons are invited.

---

5 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 8 1923

Boston Symphony Event Today

With Pierre Monteux, conductor, and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow night under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Charles Cahier, world famous contralto will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu, foret" from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E Minor" of Sibelius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing adimirably the melancholy of the oppressed pople of bleak Finland.

The Dance of Salome," from Richard Strauss' music-drama, "Salome," will also be given by the orchestra.

Mme. Cahier, assisting artist with the orchestra, is an American-born singer, who has achieved a position of unrivaled supremacy in Europe during the last 18

Tickets for the Boston Symphony-Mme. Cahier concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, or at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware Avenue.

---

4 Concert Boston

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN

NOV 8 1923

Symphony Season Opens Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburgh since 1919, and indications are that they will be welcomed with two capacity audiences this week. The orchestra comes to Pittsburgh with 103 players, and Sigrid Onegin, the leading contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as soloist.

The program for Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be different, and the numbers to be played will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with two and four-hand piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and W H. Oetting. The symphony for tomorrow night is Rachmaninoff's No. 2 in E minor, and for the Saturday matinee, the Beethoven No. 7 in A major. At the Friday night concert Mme. Onegin will sing Bruch's Aria from "Achilles," and Wagner's Scene "Just God," and Aria "My Life Fades in its Blossom" from Rienzi. At the Saturday matinee she will sing "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig" by Schubert, and Mozart's Aria from the opera "Titus."

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
NOV 8 1923

SYMPHONY SEASON HERE OPENS TOMORROW NIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon

t Syria Mosque. This orchestra has ot been heard in Pittsburgh since 919. The orchestra has 103 players, and Sigrid Onegin, the leading contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as soloist. The programs for Friday night and Saturlay afternoon will be different and the numbers to be played will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with two and four-hand piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

Globe Nov 11

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, fifth program. Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Spring Festival," Roussel (first time here); airs from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Berlioz' "L'enfance du Christ," and two Negro Spirituals, "Go Down Moses," and "By and By"; "Night on Bald Mountain," Musorgsky. Soloist Roland Hayes.

Sunday, Nov 18, at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert. Wagner program: "Huldigunga March," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tannhauser" (prelude to act 3) and (Bacchanale, act 1, scene 1), "Die Meistersinger" (act 3, prelude, "Dance of the Apprentices," "Homage to Hans Sachs"), "Parsifal" (prelude), "Die Waldure" (act 3, "Ride of the Valkyries"), "Siegfried" (act 2, "Forest Murmurs") and (act 3, scene 2 "Siegfried's Passing Through the Fire to Brunnhilde's Rock"), "Gotterdammerung" ("Morning Dawn—Siegfried's Journey Up the Rhine—Close"), all by Wagner.

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA
Intended for 29 Concert
"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."
HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE NEW YORK"
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From COMMERCIAL
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 9 1923

Boston Orchestra Delights Audience

Musical Arts Series Opens with Splendid Entertainment

Making his last appearance in Buffalo last night, Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, opening the Musical Arts series in Elmwood Music hall. Bessie Bellanca was Buffalo manager. The eminent conductor will return to Europe at the close of the present season.

Mme. Charles Cahier, declared by Grieg and Mahler to be the greatest living contralto, made a lasting impression on her first visit to Buffalo. The fullness of her voice is thrilling and her singing of the Berloiz number, Le Captive, won her a special ovation.

In conducting the overture to Weber's Der Freischutz, Monteux revealed the fine technique of the ideal director. In the Sibelios Symphony in E Minor, No. 1, he painted a series of tonal pictures that were tinted with daintiest shadings and brought together at the close in richer color.

The Dance of Salome by Strauss captured the audience from the first, the lively airs, tuneful symphony and the engaging spirit of abandon that predominated, offering a diversion from the other selections.

Mme. Cahier attracted particular favor in her interpretation of the song Adieu, Foret, from Jeanne d'Arc, bringing showers of applause from every corner of the hall. She is an artist superbly equipped in the interpretation of song.

---

12 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER

NOV 9 1923

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

Symphony Concert Adds to Laurels of Organization.

CONDUCTOR'S FINAL BOW

The first concert in the Musical Arts series, Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, took place at Elmwood Music hall last evening when the Boston symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. The occasion was also notable for the final appearance here of Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season. This eminent conductor has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying

---

Globe Nov 11

The appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston as well as Cambridge this week sets a precedent and furnishes an example. Mr Hayes has long deserved this honor. There are no doubt many other American negroes who with his patience and his musical brain could profitably cultivate beautiful natural voices. He is to sing with the orchestra a Mozart air, which he should do exquisitely to judge by his Mozart, sining in recitals here; and two negro spirituals.

---

27 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 9 1923

Music in

By EDWARD

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, paid Buffalo its single visit of the season last night, giving, in Elmwood Music hall, a program so rich in musical value and variety that every individual in the large audience must have counted the evening a signal, memorable experience. Happily associated with the brilliant Boston organization was Madame Charles Cahier, eminent contralto, who, as soloist of the evening, effected a triumphant local debut.

The orchestral portion of the program comprised the familiar Overture to Weber's greatest work, the opera "Der Freischutz," the Sibelius First Symphony in E minor, the Dance of Salome, from Strauss' music drama, and Liszt's second symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mr. Monteux, in his period of service, has given the Boston Symphony a new lease of life; has made of the orchestra a glorious instrument upon which to play. It is an orchestra of well-nigh matchless smoothness and precision, beautiful, sonorous tone, and a pliability which makes possible the finest adjustment of ensemble.

The Weber Overture, the opening number, was given a brilliant, spirited performance, lucid, clean-cut, stirring in its final climax. But interest centered, and most naturally so, in the Sibelius symphony, the "Finnish," a work little known to local audiences. The composer of the north has given the world a masterpiece in this truly racial work. Throughout its four movements the flavor of the soil prevails, the spirit of a people is expressed.

It is vital, rugged, rhapsodic music for the most part, and in his unusual scoring the composer has stressed the element of realism. He has not succeeded in being entirely original, however. The careful listener will hear in this work strains which bear striking resemblance to music of Tschaikowsky and will note other fragments which call to mind the style of Liszt.

As was to be expected, Mr. Monteux led his men through a performance as illuminating as it was ravishing. From the simple utterance of the melodious introductory theme on through the sturdy Allegro with its impressive climax; through the exquisite melody of the Andante; the almost barbarous splendor of the Scherzo, and the impassioned Finale

---

Adver. Nov 17

Danish Gymnasts at Symphony Hall

Sir Niels Bukh, the Walter Camp of Denmark and originator of the system of physical education known as primitive gymnastics, which a United States commissioner of education recently stated "makes anything that we have in America look like a joke," comes to Boston tomorrow evening. He will be presented at Symphony Hall by the Playground and Recreation Association of America.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening includes: Dvorak's Symphony in D minor, Roussel's "Springtime Festival and Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain." Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will sing arias from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," and two Spirituals, "Go Down, Moses," and "By-and-By."

[142]

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER

NOV 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS CONCERT TONIGHT

With Pierre Monteux, conductor, and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard in Elmwood Music hall tonight under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Cahier, world-famous contralto, will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu foret," from Tschaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E minor" of Sibelius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing admirably the melancholy of the oppressed people of bleak Finland.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony-Mme. Cahier concert may be obtained at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, or at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
POST

NOV 8 1923

PROGRAM ANALYZED

Tonight at 8:30 o'clock, in the Pittsburgh Musical Institute, Charles N. Boyd will analyze the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orcnestra at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon. Piano illustrations will be given by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting. The Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E minor, which is the principal work for Friday night, and the Beethoven Symphony in A major, No. 7, the Saturday afternoon work, will be illustrated, as well as other numbers on both programs. Sigrid Onegin, the Metropolitan grand opera contralto, will be soloist at both Friday night and Saturday afternoon concerts. The lecture tonight is free to the public and all interested persons are invited.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES

8 1923

Boston Symphony Event Today

With Pierre Monteux, conductor, and an ensemble of 104 musicians, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow night under the management of Bessie Bellanca. Mme. Charles Cahier, world famous contralto will be the soloist, singing the aria "Adieu, foret" from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Jeanne d'Arc." The orchestra will present the "Symphony in E Minor" of Sibelius, the Finnish poet-composer, a work expressing adimirably the melancholy of the oppressed pople of bleak Finland.

"[illegible] Dance of Salome," from Richard [illegible]' music-drama, "Salome," will also be [illegible] by the orchestra.

[illegible] Cahier, assisting artist with the [illegible]ra, is an American-born singer, [illegible] has achieved a position of unrivaled [illegible]macy in Europe during the last 18 [illegible]

[illegible]ets for the Boston Symphony-Mme. [illegible] concert may be obtained at Den[illegible] [illegible]ottier & Daniels, or at the Colonial [illegible] Shop, No. 230 Delaware Avenue.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN

NOV 8 1923

Symphony Season Opens Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburgh since 1919, and indications are that they will be welcomed with two capacity audiences this week. The orchestra comes to Pittsburgh with 103 players, and Sigrid Onegin, the leading contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as soloist.

The program for Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be different, and the numbers to be played will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with two and four-hand piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and W H. Oetting. The symphony for tomorrow night is Rachmaninoff's No. 2 in E minor, and for the Saturday matinee, the Beethoven No. 7 in A major. At the Friday night concert Mme. Onegin will sing Bruch's Aria from "Achilles," and Wagner's Scene "Just God," and Aria "My Life Fades in its Blossom" from Rienzi. At the Saturday matinee she will sing "Allmacht" and "Erlkonig" by Schubert, and Mozart's Aria from the opera "Titus."

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
NOV 8 1923

SYMPHONY SEASON HERE OPENS TOMORROW NIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburgh since 1919. The orchestra has 103 players, and Sigrid Onegin, the leading contralto of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, as soloist. The programs for Friday night and Saturday afternoon will be different and the numbers to be played will be analyzed tonight at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd, with two and four-hand piano illustrations by Dallmeyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

Globe Nov 11

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, fifth program. Second Symphony, Dvorak; "Spring Festival," Roussel (first time here); airs from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Berlioz' "L'enfance du Christ," and two Negro Spirituals, "Go Down Moses," and "By and By"; "Night on Bald Mountain," Musorgsky. Soloist Roland Hayes.

Sunday, Nov 18, at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund concert. Wagner program: "Huldigunga March," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tannhauser" (prelude to act 3) and (Bacchanale, act 1, scene 1). "Die Meistersinger" (act 3, prelude, "Dance of the Apprentices," "Homage to Hans Sachs"), "Parsifal" (prelude). "Die Waldure" (act 3, "Ride of the Valkyries"), "Siegfried" (act 2, "Forest Murmurs") and (act 3, scene 2 "Siegfried's Passing Through the Fire to Brunnhilde's Rock"), "Gotterdammerung" ("Morning Dawn—Siegfried's Journey Up the Rhine—Close"), all by Wagner.

TELEPHONE 8860 CHELSEA

Intended for 29 Concert

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us,
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From COMMERCIAL
Address: Buffalo, N. Y.
Date NOV 9 1923

Boston Orchestra Delights Audience

Musical Arts Series Opens with Splendid Entertainment

Making his last appearance in Buffalo last night, Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra, opening the Musical Arts series in Elmwood Music hall. Bessie Bellanca was Buffalo manager. The eminent conductor will return to Europe at the close of the present season.

Mme. Charles Cahier, declared by Grieg and Mahler to be the greatest living contralto, made a lasting impression on her first visit to Buffalo. The fullness of her voice is thrilling and her singing of the Berloiz number, Le Captive, won her a special ovation.

In conducting the overture to Weber's Der Freischutz, Monteux revealed the fine technique of the ideal director. In the Sibelios Symphony in E Minor, No. 1, he painted a series of tonal pictures that were tinted with daintiest shadings and brought together at the close in richer color.

The Dance of Salome by Strauss captured the audience from the first, the lively airs, tuneful symphony and the engaging spirit of abandon that predominated, offering a diversion from the other selections.

Mme. Cahier attracted particular favor in her interpretation of the song Adieu, Foret, from Jeanne d'Arc, bringing showers of applause from every corner of the hall. She is an artist superbly equipped in the interpretation of song.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO,
N. Y.
COURIER

NOV 9 1923

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

Symphony Concert Adds to Laurels of Organization.

CONDUCTOR'S FINAL BOW

The first concert in the Musical Arts series, Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, took place at Elmwood Music hall last evening when the Boston symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. The occasion was also notable for the final appearance here of Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season. This eminent conductor has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying

---

Globe Nov 11

The appearance of Roland Hayes as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston as well as Cambridge this week sets a precedent and furnishes an example. Mr Hayes has long deserved this honor. There are no doubt many other American negroes who with his patience and his musical brain could profitably cultivate beautiful natural voices. He is to sing with the orchestra a Mozart air, which he should do exquisitely, to judge by his Mozart, sining in recitals here, and two negro spirituals.

---

7 Concert

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 9 1923

Music in

By EDWARD

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, paid Buffalo its single visit of the season last night, giving, in Elmwood Music hall, a program so rich in musical value and variety that every individual in the large audience must have counted the evening a signal, memorable experience. Happily associated with the brilliant Boston organization was Madame Charles Cahier, eminent contralto, who, as soloist of the evening, effected a triumphant local debut.

The orchestral portion of the program comprised the familiar Overture to Weber's greatest work, the opera, "Der Freischutz," the Sibelius First Symphony in E minor, the Dance of Salome, from Strauss' music drama, and Liszt's second symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mr. Monteux, in his period of service, has given the Boston Symphony a new lease of life; has made of the orchestra a glorious instrument upon which to play. It is an orchestra of well-nigh matchless smoothness and precision, beautiful, sonorous tone, and a pliability which makes possible the finest adjustment of ensemble.

The Weber Overture, the opening number, was given a brilliant, spirited performance, lucid, clean-cut, stirring in its final climax. But interest centered, and most naturally so, in the Sibelius symphony, the "Finnish," a work little known to local audiences. The composer of the north has given the world a masterpiece in this truly racial work. Throughout its four movements the flavor of the soil prevails, the spirit of a people is expressed.

It is vital, rugged, rhapsodic music for the most part, and in his unusual scoring the composer has stressed the element of realism. He has not succeeded in being entirely original, however. The careful listener will hear in this work strains which bear striking resemblance to music of Tschaikowsky and will note other fragments which call to mind the style of Liszt.

As was to be expected, Mr. Monteux led his men through a performance as illuminating as it was ravishing. From the simple utterance of the melodious introductory theme on through the sturdy Allegro with its impressive climax; through the exquisite melody of the Andante; the almost barbarous splendor of the Scherzo, and the impassioned Finale

---

Adver. Nov 17.

Danish Gymnasts at Symphony Hall

Sir Niels Bukh, the Walter Camp of Denmark and originator of the system of physical education known as primitive gymnastics, which a United States commissioner of education recently stated "makes anything that we have in America look like a joke," comes to Boston tomorrow evening. He will be presented at Symphony Hall by the Playground and Recreation Association of America

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening includes: Dvorak's Symphony in D minor, Roussel's "Springtime Festival and Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain." Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will sing arias from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," and two Spirituals, "Go Down, Moses." and "By-and-By."

Post Nov 11

MONDAY SYMPHONIES

The Monday evening series of Boston Symphony Concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will be given this year on the following dates: Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7.

A group of soloists of particular interest has been engaged. Probably the most unusual of them will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in the music of the harpsichord. She is coming to America for the first time from Europe where her reputation for the revival of the ancient music for this instrument has made her a conspicuous figure. There will be two virtuosos of the more modern descendant of the harpischord—Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox. Mr. Arrau of the younger generation and a comparatively newcomer, is of Chilian birth. In the early part of his career, when still very young, he went to Europe to study under the foremost masters. During the years between 1918 and 1920 he made extensive tours through Europe and in 1921 returned to tour his native South America. He is visiting this country for the first time.

Another young soloist of interest will be Cecilia Hansen, violinist, who is likewise undertaking her first American [illegible] Miss Hansen is of Finnish ori[illegible] and studied under Leopold Auer. The singer of the series will be Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano. Miss Gauthier is likewise to be soloist [illegible] series of the

---

Post Nov 11

Boston Symphony Programme

The following programme will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Roussel's Springtime Festival and Moussourgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain."

As soloist Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, will appear with the orchestra in an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and an aria from Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," and the two Negro spirituals, "Go Down Moses" and "By-and-By."

Adver Nov 11

PENSION FUND BILL

The following program from Wagner [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in aid of its Pension Fund, next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall: "Huldigungs March," "A Siegfried Idyll," third act prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," selections from "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" prelude, "Ride of the Valkyries," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Adver Nov 11

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this year on December 3, January 14, February 4, March 10 and April 7. The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in harpsichord music; Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox, pianists; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, now on her first American tour, and Eva Gauthier, mezzo soprano. The subscription sale opens tomorrow.

~~Providence~~ Jour Nov 18

The orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

Providence Jour Nov 18

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Traum

---

Providence Jour Nov 11

FATHER AND SON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, shows his son Claude how the watch works, making an effective "Father and Son Week" picture.

Moniter Nov 17

Music News and

Roland Hayes Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D Minor.
Mozart, Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"
Berlioz, "Repose of the Holy Family"
Roussel, "La Ville Rose," No. 2 of "Evocations"; Two Negro Spirituals.
Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve."

Roland Hayes was the soloist.

Roussel's "La Ville Rose" was played for the first time in Boston. It is a curious and interesting study in orchestral coloring. As is often to be observed in the music of the composer's contemporaries, the melodic element is often rudimentary, and mere repetition, at times literal and at others with slight alterations, is relied on. This is not thematic development in the old sense, and perhaps for this we should be grateful, but in discarding it, can it truly be said that "the moderns" (but perhaps by now Roussel should not be so classed) have substituted anything better therefor?

In fact, this touches on a real weakness in the greater part of the music of our time. In spite of its greater harmonic richness and variety, in spite of its greater rhythmical freedom (for it is gradually freeing itself from the restraints of meter), its melodic structure is assuredly poorly developed and fragmentary. In this sense (a point easily to be noted in this piece of Roussel's and in Dukas' "La Péri," recently played) this music is old-fashioned; and old-fashioned in the worst sense of the term, for this mechanical repetition of melodic fragments, and this reliance on so-called "passage work," are the trademark of the Steibelts, the Dusseks and the Kalkbrenners of musical composition, certainly decked out in gay orchestral trappings yet beneath essentially the same.

The same fault in musical construction may perhaps be observed in Moussorgsky's "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (in this case undoubtedly due to the composer's lack of technic) except that here the thematic material is more striking and withstands the treatment better. Poor drawing is never made up for by brilliant coloring. For this reason Dvořák's symphony, although not great music in any sense of the term, will outlive music of the type of Roussel's "La Ville Rose." From a merely personal point of view Roussel's composition is many times more interesting, more stimulating to the imagination, yet its weaknesses cannot be glossed over.

Roland Hayes was at his best in the aria by Berlioz, at his worst in that by Mozart. Of the music of Berlioz, it is difficult to conceive a better rendering. Its idyllic charm, its artless simplicity, the note of mystical tenderness beneath it all, were admirably caught and brought out by the singer. Strangely enough (for Mr. Hayes is a versatile singer in all styles) the Mozartian spirit was lacking yesterday. There was no elegance in the turning of the phrases, which were often stiff and mannered. The Negro Spirituals (no doubt excellently done) suffer in a symphony concert. To be properly heard they must be sung by a group of Negroes, as the Fisk Jubilee Singers. With orchestral accompaniment, and sung by a single singer, they are but pale and sophisticated in comparison with the originals.

S. M.

Enrico Tramonti Soloist

Globe Nov 18

SYMPHONY HALL—Today, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Bacchanale and Prelude to Act 3 of "Tannhauser"; Isolde's Narrative from Act 1 of "Tristan and Isolde"; "A Siegfried Idyl"; "Brunhilde's Immolation" from Act 3 of "Goetterdammerung"; "Forest Murmurs" from Act 2 of "Siegfried"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3 of "Die Walkuere"; all by Wagner. Soloist, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto.

Globe Nov 18

Mme Matzenauer's generous willing[illegible] to sing at the Boston Symphony [illegible]stra's Wagner concert this after[illegible] the entire receipts of which will [illegible] the pension fund for retired mem[illegible] of the orchestra, has caused some [illegible] in the program announced last [illegible] She will sing Isolde's narrative [illegible] act one of "Tristan and Brunn[illegible] immolation from act three of "Goetterdammerung." Her remarkably fine performance of the latter number at a pair of Symphony concerts two years ago is still vividly remembered by many. It induced at least one supposedly jaded reviewer to go again on a Saturday evening, when he might have staid at home, after hearing her Friday. Mr Monteux has arranged a program which should insure a capacity audience.

Globe Nov 18

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra sixth program. First symphony, Mahler; fantasia on a theme by Tallis, Vaughan Williams; suite, "Pelleas," Faure; dances [illegible] "Prince Igor," Borodin. There is

---

Providence Journal Nov 18

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the ballet is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale, may be read in Mr. Hale's programme-notes. Here it will suffice to say that this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic, imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture to the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation or summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

Providence Jour Nov 18

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

Herald Nov 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following program will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 23 and 24, in Symphony hall: The First Symphony of Mahler, D major, which has never been performed in Boston; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for strings; Gabriel Faure's Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Transcript [illegible] 1923

MONTEUX MAKES NEW PLACE FOR MAHLER'S MUSIC

PARIS, RUSSIA, ENGLAND SET IN CONTRASTS

A Symphony Foreshadowing the Composer—Faure's Haze About Maeterlinck—Vaughan Williams's Fine-Textured Variations—Borodin's Leaps and Bounds

NOT all the subscribers were in their usual places at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon; while in the second balcony of Symphony Hall the influx of the day by no means filled every seat. Not too hearty was the applause at the intervals in Mahler's First Symphony, though at the end it sufficed, with a little labor, to recall the conductor twice and, finally, to bring the orchestra to its feet. By these signs, the time is past wherein his Fifth Symphony could be played at three pairs of concerts between an April and a February, on each occasion to an acclaiming audience, or his Second Symphony be twice heard and applauded within a single fortnight. Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux did well to lead Mahler back to Bostonian ears.

Above any predecessor, the conductor has made the Symphony Concerts catholic and cosmopolitan. Rightly, he has counted it obligation to keep his hearers informed as to music in current vogue in Europe. There, since the end of the German war, Mahler has come into new place. Beethoven and Brahms remain the standard symphonists of German and Austrian concert-halls. Next to them, however, alike with conductors and audiences, now stand Mahler and Bruckner. In Holland, in Scandinavia, Mahler's Symphonies are no strange new thing; while oftener and oftener English reviewers would have them bidden into British concert-halls. From Amsterdam eastward "Mahler Festivals" recur; while annually recalcitrant New York, if it would hear Mr. Mengelberg, must also hear Mahler. Within easy memory, a few conductors—Mr. Mengelberg persistently, Dr. Muck and Mr. Stokowski intermittently, Nikisch semi-occasionally, laid Mahler before indifferent audiences. Now in not a few European cities, it is the public that demands him.

This vogue aside, Mahler's music has intrinsic titles to performance. He wrote nine Symphonies, all of which still pass current; while no more than four perpetuate Sibelius; two, Elgar; two, D'Indy; one, Rakhmaninov; one, Saint-Saëns. Since Beethoven, only Bruckner has been so prolific symphonically. Moreover, whatever the faults and the failures, however cold or warm they may leave the ear, Mahler's Symphonies are a highly individual music.

SYMPHONY MONDAY

The third annual series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given this year in Symphony hall, on Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7. Regular symphony programs will be played with no duplications from the regular series of the same season.

The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, the harpsichordist of high European reputation, who is making her first visit to America; Cecilia Hansen, the talented Finnish violinist, who likewise is now on her first American tour; Claudio Arrau, the much-praised Chilean pianist; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo-soprano, well known in Boston from numerous appearances, and Felix Fox, pianist.

[143]

Post Nov 11

MONDAY SYMPHONIES

The Monday evening series of Boston Symphony Concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will be given this year on the following dates: Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7.

A group of soloists of particular interest has been engaged. Probably the most unusual of them will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in the music of the harpsichord. She is coming to America for the first time from Europe where her reputation for the revival of the ancient music for this instrument has made her a conspicuous figure. There will be two virtuosos of the more modern descendant of the harpischord—Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox. Mr. Arrau of the younger generation and a comparatively new comer, is of Chilian birth. In the early part of his career, when still very young, he went to Europe to study under the foremost masters. During the years between 1918 and 1920 he made extensive tours through Europe and in 1921 returned to tour his native South America. He is visiting this country for the first time.

Another young soloist of interest will be Cecilia Hansen, violinist, who is likewise undertaking her first American tour. Miss Hansen is of Finnish origin and studied under Leopold Auer.

The singer of the series will be Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano. Miss Gauthier is likewise to be soloist at the regular series of the

Post Nov 1

Boston Symphony Programme

The following programme will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor Roussel's Springtime Festival and Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain."

As soloist Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, will appear with the orchestra in an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and an aria from Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," and the two Negro spirituals, "Go Down Moses" and "By-and-By."

Adver Nov 11

PENSION FUND BILL

The following program from Wagner operas will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in aid of its Pension Fund, next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall: "Huldigungs March," "A Siegfried Idyll," third act prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," selections from "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" prelude, "Ride of the Valkyries," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Adver Nov 11

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this year on December 3, January 14, February 4, March 10 and April 7. The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in harpsichord music; Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox, pianists; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, now on her first American tour, and Eva Gauthier, mezzo soprano. The subscription sale opens tomorrow.

Providence Jour Nov 18 Globe Nov 1

The orchestra makes its first appearan of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula."

Mme Matzenauer's generous willing- to sing at the Boston Symphony stra's Wagner concert this afternoon, the entire receipts of which will the pension fund for retired mem- f the orchestra, has caused some es in the program announced last. She will sing Isolde's narrative act one of "Tristan and Brunn- immolation from act three of Goetterdammerung." Her remarkably fine performance of the latter number at a pair of Symphony concerts two years ago is still vividly remembered by many. It induced at least one supposedly jaded reviewer to go again on a Saturday evening, when he might have staid at home, after hearing her Friday. Mr Monteux has arranged a program which should insure a capacity audience.

Providence Jour Nov 1

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Trau

Globe Nov 18

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra sixth program. First symphony, Mahler; fantasia on a theme by Tallis, Vaughan Williams; suite, "Pelleas," Faure; dances "Prince Igor," Borodin. There is

Providence Jour Nov 11

FATHER AND SON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, shows his son Claude how the watch works, making an effective "Father and Son Week" picture.

Monitor Nov 17

Music News and

Roland Hayes Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D Minor.
Mozart, Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"
Berlioz, "Repose of the Holy Family"
Roussel, "La Ville Rose," No. 2 of "Evocations"; Two Negro Spirituals.
Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve."

Roland Hayes was the soloist.

Roussel's "La Ville Rose" was played for the first time in Boston. It is a curious and interesting study in orchestral coloring. As is often to be observed in the music of the composer's contemporaries, the melodic element is often rudimentary, and mere repetition, at times literal and at others with slight alterations, is relied on. This is not thematic development in the old sense, and perhaps for this we should be grateful, but in discarding it, can it truly be said that "the moderns" (but perhaps by now Roussel should not be so classed) have substituted anything better therefor?

In fact, this touches on a real weakness in the greater part of the music of our time. In spite of its greater harmonic richness and variety, in spite of its greater rhythmical freedom (for it is gradually freeing itself from the restraints of meter), its melodic structure is assuredly poorly developed and fragmentary. In this sense (a point easily to be noted in this piece of Roussel's and in Dukas' "La Péri," recently played) this music is old-fashioned; and old-fashioned in the worst sense of the term, for this mechanical repetition of melodic fragments, and this reliance on so-called "passage work," are the trademark of the Steibelts, the Dusseks and the Kalkbrenners of musical composition, certainly decked out in gay orchestral trappings yet beneath essentially the same.

The same fault in musical construction may perhaps be observed in Moussorgsky's "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (in this case undoubtedly due to the composer's lack of technic) except that here the thematic material is more striking and withstands the treatment better. Poor drawing is never made up for by brilliant coloring. For this reason Dvořák's symphony, although not great music in any sense of the term, will outlive music of the type of Roussel's "La Ville Rose." From a merely personal point of view Roussel's composition is many times more interesting, more stimulating to the imagination, yet its weaknesses cannot be glossed over.

Roland Hayes was at his best in the aria by Berlioz, at his worst in that by Mozart. Of the music of Berlioz, it is difficult to conceive a better rendering. Its idyllic charm, its artless simplicity, the note of mystical tenderness beneath it all, were admirably caught and brought out by the singer. Strangely enough (for Mr. Hayes is a versatile singer in all styles) the Mozartian spirit was lacking yesterday. There was no elegance in the turning of the phrases, which were often stiff and mannered. The Negro Spirituals (no doubt excellently done) suffer in a symphony concert. To be properly heard they must be sung by a group of Negroes, as the Fisk Jubilee Singers. With orchestral accompaniment, and sung by a single singer, they are but pale and sophisticated in comparison with the originals.

S. M.

Enrico Tramonti Soloist

Globe Nov 1

SYMPHONY HALL—Today, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Bacchanale and Prelude to Act 3 of "Tannhauser"; Isolde's Narrative from Act 1 of "Tristan and Isolde"; "A Siegfried Idyl"; "Brunhilde's Immolation" from Act 3 of "Goetterdammerung"; "Forest Murmurs" from Act 2 of "Siegfried"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3 of "Die Walkuere"; all by Wagner. Soloist, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto.

Providence Jour Nov 18

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

Herald Nov 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following program will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 23 and 24, in Symphony hall: The First Symphony of Mahler, D major, which has never been performed in Boston; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for strings; Gabriel Faure's Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

[143]

Providence Journal Nov-18

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . .Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the ballet is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale, may be read in Mr. Hale's programme-notes. Here it will suffice to say that this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic, imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture to the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation or summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color, "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

Trans Nov 1923

MONTEUX MAKES NEW PLACE FOR MAHLER'S MUSIC

PARIS, RUSSIA, ENGLAND SET IN CONTRASTS

A Symphony Foreshadowing the Composer—Faure's Haze About Maeterlinck — Vaughan Williams's Fine-Textured Variations—Borodin's Leaps and Bounds

NOT all the subscribers were in their usual places at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon; while in the second balcony of Symphony Hall the influx of the day by no means filled every seat. Not too hearty was the applause at the intervals in Mahler's First Symphony, though at the end it sufficed, with a little labor, to recall the conductor twice and, finally, to bring the orchestra to its feet. By these signs, the time is past wherein his Fifth Symphony could be played at three pairs of concerts between an April and a February, on each occasion to an acclaiming audience, or his Second Symphony be twice heard and applauded within a single fortnight. Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux did well to lead Mahler back to Bostonian ears.

Above any predecessor, the conductor has made the Symphony Concerts catholic and cosmopolitan. Rightly, he has counted it obligation to keep his hearers informed as to music in current vogue in Europe. There, since the end of the German war, Mahler has come into new place. Beethoven and Brahms remain the standard symphonists of German and Austrian concert-halls. Next to them, however, alike with conductors and audiences, now stand Mahler and Bruckner. In Holland, in Scandinavia, Mahler's Symphonies are no strange new thing; while oftener and oftener English reviewers would have them bidden into British concert-halls. From Amsterdam eastward "Mahler Festivals" recur; while annually recalcitrant New York, if it would hear Mr. Mengelberg, must also hear Mahler. Within easy memory, a few conductors—Mr. Mengelberg persistently, Dr. Muck and Mr. Stokowski intermittently, Nikisch semi-occasionally, laid Mahler before indifferent audiences. Now in not a few European cities, it is the public that demands him.

This vogue aside, Mahler's music has intrinsic titles to performance. He wrote nine Symphonies, all of which still pass current; while no more than four perpetuate Sibelius; two, Elgar; two, D'Indy; one, Rakhmaninov; one, Saint-Saëns. Since Beethoven, only Bruckner has been so prolific symphonically. Moreover, whatever the faults and the failures, however cold or warm they may leave the ear, Mahler's Symphonies are a highly individual music.

SYMPHONY MONDAY

The third annual series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given this year in Symphony hall, on Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7. Regular symphony programs will be played, with no duplications from the regular series of the same season.

The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, the harpsichordist of high European reputation, who is making her first visit to America; Cecilia Hansen, the talented Finnish violinist, who likewise is now on her first American tour; Claudio Arrau, the much-praised Chilean pianist; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo-soprano, well known in Boston from numerous appearances, and Felix Fox, pianist.

Post Nov 11

MONDAY SYMPHONIES

The Monday evening series of Boston Symphony Concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will be given this year on the following dates: Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7.

A group of soloists of particular interest has been engaged. Probably the most unusual of them will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in the music of the harpsichord. She is coming to America for the first time from Europe where her reputation for the revival of the ancient music for this instrument has made her a conspicuous figure. There will be two virtuosos of the more modern descendant of the harpischord—Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox. Mr. Arrau of the younger generation and a comparatively newcomer, is of Chilian birth. In the early part of his career, when still very young, he went to Europe to study under the foremost masters. During the years between 1918 and 1920 he made extensive tours through Europe and in 1921 returned to tour his native South America. He is visiting this country for the first time.

Another young soloist of interest will be Cecilia Hansen, violinist, who is likewise undertaking her first American tour. Miss Hansen is of Finnish origin and studied under Leopold Auer. The singer of the series will be Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano. Miss Gauthier is likewise to be soloist at the regular series of the

Post

Boston Symphony Programme

The following programme will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Roussel's Springtime Festival and Moussourgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain."

As soloist Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, will appear with the orchestra in an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and an aria from Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," and the two Negro spirituals, "Go Down Moses" and "By-and-By."

A[illegible] Nov 11

PENSION FUND BILL

The following program from Wagner operas will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in aid of its Pension Fund, next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall: "Huldigungs March," "A Siegfried Idyll," third act prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," selections from "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" prelude, "Ride of the Valkyries," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Adv[illegible]

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this year on December 3, January 14, February 4, March 10 and April 7. The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in harpsichord music; Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox, pianists; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, now on her first American tour, and Eva Gauthier, mezzo soprano. The subscription sale opens tomorrow.

Providence [illegible] Nov 18

The orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula."

Providence News Nov

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Trau

---

Providence News Nov 11

FATHER AND SON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, shows his son Claude how the watch works, making an effective "Father and Son Week" picture.

Providence Journal Nov-18

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . .Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the ballet is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale, may be read in Mr. Hale's programme-notes. Here it will suffice to say that this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic, imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture to the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation or summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

MONTEUX MAKES NEW PLACE FOR MAHLER'S MUSIC

PARIS, RUSSIA, ENGLAND SET IN CONTRASTS

A Symphony Foreshadowing the Composer—Faure's Haze About Maeterlinck — Vaughan Williams's Fine-Textured Variations—Borodin's Leaps and Bounds

NOT all the sub[illegible] were in their usual place[illegible] Symphony Concert of [illegible] while in [illegible] Symphony Hall th[illegible] no means filled ev[illegible] was the applause [illegible] Mahler's First Symphony, [illegible] at the end it sufficed, with a little labor, to recall the conductor twice and, finally, to bring the orchestra [illegible] feet. By these signs, the time is [illegible] his Fifth Symphony could be [illegible] at three pairs of concerts between [illegible] and a February, on each occasion [illegible] audience, or his Second Symphony be twice heard and applauded [illegible] in a single fortnight. Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux did well to lead Mahler back [illegible]

Above any predecessor [illegible] conductor has made the Symphony Concerts catholic and cosmopolitan. Rightly [illegible] has counted it obligation to keep his [illegible] informed as to music in current [illegible] in Europe. There, since the end of the German war, Mahler has come [illegible] place. Beethoven and Brahms remain [illegible] standard symphonists of German [illegible] concert-halls. Next to them, however, alike with conductors [illegible] now stand Mahler and Bruckner. [illegible] Scandinavia, Mahler's [illegible] strange new thing [illegible] would have them oftener English reviewers [illegible] From bidden into British [illegible] Festivals Amsterdam eastward [illegible] New recur; while annually [illegible] York, if it would h[illegible] With easy must also hear Mahler [illegible] memory, a few conductors—Mr. Mengelberg persistently, Dr. [illegible] and Mr. Stokowski intermittently, [illegible] sionally, laid Mahler be[illegible] European cities audiences. Now in not a few [illegible] it is the public that demands him.

This vogue aside, Mahler's music has intrinsic titles to performance. He wrote nine Symphonies, all of which still pass current; while no more [illegible] ate Sibelius; two, Elgar; two, [illegible] Rakhmaninov; one, Saint-Saëns. Since Beethoven, only Bruckner has been so prolific symphonically. Moreover, whatever the faults and the failures, however cold or warm they may leave the ear, Mahler's Symphonies are a highly individual music.

Monitor Nov [illegible]

Music News and

Roland Hayes Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D Minor.
Mozart, Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"
Berlioz, "Repose of the Holy Family"
Roussel, "La Ville Rose," No. 2 of "Evocations"; Two Negro Spirituals.
Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve."

Roland Hayes was the soloist.

Roussel's "La Ville Rose" was played for the first time in Boston. It is a curious and interesting study in orchestral coloring. As is often to be observed in the music of the composer's contemporaries, the melodic element is often rudimentary, and mere repetition, at times literal and at others with slight alterations, is relied on. This is not thematic development in the old sense, and perhaps for this we should be grateful, but in discarding it, can it truly be said that "the moderns" (but perhaps by now Roussel should not be so classed) have substituted anything better therefor?

In fact, this touches on a real weakness in the greater part of the music of our time. In spite of its greater harmonic richness and variety, in spite of its greater rhythmical freedom (for it is gradually freeing itself from the restraints of meter), its melodic structure is assuredly poorly developed and fragmentary. In this sense (a point easily to be noted in this piece of Roussel's and in Dukas' "La Péri," recently played) this music is old-fashioned; and old-fashioned in the worst sense of the term, for this mechanical repetition of melodic fragments, and this reliance on so-called "passage work," are the trademark of the Steibelts, the Dusseks and the Kalkbrenners of musical composition, certainly decked out in gay orchestral trappings yet beneath essentially the same.

The same fault in musical construction may perhaps be observed in Moussorgsky's "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (in this case undoubtedly due to the composer's lack of technic) except that here the thematic material is more striking and withstands the treatment better. Poor drawing is never made up for by brilliant coloring. For this reason Dvořák's symphony, although not great music in any sense of the term, will outlive music of the type of Roussel's "La Ville Rose." From a merely personal point of view Roussel's composition is many times more interesting, more stimulating to the imagination, yet its weaknesses cannot be glossed over.

Roland Hayes was at his best in the aria by Berlioz, at his worst in that by Mozart. Of the music of Berlioz, it is difficult to conceive a better rendering. Its idyllic charm, its artless simplicity, the note of mystical tenderness beneath it all, were admirably caught and brought out by the singer. Strangely enough (for Mr. Hayes is a versatile singer in all styles) the Mozartian spirit was lacking yesterday. There was no elegance in the turning of the phrases, which were often stiff and mannered. The Negro Spirituals (no doubt excellently done) suffer in a symphony concert. To be properly heard they must be sung by a group of Negroes, as the Fisk Jubilee Singers. With orchestral accompaniment, and sung by a single singer, they are but pale and sophisticated in comparison with the originals.

S. M.

nrico Tramonti Soloist

Globe Nov

SYMPHONY HALL—Today, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Bacchanale and Prelude to Act 3 of "Tannhauser"; Isolde's Narrative from Act 1 of "Tristan and Isolde"; "A Siegfried Idyl"; "Brunhilde's Immolation" from Act 3 of "Goetterdammerung"; "Forest Murmurs" from Act 2 of "Siegfried"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3 of "Die Walkuere"; all by Wagner. Soloist, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto.

[illegible] Nov 18 G[illegible]

Mme Matzenauer's generous willing- to sing at the Boston Symphony stra's Wagner concert this after- the entire receipts of which will the pension fund for retired mem- of the orchestra, has caused some es in the program announced last She will sing Isolde's narrative act one of "Tristan and Brunn- immolation from act three of Goetterdammerung." Her remarkably fine performance of the latter number at a pair of Symphony concerts two years ago is still vividly remembered by many. It induced at least one supposedly jaded reviewer to go again on a Saturday evening, when he might have staid at home, after hearing her Friday. Mr Monteux has arranged a program which should insure a capacity audience.

Globe Nov 18

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra sixth program. First symphony, Mahler; fantasia on a theme by Tallis, Vaughan Williams; suite, "Pelleas," Faure; dances "Prince Igor," Borodin. There is

---

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

Herald Nov [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following program will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 23 and 24, in Symphony hall: The First Symphony of Mahler, D major, which has never been performed in Boston; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for strings; Gabriel Faure's Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

SYMPHONY MONDAY

The third annual series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given this year in Symphony hall, on Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7. Regular symphony programs will be played, with no duplications from the regular series of the same season.

The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, the harpsichordist of high European reputation, who is making her first visit to America; Cecilia Hansen, the talented Finnish violinist, who likewise is now on her first American tour; Claudio Arrau, the much-praised Chilean pianist; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo-soprano, well known in Boston from numerous appearances, and Felix Fox, pianist.

Post Nov 11

MONDAY SYMPHONIES

The Monday evening series of Boston Symphony Concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux will be given this year on the following dates: Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7.

A group of soloists of particular interest has been engaged. Probably the most unusual of them will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in the music of the harpsichord. She is coming to America for the first time from Europe where her reputation for the revival of the ancient music for this instrument has made her a conspicuous figure. There will be two virtuosos of the more modern descendant of the harpischord—Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox. Mr. Arrau of the younger generation and a comparatively new comer, is of Chilian birth. In the early part of his career, when still very young, he went to Europe to study under the foremost masters. During the years between 1918 and 1920 he made extensive tours through Europe and in 1921 returned to tour his native South America. He is visiting this country for the first time.

Another young soloist of interest will be Cecilia Hansen, violinist, who is likewise undertaking her first American tour. Miss Hansen is of Finnish origin and studied under Leopold Auer. The singer of the series will be Eva Gauthier, French-Canadian mezzo-soprano. Miss Gauthier is likewise to be soloist at the regular series of the

Post Nov 11

Boston Symphony Programme

The following programme will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Roussel's Springtime Festival and Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain."

As soloist Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, will appear with the orchestra in an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and an aria from Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," and the two Negro spirituals, "Go Down Moses" and "By-and-By."

Adver Nov 11

PENSION FUND BILL

The following program from Wagner operas will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in aid of its Pension Fund, next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall: "Huldigungs March," "A Siegfried Idyll," third act prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," selections from "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal" prelude, "Ride of the Valkyries," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Adver Nov 11

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this year on December 3, January 14, February 4, March 10 and April 7. The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, an artist who has specialized in harpsichord music; Claudio Arrau and Felix Fox, pianists; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, now on her first American tour, and Eva Gauthier, mezzo soprano. The subscription sale opens tomorrow.

~~Providence~~ Jor Nov 18

The orchestra make[illegible] appearan[illegible] of the season her[illegible] occasion, and Mr. Monteux beg[illegible] season here as conductor. [illegible] gramme includes Beethoven'[illegible] in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's [illegible] "La Peri," and Goldmark'[illegible] "Sakuntala."

Providence Jor Nov 16

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Trau[illegible]

Providence Jour Nov 11

FATHER AND SON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, shows his son Claude how the watch works, making an effective "Father and Son Week" picture.

Providence Journal Nov 18

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the ballet is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale, may be read in Mr. Hale's programme-notes. Here it will suffice to say that this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic, imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture to the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation or summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color, "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

Moniter Nov 17

Music News and

Roland Hayes Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Dvořák, Symphony No. 2 in D Minor.
Mozart, Aria from "Cosi fan Tutte"
Berlioz, "Repose of the Holy Family"
Roussel, "La Ville Rose," No. 2 of "Evocations"; Two Negro Spirituals.
Moussorgsky, "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve."

Roland Hayes was the soloist.

Roussel's "La Ville Rose" was played for the first time in Boston. It is a curious and interesting study in orchestral coloring. As is often to be observed in the music of the composer's contemporaries, the melodic element is often rudimentary, and mere repetition, at times literal and at others with slight alterations, is relied on. This is not thematic development in the old sense, and perhaps for this we should be grateful, but in discarding it, can it truly be said that "the moderns" (but perhaps by now Roussel should not be so classed) have substituted anything better therefor?

In fact, this touches on a real weakness in the greater part of the music of our time. In spite of its greater harmonic richness and variety, in spite of its greater rhythmical freedom (for it is gradually freeing itself from the restraints of meter), its melodic structure is assuredly poorly developed and fragmentary. In this sense (a point easily to be noted in this piece of Roussel's and in Dukas' "La Péri," recently played) this music is old-fashioned; and old-fashioned in the worst sense of the term, for this mechanical repetition of melodic fragments, and this reliance on so-called "passage work," are the trademark of the Steibelts, the Dusseks and the Kalkbrenners of musical composition, certainly decked out in gay orchestral trappings yet beneath essentially the same.

The same fault in musical construction may perhaps be observed in Moussorgsky's "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" (in this case undoubtedly due to the composer's lack of technic) except that here the thematic material is more striking and withstands the treatment better. Poor drawing is never made up for by brilliant coloring. For this reason Dvořák's symphony, although not great music in any sense of the term, will outlive music of the type of Roussel's "La Ville Rose." From a merely personal point of view Roussel's composition is many times more interesting, more stimulating to the imagination, yet its weaknesses cannot be glossed over.

Roland Hayes was at his best in the aria by Berlioz, at his worst in that by Mozart. Of the music of Berlioz, it is difficult to conceive a better rendering. Its idyllic charm, its artless simplicity, the note of mystical tenderness beneath it all, were admirably caught and brought out by the singer. Strangely enough (for Mr. Hayes is a versatile singer in all styles) the Mozartian spirit was lacking yesterday. There was no elegance in the turning of the phrases, which were often stiff and mannered. The Negro Spirituals (no doubt excellently done) suffer in a symphony concert. To be properly heard they must be sung by a group of Negroes, as the Fisk Jubilee Singers. With orchestral accompaniment, and sung by a single singer, they are but pale and sophisticated in comparison with the originals.

S. M.

Enrico Tramonti Soloist

Globe Nov

SYMPHONY HALL—Today, at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concert in aid of the pension fund. Wagner program. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Bacchanale and Prelude to Act 3 of "Tannhauser"; Isolde's Narrative from Act 1 of "Tristan and Isolde"; "A Siegfried Idyl"; "Brunhilde's Immolation" from Act 3 of "Goetterdammerung"; "Forest Murmurs" from Act 2 of "Siegfried"; "Ride of the Valkyries" from Act 3 of "Die Walkuere"; all by Wagner. Soloist, Margarete Matzenauer, contralto.

Globe Nov 1[illegible]

Mme Matzenauer's generous willingness to sing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Wagner concert this afternoon, the entire receipts of which will go to the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra, has caused some changes in the program announced last week. She will sing Isolde's narrative from act one of "Tristan and Brunnhilde's immolation from act three of "Goetterdammerung." Her remarkably fine performance of the latter number at a pair of Symphony concerts two years ago is still vividly remembered by many. It induced at least one supposedly jaded reviewer to go again on a Saturday evening, when he might have staid at home, after hearing her Friday. Mr Monteux has arranged a program which should insure a capacity audience.

Globe Nov 18

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15—Boston Symphony Orchestra sixth program. First symphony, Mahler; fantasia on a theme by Tallis, Vaughan Williams; suite, "Pelleas," Faure; dances "Prince Igor," Borodin. There is

---

Providence Jour Nov 18

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

Herald Nov 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The following program will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 23 and 24, in Symphony hall: The First Symphony of Mahler, D major, which has never been performed in Boston; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for strings; Gabriel Faure's Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

Tran [illegible]

MONTEUX MAKES NEW PLACE FOR MAHLER'S MUSIC

PARIS, RUSSIA, ENGLAND SET IN CONTRASTS

A Symphony Foreshadowing the Composer—Faure's Haze About Maeterlinck — Vaughan Williams's Fine-Textured Variations—Borodin's Leaps and Bounds

NOT all the subscribers were in their usual places at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon; while in the second balcony of Symphony Hall the influx of the day by no means filled every seat. Not too hearty was the applause at the intervals in Mahler's First Symphony, though at the end it sufficed, with a little labor, to recall the conductor twice and, finally, to bring the orchestra to its feet. By these signs, the time is past wherein his Fifth Symphony could be played at three pairs of concerts between an April and a February, on each occasion to an acclaiming audience, or his Second Symphony be twice heard and applauded within a single fortnight. Nevertheless, Mr. Monteux did well to lead Mahler back to Bostonian ears.

Above any predecessor, the conductor has made the Symphony Concerts catholic and cosmopolitan. Rightly, he has counted it obligation to keep his hearers informed as to music in current vogue in Europe. There, since the end of the German war, Mahler has come into new place. Beethoven and Brahms remain the standard symphonists of German and Austrian concert-halls. Next to them, however, alike with conductors and audiences, now stand Mahler and Bruckner. In Holland, in Scandinavia, Mahler's Symphonies are no strange new thing; while oftener and oftener English reviewers would have them bidden into British concert-halls. From Amsterdam eastward "Mahler Festivals" recur; while annually recalcitrant New York, if it would hear Mr. Mengelberg, must also hear Mahler. Within easy memory, a few conductors—Mr. Mengelberg persistently, Dr. Muck and Mr. Stokowski intermittently, Nikisch semi-occasionally, laid Mahler before indifferent audiences. Now in not a few European cities, it is the public that demands him.

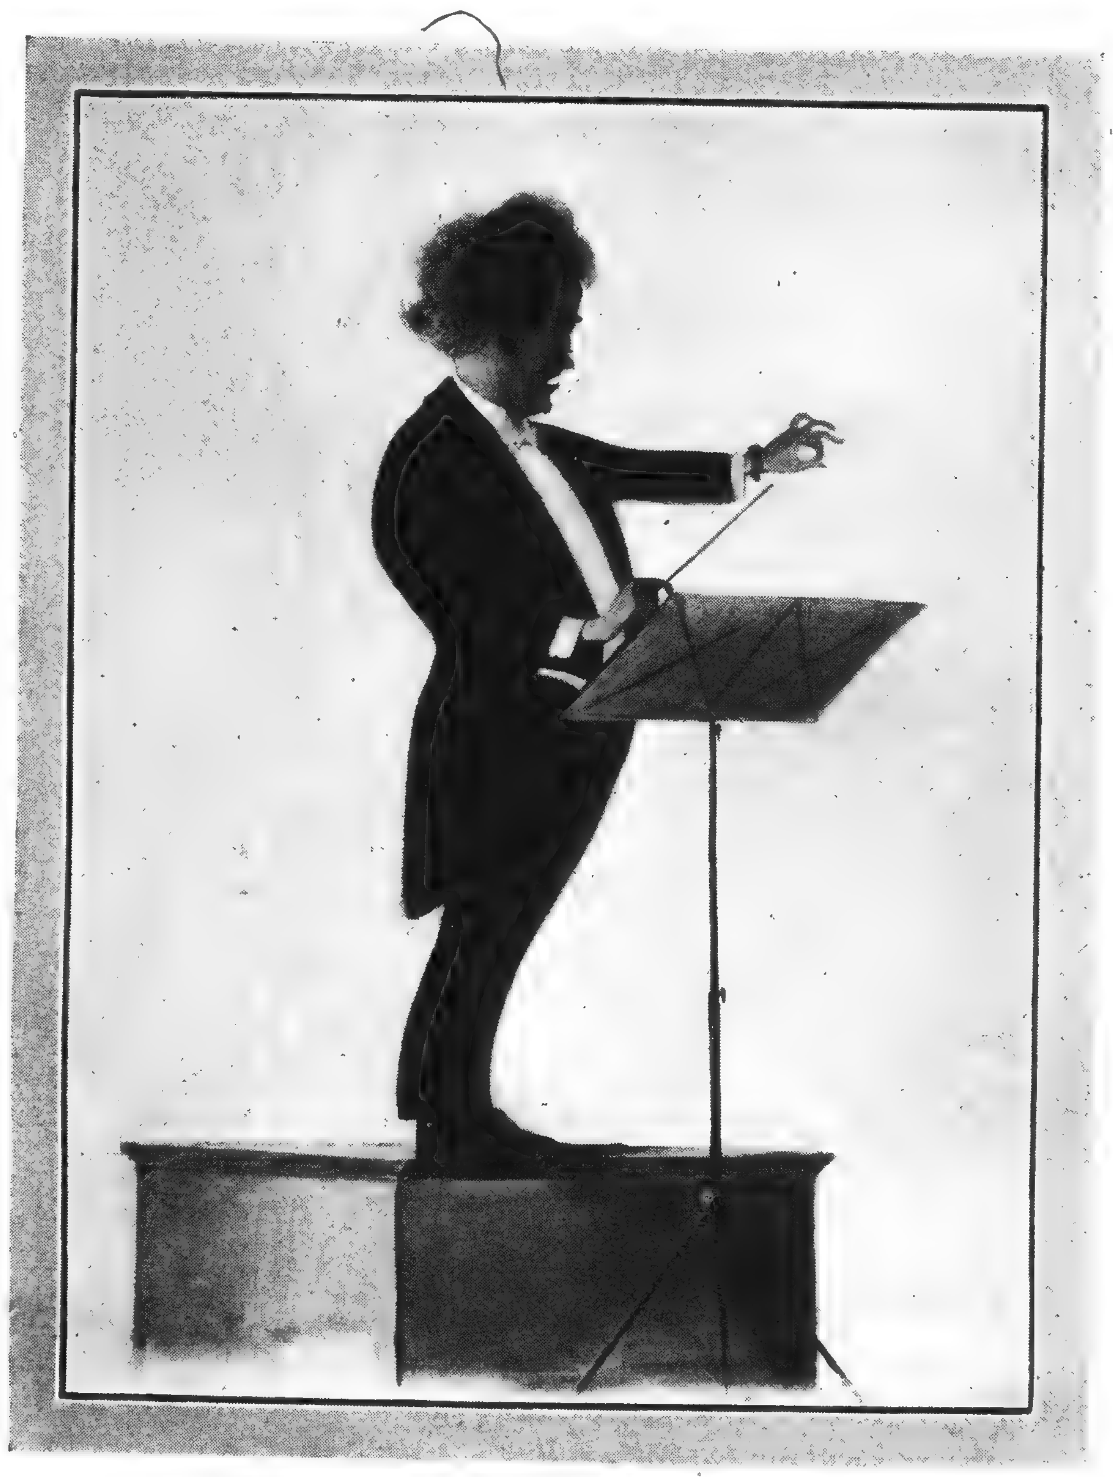
This vogue aside, Mahler's music has intrinsic titles to performance. He wrote nine Symphonies, all of which still pass current; while no more than four perpetuate Sibelius; two, Elgar; two, D'Indy; one, Rakhmaninov; one, Saint-Saëns. Since Beethoven, only Bruckner has been so prolific symphonically. Moreover, whatever the faults and the failures, however cold or warm they may leave the ear, Mahler's Symphonies are a highly individual music

---

SYMPHONY MONDAY

The third annual series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given this year in Symphony hall, on Dec. 3, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, March 10 and April 7. Regular symphony programs will be played with no duplications from the regular series of the same season.

The soloists will be Wanda Landowska, the harpsichordist of high European reputation, who is making her first visit to America; Cecilia Hansen, the talented Finnish violinist, who likewise is now on her first American tour; Claudio Arrau, the much-praised Chilean pianist; Eva Gauthier, the mezzo-soprano, well known in Boston from numerous appearances, and Felix Fox, pianist.



MENGELBERG—THE MAGNIFICENT
(Philharmonic)

BODANSKY—THE BELLIGERENT
(Metropolitan Opera House)

STOKOWSKI—THE SUAVE
(Philadelphia Orchestra)

E ORCHESTRA

n A Temperamental Prima Donna Trembles

1923

MUSIC

SET IN

he Com-eterlinck
-Textured Bounds

re in their Symphony
afternoon;
alcony of e day by oo hearty ervals in h at the
or, to renally, to
By these his Fifth ree pairs
d a Feb-cclaiming be twice gle fort-did well
ears.
uctor has holic and ounted it ormed as Europe. man war,
e. Beetstandard rian con-ver, alike
ow stand lland, ir are nc er and ave them
s. From Festivals" ant New engelberg,
thin easy
. Mengel-
Mr. Stosemi-occa-fferent aupean cities,
m.
sic has in-
He wrote
still pass
r perpetu-
'Indy; one,
ns. Since n so pro-whatever wever colc
, Mahler's
al music.

AY
ve M Bost ux, con ear, in 4. Feb.
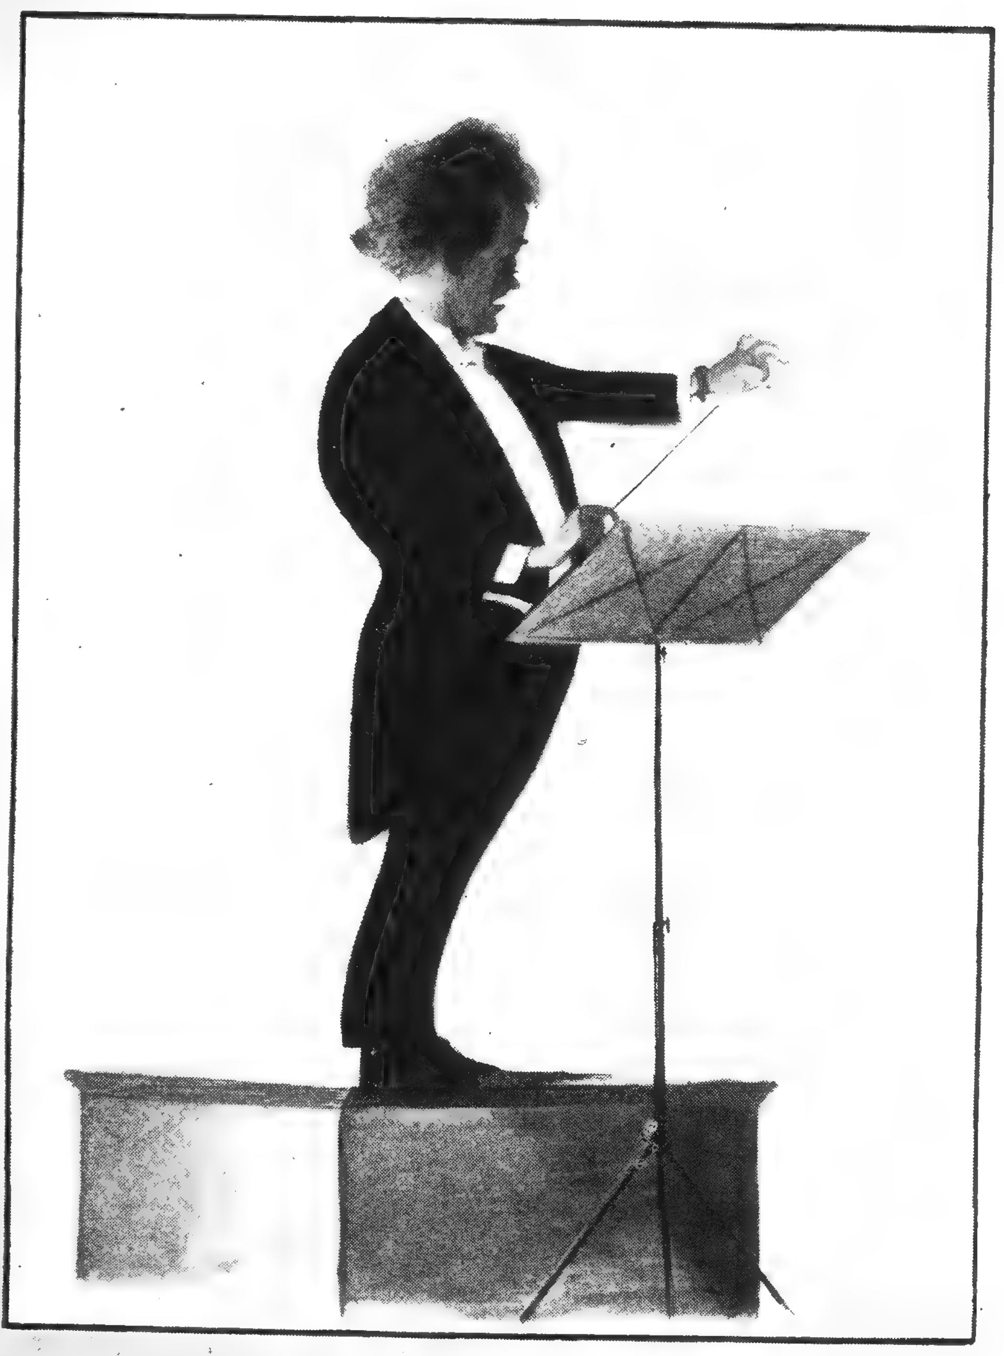
lar
ed,
lar



MENGELBERG—THE MAGNIFICENT
(Philharmonic)

BODANSKY—THE BELLIGERENT
(Metropolitan Opera House)

STOKOWSKI—THE SUAVE
(Philadelphia Orchestra)

E ORCHESTRA

A Temperamental Prima Donna Trembles

MUSIC

SET IN

the Com-eterlinck
-Textured
d Bounds

re in their Symphony
fternoon;
alcony of e day by oo hearty ervals in h at the
or, to reinally, to
By these his Fifth ree pairs
d a Feb-cclaiming
be twice gle fort-did well
ears.
uctor has holic and ounted it
ormed as Europe.
man war,
e. Beetstandard rian con-
ver, alike
ow stand
lland, ir s are nc ener and have them
s. From Festivals"
rant New engelberg,
thin easy
. Mengel-
Mr. Stosemi-occa-fferent u-pean cities,
m. sic has in-
He wrote
still pass
ur perpetu-
'Indy; one,
ens. Since een so pro-whatever wever cold
, Mahler's
al music.

AY
ive M e Bost
teux, con
year. in
. 14, Feb.
Regular played, regular

Landow,
f high making Han-who ican ised
the ton

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

The Musical Arts concert series was introduced last night at Elmwood Music hall, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, presented the concert.

Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying its forty-third season, and last evening he revealed the fine artistocracy of his musicianship in his conducting of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," in which he invested this work with a melodic beauty and vitality that made it strikingly conspicuous as a performance of virtuosity, and which received enthusiastic applause.

Mme. Cahier, who made her first appearance here, proved to be an artist of distinguished stage presence and superbly equipped in the interpretation of song. Her aria "Adieu, foret," from "Jeanne d'Arc," was delivered with consummate vocal style and won her several recalls.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS, NOV 9 1923
Providence, R. I.

FIVE CONCERTS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

The coming season of Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry hall, will include five concerts on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. The soloists to appear at each of these are Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage; Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation and Jean Bedetti leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

This coming season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion, is expected to return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts.

He toured Europe four years at the head of the ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 9 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with their leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight at 8:15 and tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 p. m. The orchestra will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony" (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Wagner's Overture to "Reinzi." Tomorrow afternoon three Sixteenth Century Dances arranged by Respighi, Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Salome's Dance from Strauss' "Salome." The soloist [illegible] will be Sigrid Onegin, [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

SIGRID ONEGIN.

The 104 musicians of the Boston symphony orchestra, together with their illustrious leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh early this afternoon in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight, at 8:15 o'clock and tomorrow afternoon, at 2:30 p. m. will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony," (in E minor); Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." Tomorrow afternoon three sixteenth century dances arranged by Respighi. Beethoven's "S

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND ONEGIN PLEASE

Big House Greets Famous Orchestra and Opera Star. Program Varied One.

An audience of unusual proportions greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Mosque. It was the opening concert of a series of five symphonic programs and if those to follow maintain the high interest of last night's concert it promises to be a most successful season.

Assisting the orchestra as solo-attraction was Sigrid Onegin, the fascinating and competent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She was heard to advantage in two large arias.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a program that was at once catholic and representative. The Boston orchestra, under the baton of Monteux, impressed last night as he did years ago as a conductor who is sincere in his interpretations, as one who obtains effects without exaggeration, as a man who is a classicist and yet is by nature fond of the moderns.

His reading of the Rachmaninoff Symphonie No. 2 in E minor was an evidence of this. He gave the work a magnificent and faithful reading, in which he took great care that the cantilena flowed and that dynamics and nuance were observed. The opening movement with its sustained passages was gloriously treated. The second movement was a happy conception heavily orchestrated. The Adagio was sugared with the sweets of the Russian school until it sang itself away. The Finale was an imposing climax rich in cacaphony and replete in chromatic resolutions.

In the Brahms "Variation on a Theme of Haydn's" there was a certain versatility in which Monteux sought for the various choir-colorings and strove to bring out the contrasted theme-changes. It was slightly attenuated and somewhat lethargic.

The closing number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," was that old canto of the Roman patricians as we have often heard it. There was a fine blare of horns and the fiddles sang the "Santo spirito" prayer in commendable fashion.

The outstanding feature of the program was the singing of Sigrid Onegin. She has one of the finest and largest voices that has come here and every note that she touched was surcharged with fire and power. She has almost unbelievable scope, and while there is a slight glitter to her upper notes it [illegible] is immeasurably in a hall the size of the Mosque. Her interpretation of the [illegible] was most enjoyable and she [illegible] "Rienzi" scene an emotion [illegible] Pittsburghers don'

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ORCHESTRAL SEASON IN MOSQUE

By Burt McMurtrie.

The first concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, played by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, took place last night in Syria Mosque, amid the accompaniments of smiling faces, generous applause, and an audience that well nigh overflowed the big temple. The program comprised the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E Minor Op 27, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a," and the Wagner overture to "Rienzi." More enjoyable programs have been played by visiting symphonies to be sure, last night's program at times being more than dull, but few aggregations have put forth music so well played.

The conducting of Monteux is placid, thorough and sincere. There is strength, power and smouldering fire that occasionally bursts into flame behind his outward calm. Under Monteux the Boston Symphony is flexible and gratifyingly artistic.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony, a heavy, ponderous thing that is distinctly different from the customary Rachmaninoff, held moments of brilliance, especially in the Allegro vivace and the exquisitiveness of the Adagio. The rich body of string tone was perhaps the most notable qulaity of sound, as they strode through the Russian's exultant manuscript. Just why this symphony should have been chosen is a question, when pondering upon the many scores available, and by far more enjoyable. The Variations upon Haydn is not the most unified structure of Brahms' erstwhile dabblings with other composers' themes, and indeed there are passages when one wishes he had been content to leave the original alone [illegible] effective as were the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, under the auspices of the Yale Music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note, Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best toward the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL
NOV [illegible] 1923

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT PROMISED FOR MONDAY

9

Of the Boston Symhony Ensemble, which comes to the auditorium next Monday evening, under the auspices of the Woman's club, the Boston Herald says: "Though every individual player can make his part agreeable to hear, the balance of parts is perfect. Mr. Vannini is a conductor of grace and warmth and fine rhythmic feeling. Last week this little orchestra showed how admirably it can play music of old-time written for small orchestra. It showed also that it can give an amazingly vivid impression of how music written for full orchestra should sound. It set forth this full-voiced music with ample sonority and an astonishing approximation to the original widely varied color, a feat of genuine skill. Mr. Vannini . . . . is a conductor of parts."

The price of tickets, for the concert $1, is remarkably small in view of the high quality of the artists, and it ins hoped there will be a capacity house. Tickets on sale at Mathushek's and J. A. V. Thomas' Music stores, and at the door.

SPEED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

PIERRE MONTEUX

Who is to conduct Boston Sympho here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 11 1923

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first tour afield for this season during the past week, appearing in Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto Pierre Monteux gave a performance of Williams's "London Symphony." The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Orchestra.

At a notable concert in Toronto last Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, performed Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." This concert was one of a tour which included Albany, Cornell University, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburg.

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 30. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. Remaining dates will be Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4, and the soloists will be Moritz Rosenthal, Jacques Thibaud, Jean Bedetti and Elisabeth Rethberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Symphony Was Heartily Applauded

Bruce Simonds, instructor of piano at the Yale School of Music, received an ovation last evening at Woolsey hall, while appearing as soloist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, given under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

It was a gala evening for Mr. Simonds and members of the faculty, as the young musician's many successful appearances, both in this country and abroad reached a climax last evening while playing as soloist with the distinguished orchestra. Mr. Simonds, following his able rendition of "The Franck Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, one of the most colorful of its kind, was warmly received both by the audience and members of the orchestra and its conductor, who congratulated him upon his ideal playing.

The brilliant program arranged by Conductor Monteux, was opened with the overture to Prodana Nevesta (The Sold Bride) by Smetana, sorrowful in its beginning but very cheerful in its ending.

The Symphony in E Minor No. 1, Opus No. 39, by Sibelus, a lengthy, but extremely fascinating arrangement, followed the opening number.

The symphony, which is characteristic of the country of its composer, opens with strange figures for the strings, with syncopated rhythms and defiant blasts from the brass. The Andante sings a folk song of simple melody and the allegro is varied in mood. The symphony is pulsated with life.

The program was concluded with Strauss' Salome dance from the music drama "Salome," very barbaric and oriental.

Pierre Monteux, who is well acquainted with his musicians and program, was many times recalled.

Golden Rule Sunday Has Strong Appea

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 11 1923

MUSIC was more a promise than a performance last week. In the dearth of offerings, the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday night and yesterday's matinee, in Syria Mosque, had an opportunity to please big audiences nowise surfeited by beauty of sound. The concerts opened the symphony season in Pittsburgh, and with Pierre Monteux directing and Sigrid Onegin, star contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist, the appeal to music lovers was of sufficient power to make the premiere important.

Following a custom that has added much to the enjoyment of symphony concerts, the varied programs of the two performances were analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd Thursday night, with two and four-hand illustrations of the numbers by Dallmyer Russel and William H. Oetting.

The new week will open with a program that is far enough away from the classic music of a symphony orchestra to be a distinct novelty. Elsie Janis will head the bill at Carnegie Music Hall. The program will be light enough to entertain without drawing hard upon the underlying emotions of the audience and spectators.

[145]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

The Musical Arts concert series was introduced last night at Elmwood Music hall, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, presented the concert.

Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying its forty-third season, and last evening he revealed the fine artistocracy of his musicianship in his conducting of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," in which he invested this work with a melodic beauty and vitality that made it strikingly conspicuous as a performance of virtuosity, and which received enthusiastic applause.

Mme. Cahier, who made her first appearance here, proved to be an artist of distinguished stage presence and superbly equipped in the interpretation of song. Her aria "Adieu, foret," from "Jeanne d'Arc," was delivered with consummate vocal style and won her several recalls.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS, NOV 9 1923
Providence, R. I.

FIVE CONCERTS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

The coming season of Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry hall, will include five concerts on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. The soloists to appear at each of these are Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage; Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation and Jean Bedetti leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

This coming season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion, is expected to return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts.

He toured Europe four years at the head of the ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 9 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with their leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight at 8:15 and tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 p. m. The orchestra will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony" (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Wagner's Overture to "Reinzi." Tomorrow afternoon three Sixteenth Century Dances arranged by Respighi, Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Salome's Dance from Strauss' "Salome." The soloist [illegible] will be Sigrid Onegin, [illegible] Metropoli-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
[illegible]923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

SIGRID ONEGIN.

The 104 musicians of the Boston symphony orchestra, together with their illustrious leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh early this afternoon in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight, at 8:15 o'clock and tomorrow afternoon, at 2:30 p. m. will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony," (in E minor); Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." Tomorrow afternoon three sixteenth century dances [illegible] Respighi, Beethoven's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND ONEGIN PLEASE

Big House Greets Famous Orchestra and Opera Star. Program Varied One.

An audience of unusual proportions greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Mosque. It was the opening concert of a series of five symphonic programs and if those to follow maintain the high interest of last night's concert it promises to be a most successful season.

Assisting the orchestra as solo-attraction was Sigrid Onegin, the fascinating and competent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She was heard to advantage in two large arias.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a program that was at once catholic and representative. The Boston orchestra, under the baton of Monteux, impressed last night as he did years ago as a conductor who is sincere in his interpretations, as one who obtains effects without exaggeration, as a man who is a classicist and yet is by nature fond of the moderns.

His reading of the Rachmaninoff Symphonie No. 2 in E minor was an evidence of this. He gave the work a magnificent and faithful reading, in which he took great care that the cantilena flowed and that dynamics and nuance were observed. The opening movement with its sustained passages was gloriously treated. The second movement was a happy conception heavily orchestrated. The Adagio was sugared with the sweets of the Russian school until it sang itself away. The Finale was an imposing climax rich in cacaphony and replete in chromatic resolutions.

In the Brahms "Variation on a Theme of Haydn's" there was a certain versatility in which Monteux sought for the various choir-colorings and strove to bring out the contrasted theme changes. It was slightly attenuated and somewhat lethargic.

The closing number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," was that old canto of the Roman patricians as we have often heard it. There was a fine blare of horns and the fiddles sang the "Santo spirito" prayer in commendable fashion.

The outstanding feature of the program was the singing of Sigrid Onegin. She has one of the finest and largest voices that has come here and every note that she touched was surcharged with fire and power. She has almost unbelievable scope, and while there is a slight glitter to her upper notes it adds immeasurably in a hall the size of the Mosque. Her interpretation of the [illegible] aria was most enjoyable and she [illegible] the "Rienzi" scene an emotional [illegible] Pittsburghers don'

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ORCHESTRAL SEASON IN MOSQUE

By Burt McMurtrie.

The first concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, played by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, took place last night in Syria Mosque, amid the accompaniments of smiling faces, generous applause, and an audience that well nigh overflowed the big temple. The program comprised the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E Minor Op 27, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a," and the Wagner overture to "Rienzi." More enjoyable programs have been played by visiting symphonies to be sure, last night's program at times being more than dull, but few aggregations have put forth music so well played.

The conducting of Monteux is placid, thorough and sincere. There is strength, power and smouldering fire that occasionally bursts into flame behind his outward calm. Under Monteux the Boston Symphony is flexible and gratifyingly artistic.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony, a heavy, ponderous thing that is distinctly different from the customary Rachmaninoff, held moments of brilliance, especially in the Allegro vivace and the exquisitiveness of the Adagio. The rich body of string tone was perhaps the most notable qulaity of sound, as they strode through the Russian's exultant manuscript. Just why this symphony should have been chosen is a question, when pondering upon the many scores available, and by far, more enjoyable. The Variations upon Haydn is not the most unified structure of Brahms' erstwhile dabblings with other composers' themes, and indeed there are passages when one wishes he had been content to leave the original alone [illegible] affective as were the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to make ~~its only~~ visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, under the auspices of the Yale Music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note, Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not lon[g] ago, when his splendid musicianshi[p] made a most favorable impressio[n].

This orchestra has been for year[s] considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in th[e] world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities ar[e] the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed towar[d] artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best toward the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL
NOV [illegible] 1923

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT PROMISED FOR MONDAY

9

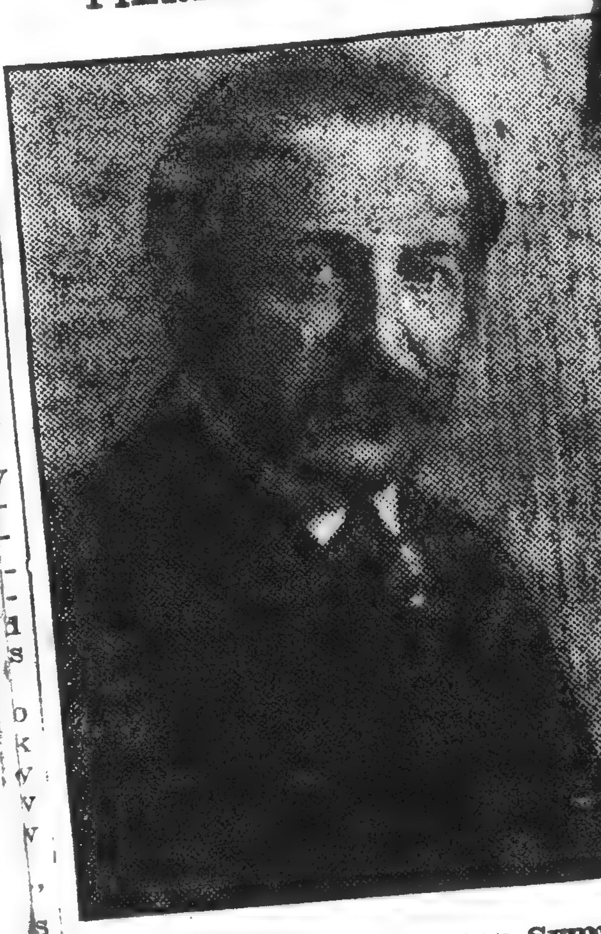
Of the Boston Symhony Ensemble, which comes to the auditorium next Monday evening, under the auspices of the Woman's club, the Boston Herald says: "Though every individual player can make his part agreeable to hear, the balance of parts is perfect. Mr. Vannini is a conductor of grace and warmth and fine rhythmic feeling. Last week this little orchestra showed how admirably it can play music of old-time written for small orchestra. It showed also that it can give an amazingly vivid impression of how music written for full orchestra should sound. It set forth this full-voiced music with ample sonority and an astonishing approximation to the original widely varied color, a feat of genuine skill. Mr. Vannini .... is a conductor of parts."

The price of tickets, for the concert $1, is remarkably small in view of the high quality of the artists, and it ins hoped there will be a capacity house. Tickets on sale at Mathushek's and J. A. V. Thomas' Music stores, and at the door.

SPEED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

PIERRE MONTEUX



Who is to conduct Boston Sympho[ny] here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 11 1923

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first tour afield for this season during the past week, appearing in Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto Pierre Monteux gave a performance of Williams's "London Symphony." The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
[illegible]

The Boston Orchestra.

At a notable concert in Toronto last Wednesday the Boston Symphony r-chestra, under Pierre Monteux, performed Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." This concert was one of a tour which lincluded Albany, Cornell University, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburg.

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 30. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. Remaining dates will be Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4, and the soloists will be Moritz Rosenthal, Jacques Thibaud, Jean Bedetti and Elisabeth Rethberg.

[illegible] CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Symphony Was Heartily Applauded

Bruce Simonds, instructor of piano at the Yale School of Music, received an ovation last evening at Woolsey hall, while appearing as soloist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, given under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

It was a gala evening for Mr. Simonds and members of the faculty, as the young musician's many successful appearances, both in this country and abroad reached a climax last evening while playing as soloist with the distinguished orchestra. Mr. Simonds, following his able rendition of "The Franck Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, one of the most colorful of its kind, was warmly received both by the audience and members of the orchestra and its conductor, who congratulated him upon his ideal playing.

The brilliant program arranged by Conductor Monteux, was opened with the overture to Prodana Nevesta (The Sold Bride) by Smetana, sorrowful in its beginning but very cheerful in its ending.

The Symphony in E Minor No. 1, Opus No. 39, by Sibelus, a lengthy, but extremely fascinating arrangement, followed the opening number.

The symphony, which is characteristic of the country of its composer, opens with strange figures for the strings, with syncopated rhythms and defiant blasts from the brass. The Andante sings a folk song of simple melody and the allegro is varied in mood. The symphony is pulsated with life.

The program was concluded with Strauss' Salome dance from the music drama "Salome," very barbaric and oriental.

Pierre Monteux, who is well acquainted with his musicians and program, was many times recalled.

Golden Rule Sunday Has Strong Appea

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 11 1923

MUSIC was more a promise than a performance last week. In the dearth of offerings, the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday night and yesterday's matinee, in Syria Mosque, had an opportunity to please big audiences nowise surfeited by beauty of sound. The concerts opened the symphony season in Pittsburgh, and with Pierre Monteux directing and Sigrid Onegin, star contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist, the appeal to music lovers was of sufficient power to make the premiere important.

Following a custom that has added much to the enjoyment of symphony concerts, the varied programs of the two performances were analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd Thursday night, with two and four-hand illustrations of the numbers by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The new week will open with a program that is far enough away from the classic music of a symphony orchestra to be a distinct novelty. Elsie Janis will head the bill at Carnegie Music Hall. The program wi be light enough to entertain withou drawing hard upon the underlyin emotions of the audience and spe tators.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

The Musical Arts concert series was introduced last night at Elmwood Music hall, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, presented the concert.

Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying its forty-third season, and last evening he revealed the fine artistocracy of his musicianship in his conducting of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," in which he invested this work with a melodic beauty and vitality that made it strikingly conspicuous as a performance of virtuosity, and which received enthusiastic applause.

Mme. Cahier, who made her first appearance here, proved to be an artist of distinguished stage presence and superbly equipped in the interpretation of song. Her aria "Adieu, foret," from "Jeanne d'Arc," was delivered with consummate vocal style and won her several recalls.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.
NOV 9 1923

FIVE CONCERTS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

The coming season of Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry hall, will include five concerts on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. The soloists to appear at each of these are Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage; Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation and Jean Bedetti leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

This coming season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts.

He toured Europe four years at the head of the ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 9 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with their leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight at 8:15 and tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 p. m. The orchestra will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony" (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Wagner's Overture to "Reinzi." Tomorrow afternoon three Sixteenth Century Dances arranged by Respighi, Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Salome's Dance from [illegible] "Salome." The soloist [illegible] be Sigrid Onegin, [illegible] Metropoli-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

SIGRID ONEGIN.

The 104 musicians of the Boston symphony orchestra, together with their illustrious leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh early this afternoon in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight, at 8:15 o'clock and tomorrow afternoon, at 2:30 p. m. will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony," (in E minor); Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." Tomorrow afternoon three sixteenth century dances arranged by Respighi, Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Salome's dance from Richard Strauss' "Salome." The soloist at each concert will be Sigrid Onegin, the leading contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will sing notable arias and songs.

Big House [illegible] chestra and Opera Star. Program Varied One.

An audience of unusual proportions greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Mosque. It was the opening concert of a series of five symphonic programs and if those to follow maintain the high interest of last night's concert it promises to be a most successful season.

Assisting the orchestra as solo-attraction was Sigrid Onegin, the fascinating and competent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She was heard to advantage in two large arias.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a program that was at once catholic and representative. The Boston orchestra, under the baton of Monteux, impressed last night as he did years ago as a conductor who is sincere in his interpretations, as one who obtains effects without exaggeration, as a man who is a classicist and yet is by nature fond of the moderns.

His reading of the Rachmaninoff Symphonie No. 2 in E minor was an evidence of this. He gave the work a magnificent and faithful reading, in which he took great care that the cantilena flowed and that dynamics and nuance were observed. The opening movement with its sustained passages was gloriously treated. The second movement was a happy conception heavily orchestrated. The Adagio was sugared with the sweets of the Russian school until it sang itself away. The Finale was an imposing climax rich in cacaphony and replete in chromatic resolutions.

In the Brahms "Variation on a Theme of Haydn's" there was a certain versatility in which Monteux sought for the various choir-colorings and strove to bring out the contrasted theme-changes. It was slightly attenuated and somewhat lethargic.

The closing number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," was that old canto of the Roman patricians as we have often heard it. There was a fine blare of horns and the fiddles sang the "Santo spirito" prayer in commendable fashion.

The outstanding feature of the program was the singing of Sigrid Onegin. She has one of the finest and largest voices that has come here and every note that she touched was surcharged with fire and power. She has almost unbelievable scope, and while there is a slight glitter to her upper notes it adds immeasurably in a hall the size of the Mosque. Her interpretation of the [illegible] role was most enjoyable and she [illegible] the "Rienzi" scene an emotional [illegible] Pittsburghers don'

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ORCHESTRAL SEASON IN MOSQUE

By Burt McMurtrie.

The first concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, played by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, took place last night in Syria Mosque, amid the accompaniments of smiling faces, generous applause, and an audience that well nigh overflowed the big temple. The program comprised the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E Minor Op 27, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a," and the Wagner overture to "Rienzi." More enjoyable programs have been played by visiting symphonies to be sure, last night's program at times being more than dull, but few aggregations have put forth music so well played.

The conducting of Monteux is placid, thorough and sincere. There is strength, power and smouldering fire that occasionally bursts into flame behind his outward calm. Under Monteux the Boston Symphony is flexible and gratifyingly artistic.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony, a heavy, ponderous thing that is distinctly different from the customary Rachmaninoff, held moments of brilliance, especially in the Allegro vivace and the exquisitiveness of the Adagio. The rich body of string tone was perhaps the most notable qulaity of sound, as they strode through the Russian's exultant manuscript. Just why this symphony should have been chosen is a question, when pondering upon the many scores available, and by far, more enjoyable. The Variations upon Haydn is not the most unified structure of Brahms' erstwhile dabblings with other composers' themes, and indeed there are passages when one wishes he had been content to leave the original alone. The horns were effective as were the strings. The majestic cantilena of the violins, the abrupt switching from theme to theme, the tremolos in the strings and the hearty work of the wind instruments made the overture a thing of beauty.

It was a night of triumph for Sigrid Onegin, the Wagner-like contraito from the Metropolitan. She was a sensation, the thing of the hour, and she covered herself with glory. Her singing of the "Lament of Andromache" from "Achilles" was gloriously done, if a bit weak at times in the upper register, and her superb rendition of "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" from "Rienzi" had the audience upon its feet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL
NOV 9 1923

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT PROMISED FOR MONDAY

9

Of the Boston Symhony Ensemble, which comes to the auditorium next Monday evening, under the auspices of the Woman's club, the Boston Herald says: "Though every individual player can make his part agreeable to hear, the balance of parts is perfect. Mr. Vannini is a conductor of grace and warmth and fine rhythmic feeling. Last week this little orchestra showed how admirably it can play music of old-time written for small orchestra. It showed also that it can give an amazingly vivid impression of how music written for full orchestra should sound. It set forth this full-voiced music with ample sonority and an astonishing approximation to the original widely varied color, a feat of genuine skill. Mr. Vannini .... is a conductor of parts."

The price of tickets, for the concert $1, is remarkably small in view of the high quality of the artists, and it ins hoped there will be a capacity house. Tickets on sale at Mathushek's and J. A. V. Thomas' Music stores, and at the door.

SPEED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

PIERRE MONTEUX

Who is to conduct Boston Symphony here.

will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 11 1923

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first tour afield for this season during the past week, appearing in Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto Pierre Monteux gave a performance of Williams's "London Symphony." The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, when the respective soloists will be Sigrid Onegin for the evening concert and for the matinee Elizabeth Rethberg.

[illegible] concert in Toronto last [illegible] the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, performed Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." This concert was one of a tour which included Albany, Cornell University, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburg.

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 30. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. Remaining dates will be Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4, and the soloists will be Moritz Rosenthal, Jacques Thibaud, Jean Bedetti and Elisabeth Rethberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Symphony Was Heartily Applauded

Bruce Simonds, instructor of piano at the Yale School of Music, received an ovation last evening at Woolsey hall, while appearing as soloist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, given under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

It was a gala evening for Mr. Simonds and members of the faculty, as the young musician's many successful appearances, both in this country and abroad reached a climax last evening while playing as soloist with the distinguished orchestra. Mr. Simonds, following his able rendition of "The Franck Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, one of the most colorful of its kind, was warmly received both by the audience and members of the orchestra and its conductor, who congratulated him upon his ideal playing.

The brilliant program arranged by Conductor Monteux, was opened with the overture to Prodana Nevesta (The Sold Bride) by Smetana, sorrowful in its beginning but very cheerful in its ending.

The Symphony in E Minor No. 1, Opus No. 39, by Sibelus, a lengthy, but extremely fascinating arrangement, followed the opening number.

The symphony, which is characteristic of the country of its composer, opens with strange figures for the strings, with syncopated rhythms and defiant blasts from the brass. The Andante sings a folk song of simple melody and the allegro is varied in mood. The symphony is pulsated with life.

The program was concluded with Strauss' Salome dance from the music drama "Salome," very barbaric and oriental.

Pierre Monteux, who is well acquainted with his musicians and program, was many times recalled.

Golden Rule Sunday Has Strong Appea

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 11 1923

MUSIC was more a promise than a performance last week. In the dearth of offerings, the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday night and yesterday's matinee, in Syria Mosque, had an opportunity to please big audiences nowise surfeited by beauty of sound. The concerts opened the symphony season in Pittsburgh, and with Pierre Monteux directing and Sigrid Onegin, star contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist, the appeal to music lovers was of sufficient power to make the premiere important.

Following a custom that has added much to the enjoyment of symphony concerts, the varied programs of the two performances were analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd Thursday night, with two and four-hand illustrations of the numbers by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The new week will open with a program that is far enough away from the classic music of a symphony orchestra to be a distinct novelty. Elsie Janis will head the bill at Carnegie Music Hall. The program will be light enough to entertain without drawing hard upon the underlying emotions of the audience and spectators.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BUFFALO
N. Y.
ENQUIRER
NOV 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

The Musical Arts concert series was introduced last night at Elmwood Music hall, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a beautiful program with Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, as soloist. Bessie Bellanca, Buffalo manager, presented the concert.

Mr. Monteux, who returns to Europe at the close of the present season has added new laurels to this orchestral body, which is enjoying its forty-third season, and last evening he revealed the fine artistocracy of his musicianship in his conducting of the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," in which he invested this work with a melodic beauty and vitality that made it strikingly conspicuous as a performance of virtuosity, and which received enthusiastic applause.

Mme. Cahier, who made her first appearance here, proved to be an artist of distinguished stage presence and superbly equipped in the interpretation of song. Her aria "Adieu, foret," from "Jeanne d'Arc," was delivered with consummate vocal style and won her several recalls.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS, NOV 9 1923
Providence, R. I.

FIVE CONCERTS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON

The coming season of Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry hall, will include five concerts on the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 20, Dec. 11, Jan. 22, Feb. 26 and April 29. The soloists to appear at each of these are Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the great Swedish contralto; John Charles Thomas, the illustrious voiced American baritone, who has had such great success recently on the concert stage; Ethel Leginska and Carol Robinson, who figure among the foremost pianists of the younger generation and Jean Bedetti leader of the 'cellist section in the orchestra.

This coming season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion, is expected to return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts.

He toured Europe four years at the head of the ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 9 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with their leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight at 8:15 and tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 p. m. The orchestra will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony" (in E minor), Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and Wagner's Overture to "Reinzi." Tomorrow afternoon three Sixteenth Century Dances arranged by Respighi, Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" (in A major), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and [illegible] and Salome's Dance from [illegible] "Salome." The soloist [illegible] Sigrid Onegin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURG
PA.
Chronicle-Telegraph
[illegible] 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

SIGRID ONEGIN.

The 104 musicians of the Boston symphony orchestra, together with their illustrious leader, Pierre Monteux, arrived in Pittsburgh early this afternoon in readiness for their concerts in Syria Mosque tonight, at 8:15 o'clock and tomorrow afternoon, at 2:30 p. m. will present tonight Rachmaninov's "Second Symphony," (in E minor); Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." Tomorrow afternoon three sixteenth century dances [illegible] Respighi. Beethoven's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
SUN
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND ONEGIN PLEASE

Big House Greets Famous Orchestra and Opera Star. Program Varied One.

An audience of unusual proportions greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Mosque. It was the opening concert of a series of five symphonic programs and if those to follow maintain the high interest of last night's concert it promises to be a most successful season.

Assisting the orchestra as solo-attraction was Sigrid Onegin, the fascinating and competent contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She was heard to advantage in two large arias.

Pierre Monteux, conductor, presented a program that was at once catholic and representative. The Boston orchestra, under the baton of Monteux, impressed last night as he did years ago as a conductor who is sincere in his interpretations, as one who obtains effects without exaggeration, as a man who is a classicist and yet is by nature fond of the moderns.

His reading of the Rachmaninoff Symphonie No. 2 in E minor was an evidence of this. He gave the work a magnificent and faithful reading, in which he took great care that the cantilena flowed and that dynamics and nuance were observed. The opening movement with its sustained passages was gloriously treated. The second movement was a happy conception heavily orchestrated. The Adagio was sugared with the sweets of the Russian school until it sang itself away. The Finale was an imposing climax rich in cacaphony and replete in chromatic resolutions.

In the Brahms "Variation on a Theme of Haydn's" there was a certain versatility in which Monteux sought for the various choir-colorings and strove to bring out the contrasted theme changes. It was slightly attenuated and somewhat lethargic.

The closing number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," was that old canto of the Roman patricians as we have often heard it. There was a fine blare of horns and the fiddles sang the "Santo spirito" prayer in commendable fashion.

The outstanding feature of the program was the singing of Sigrid Onegin. She has one of the finest and largest voices that has come here and every note that she touched was surcharged with fire and power. She has almost unbelievable scope, and while there is a slight glitter to her upper notes it adds immensurably in a hall the size of the Mosque. Her interpretation of the [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PITTSBURGH,
PA.
PRESS
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ORCHESTRAL SEASON IN MOSQUE

By Burt McMurtrie.

The first concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, played by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, took place last night in Syria Mosque, amid the accompaniments of smiling faces, generous applause, and an audience that well nigh overflowed the big temple. The program comprised the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2 in E Minor Op 27, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a," and the Wagner overture to "Rienzi." More enjoyable programs have been played by visiting symphonies to be sure, last night's program at times being more than dull, but few aggregations have put forth music so well played.

The conducting of Monteux is placid, thorough and sincere. There is strength, power and smouldering fire that occasionally bursts into flame behind his outward calm. Under Monteux the Boston Symphony is flexible and gratifyingly artistic.

The Rachmaninoff Symphony, a heavy, ponderous thing that is distinctly different from the customary Rachmaninoff, held moments of brilliance, especially in the Allegro vivace and the exquisitiveness of the Adagio. The rich body of string tone was perhaps the most notable qulaity of sound, as they strode through the Russian's exultant manuscript. Just why this symphony should have been chosen is a question, when pondering upon the many scores available, and by far, more enjoyable. The Variations upon Haydn is not the most unified structure of Brahms' erstwhile dabblings with other composers' themes, and indeed there are passages when one wishes he had been content to leave the original alone

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, under the auspices of the Yale Music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note, Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL
NOV [illegible] 1923

DELIGHTFUL CONCERT PROMISED FOR MONDAY

9

Of the Boston Symhony Ensemble, which comes to the auditorium next Monday evening, under the auspices of the Woman's club, the Boston Herald says: "Though every individual player can make his part agreeable to hear, the balance of parts is perfect. Mr. Vannini is a conductor of grace and warmth and fine rhythmic feeling. Last week this little orchestra showed how admirably it can play music of old-time written for small orchestra. It showed also that it can give an amazingly vivid impression of how music written for full orchestra should sound. It set forth this full-voiced music with ample sonority and an astonishing approximation to the original widely varied color, a feat of genuine skill. Mr. Vannini .... is a conductor of parts."

The price of tickets, for the concert $1, is remarkably small in view of the high quality of the artists, and it ins hoped there will be a capacity house. Tickets on sale at Mathushek's and J. A. V. Thomas' Music stores, and at the door.

SPEED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 10 1923

PIERRE MONTEUX

Who is to conduct Boston Symphony here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 11 1923

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first tour afield for this season during the past week, appearing in Albany, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto Pierre Monteux gave a performance of Williams's "London Symphony." The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Orchestra.

At a notable concert in Toronto last Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, performed Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony." This concert was one of a tour which included Albany, Cornell University, Ithaca, Buffalo, Toronto and Pittsburg.

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 30. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist. Remaining dates will be Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 14 and April 4, and the soloists will be Moritz Rosenthal, Jacques Thibaud, Jean Bedetti and Elisabeth Rethberg.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 11 1923

The Boston Symphony Was Heartily Applauded

Bruce Simonds, instructor of piano at the Yale School of Music, received an ovation last evening at Woolsey hall, while appearing as soloist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, given under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

It was a gala evening for Mr. Simonds and members of the faculty, as the young musician's many successful appearances, both in this country and abroad reached a climax last evening while playing as soloist with the distinguished orchestra. Mr. Simonds, following his able rendition of "The Franck Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra, one of the most colorful of its kind, was warmly received both by the audience and members of the orchestra and its conductor, who congratulated him upon his ideal playing.

The brilliant program arranged by Conductor Monteux, was opened with the overture to Prodana Nevesta (The Sold Bride) by Smetana, sorrowful in its beginning but very cheerful in its ending.

The Symphony in E Minor No. 1, Opus No. 39, by Sibelus, a lengthy, but extremely fascinating arrangement, followed the opening number.

The symphony, which is characteristic of the country of its composer, opens with strange figures for the strings, with syncopated rhythms and defiant blasts from the brass. The Andante sings a folk song of simple melody and the allegro is varied in mood. The symphony is pulsated with life.

The program was concluded with Strauss' Salome dance from the music drama "Salome," very barbaric and oriental.

Pierre Monteux, who is well acquainted with his musicians and program, was many times recalled.

Golden Rule Sunday Has Strong Appea

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PITTSBURGH
PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
NOV 11 1923

MUSIC was more a promise than a performance last week. In the dearth of offerings, the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday night and yesterday's matinee, in Syria Mosque, had an opportunity to please big audiences nowise surfeited by beauty of sound. The concerts opened the symphony season in Pittsburgh, and with Pierre Monteux directing and Sigrid Onegin, star contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, soloist, the appeal to music lovers was of sufficient power to make the premiere important.

Following a custom that has added much to the enjoyment of symphony concerts, the varied programs of the two performances were analyzed at the Pittsburgh Musical Institute by Charles N. Boyd Thursday night, with two and four-hand illustrations of the numbers by Dallmyer Russell and William H. Oetting.

The new week will open with a program that is far enough away from the classic music of a symphony orchestra to be a distinct novelty. Elsie Janis will head the bill at Carnegie Music Hall. The program will be light enough to entertain without drawing hard upon the underlying emotions of the audience and spectators.

Providence, R. I. NOV 1 1 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN TUESDAY EVENING

Next Tuesday evening Nov. 20, in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7,

SIGRID ONEGIN
Swedish Contralto Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra In Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

1 1 1923

BOSTON ARTISTS TO PLAY HERE ON NOV. 27TH

Symphony Orchestra Coming to Woolsey Hall Under Auspices of Yale School of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening Nov. 27, under the auspices of the Yale Music School.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds the highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 1 1 1923

NEW HAVEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE ON NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 27, under the auspices of the Yale music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming coencert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his ability made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of other orchestra. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This his fifth season as conductor, also be his last, and promises e one of the finest, artistically ing, of them all. The Boston hony concerts have never been widely popular, nor the schedre crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 7 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra has just concluded its first tour of the current season. Concerts were given in Albany, Buffalo, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto, Mr. Monteux gave a rendition of Williams's "London Symphony," which had its first performance at Norfolk a year and a half ago. The New York season of the orchestra will open with concerts in Carnegie hall on November 29 and December 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

1 7 1923

THE OTHER ORCHESTRAS.

The New York Symphony Orchestra carries on its Beethoven cycle in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening with the "Eroica" symphony, the "Leonore" overture (No. 2), the finale of the ballet, "Prometheus," and vocal excerpts from "Fidelio," the latter to be sung by Elisabeth Rethberg, Jeannete Vreeland, James Price and Fred Patton.

The Philharmonic gives five concerts next week in Carnegie Hall. To-morrow afternoon Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony will be the principal number Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony and works by Glinka and Wagner make up the programme, and Saturday evening there will be a Tchaikovsky programme with Bronislaw Huberman, violinist, as soloist.

The Boston Orchestra opens its season of ten concerts here on Thursday evening a week and the following Saturday afternoon. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at the first, with Jan Sibelius's First Symphony featured. Mahler's First Symphony will be the chief item on the second programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

1 7 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS SOLOIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their forthcoming concert in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, November 28th, Overture to "The Sold Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' Music Drama "Salome." As soist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The New York season of Boston Symphony concerts will open in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

The present season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth unde

Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion is expected to return to own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne Concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the had of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was susequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his geniu has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE NEXT TUESDAY EVENING

Pierre Moneux's Farewell Season as Conductor of Orchestra.

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

GERMAN CROWDS COURTEOUS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 1923

* * *

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig." The orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula."

* * *

A musicale will be given on Tuesday night at 8 o'clock in the Central Baptist Church, under the auspices of the Women's Society, at which the following will appear: Miss Florence H. Slack, reader; William Iannone, baritone; William Cameron, harpist; Mrs. Howard Bacon, soprano, and Mrs. Jerome Farnum, accompanist.

* * *

The operalogue to be given at the home of Mrs. Caesar Misch next Tuesday night will be on "The Barber of Seville." On Nov. 27, Dr. Louis Chapman will discuss "The Siegfried Idyll."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

1 7 1923

It has been the province of Montclair to end the dearth of musical attractions in Essex County this season. Through the enterprise of the Rev. Edgar Swan Wiers and his Unity Concert course excellent pabulum for musical appetites has been provided. Of chief interest in the course is the appearance next Saturday evening in the Montclair High School of Ignace Paderewski, who arrived in New York last week. The Montclair recital will be the third concert of the great Pole in this season. It will be preceded only by recitals in Boston and Springfield. As a result a large influx of concert goers from New York may be expected Saturday.

Besides Mr. Paderewski's recital the second of the Symphony Concerts for young people, also under the auspices of the Unity course, will be given in Montclair High School on Tuesday evening. The attraction will be Charles Wakefield Cadman, celebrated American composer and pianist, who will be assisted by Princess Tsianina, an American Indian soprano. Mr. Cadman's opera "Shanewis," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House some seasons ago, was written for the Princess and is based on incidents in her life. As may be expected the program will consist almost entirely of Indian themes and tribal melodies in song and piano selections from Mr. Cadman's creations.

Following the Paderewski recital the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will appear in the High School on Wednesday, November 28. It will play the Rachmaninov E Minor Symphony, No. 2, opus 27; the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Altogether the Unity Courses are very much worth while.

John Charles Thomas Booked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

1 8 1923

An interesting score is to be performed by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their New York season next week will be the First Symphony of Mahler in D major—an early score which is said to be quite different in character from his later and larger-proportioned works.

With Madame Onegin as soloist at the Thursday concert, November 29, singing an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs, Pierre Monteux will also present the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, and Richard Strauss's Dance of Salome.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 1 8 1923

Opening Boston Symphony Program; Onegin, Soloist.

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their Brooklyn season of concerts, at the Academy, on Friday evening, Nov. 30: The First Symphony of Sibelius, in E minor; the "Danced Poem: La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

As soloist, Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto, who, in the opinion of many, is at her best on the concert platform, will sing the aria "O Righteous God!" from "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "Almighty" and the "Erl King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8 1923

Sigrid Onegin
Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 1 8 1923

RETURNING for the first time th season, the Boston Symphony O chestra will open its Carnegie Ha series ten days from now with Sibelius first symphony, the Brahms-Haydn v riations and Strauss's "Salome" danc Sigrid Onegin will sing two Schube songs and an air from "Rienzi." Co ductor Monteux opens also [illegible] series here with the [illegible] Mahler.

Mr. Bodanzky's [illegible] Friends of [illegible] Sunday at [illegible] Hall [illegible]

[146]

Providence, R. I. 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN TUESDAY EVENING

Next Tuesday evening Nov. 20, in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7,

SIGRID ONEGIN

Swedish Contralto Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra In Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

1 1923

OSTON ARTISTS TO PLAY HERE ON NOV. 27TH

Symphony Orchestra Coming to Woolsey Hall Under Auspices of Yale School of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, under the auspices of the Yale Music School.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds the highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 1923

NEW HAVEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE ON NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 27, under the auspices of the Yale music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming coencert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his ability made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of it's kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of other orchestra. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this enmble and to evoke from it a wonously eloquent performance.

uch a leader is Pierre Monteux. s. his fifth season as conductor, also be his last, and promises e one of the finest, artistically ing, of them all. The Boston ony concerts have never been widely popular, nor the schedre crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

The Boston Symphony orchestra has just concluded its first tour of the current season. Concerts were given in Albany, Buffalo, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto, Mr. Monteux gave a rendition of Williams's "London Symphony," which had its first performance at Norfolk a year and a half ago. The New York season of the orchestra will open with concerts in Carnegie hall on November 29 and December 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

1 7 1923

THE OTHER ORCHESTRAS.

The New York Symphony Orchestra carries on its Beethoven cycle in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening with the "Eroica" symphony, the "Leonore" overture (No. 2), the finale of the ballet, "Prometheus," and vocal excerpts from "Fidelio," the latter to be sung by Elisabeth Rethberg, Jeannete Vreeland, James Price and Fred Patton.

The Philharmonic gives five concerts next week in Carnegie Hall. To-morrow afternoon Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony will be the principal number Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony and works by Glinka and Wagner make up the programme, and Saturday evening there will be a Tchaikovsky programme with Bronislaw Huberman, violinist, as soloist.

The Boston Orchestra opens its season of ten concerts here on Thursday evening a week and the following Saturday afternoon. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at the first, with Jan Sibelius's First Symphony featured. Mahler's First Symphony will be the chief item on the second programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

7 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS SOLOIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their forthcoming concert in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, November 28th, Overture to "The Sold Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' Music Drama "Salome." As soist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The New York season of Boston Symphony concerts will open in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

The present season, which will b the 43rd of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, will be the fifth unde Pierre Monteux, who at its concl sion is expected to return to own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne Concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the had of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was susequently French conductor at the Metropolitar Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Bostor Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his geniu has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE NEXT TUESDAY EVENING

Pierre Moneux's Farewell Season as Conductor of Orchestra.

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

GERMAN CROWDS COURTEOUS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 1923

* * *

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig." The orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula."

* * *

A musicale will be given on Tuesday night at 8 o'clock in the Central Baptist Church, under the auspices of the Women's Society, at which the following will appear: Miss Florence H. Slack, reader; William Iannone, baritone; William Cameron, harpist; Mrs. Howard Bacon, soprano, and Mrs. Jerome Farnum, accompanist.

* * *

The operalogue to be given at the home of Mrs. Caesar Misch next Tuesday night will be on "The Barber of Seville." On Nov. 27, Dr. Louis Chapman will discuss "The Siegfried Idyll."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

It has been the province of Montclair to end the dearth of musical attractions in Essex County this season. Through the enterprise of the Rev. Edgar Swan Wiers and his Unity Concert course excellent pabulum for musical appetites has been provided. Of chief interest in the course is the appearance next Saturday evening in the Montclair High School of Ignace Paderewski, who arrived in New York last week. The Montclair recital will be the third concert of the great Pole in this season. It will be preceded only by recitals in Boston and Springfield. As a result a large influx of concert goers from New York may be expected Saturday.

Besides Mr. Paderewski's recital the second of the Symphony Concerts for young people, also under the auspices of the Unity course, will be given in Montclair High School on Tuesday evening. The attraction will be Charles Wakefield Cadman, celebrated American composer and pianist, who will be assisted by Princess Tsianina, an American Indian soprano. Mr. Cadman's opera "Shanewis," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House some seasons ago, was written for the Princess and is based on incidents in her life. As may be expected the program will consist almost entirely of Indian themes and tribal melodies in song and piano selections from Mr. Cadman's creations.

Following the Paderewski recital the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will appear in the High School on Wednesday, November 28. It will play the Rachmaninov Minor Symphony, No. 2, opus 27; the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Altogether the Unity Courses are very much worth while.

John Charles Thomas Booked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

8 1923

An interesting score is to be performed by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their New York season next week will be the First Symphony of Mahler in D major—an early score which is said to be quite different in character from his later and larger-proportioned works.

With Madame Onegin as soloist at the Thursday concert, November 29, singing an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs, Pierre Monteux will also present the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, and Richard Strauss's Dance of Some.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 1 8 1923

Opening Boston Symphony Program; Onegin, Soloist.

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their Brooklyn season of concerts, at the Academy, on Friday evening, Nov. 30: The First Symphony of Sibelius, in E minor; the "Danced Poem: Ea Peri," by Paul Dukas, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

As soloist, Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto, who, in the opinion of many, is at her best on the concert platform, will sing the aria "O Righteous God!" from "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "Almighty" and the "Erl King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 1 8 1923

RETURNING for the first time th season, the Boston Symphony O chestra will open its Carnegie Ha series ten days from now with Sibelius first symphony, the Brahms-Haydn v riations and Strauss's "Salome" danc Sigrid Onegin will sing two Schube songs and an air from "Rienzi." Co ductor Monteux opens als series here with the first symp Mahler.

Mr. Bodanzky's program for Friends of Music next Sunday at Hall will be

Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN TUESDAY EVENING

Next Tuesday evening Nov. 20, in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7,

SIGRID ONEGIN

Swedish Contralto Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra In Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

1 1 1923

BOSTON ARTISTS TO PLAY HERE ON NOV. 27TH

Symphony Orchestra Coming to Woolsey Hall Under Auspices of Yale School of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening, under [illegible] the auspices of the School. [illegible] probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant per[illegible] Pierre Monteux, for this [illegible] French conductors is ful[illegible] season at the head [illegible] orchestra, which is the last [illegible] contract. In the spring he [illegible] to return to his native coun[illegible] the demand for him is [illegible] virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds [illegible] highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming concert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his splendid musicianship made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NO 1 1923

—NEW HAVEN—

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE ON NOVEMBER 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make its only visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening, November 27, under the auspices of the Yale music school.

This will be probably the last opportunity to hear the brilliant performances of Pierre Monteux, for this greatest of French conductors is fulfilling his fifth season at the head of the orchestra, which is the last of his contract. In the spring he plans to return to his native country, where the demand for him is insistent.

A virtuoso of note—Bruce Simonds, the highly talented young pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra at the coming coencert. This artist played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the regular Boston concerts not long ago, when his ability made a most favorable impression.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of other orchestra. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

1 7 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra has just concluded its first tour of the current season. Concerts were given in Albany, Buffalo, Ithaca, Toronto and Pittsburgh. In Toronto, Mr. Monteux gave a rendition of Williams's "London Symphony," which had its first performance at Norfolk a year and a half ago. The New York season of the orchestra will open with concerts in Carnegie hall on November 29 and December 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

1 7 1923

THE OTHER ORCHESTRAS.

The New York Symphony Orchestra carries on its Beethoven cycle in Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening with the "Eroica" symphony, the "Leonore" overture (No. 2), the finale of the ballet, "Prometheus," and vocal excerpts from "Fidelio," the latter to be sung by Elisabeth Rethberg, Jeannete Vreeland, James Price and Fred Patton.

The Philharmonic gives five concerts next week in Carnegie Hall. To-morrow afternoon Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony will be the principal number Thursday evening and Friday afternoon Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony and works by Glinka and Wagner make up the programme, and Saturday evening there will be a Tchaikovsky programme with Bronislaw Huberman, violinist, as soloist.

The Boston Orchestra opens its season of ten concerts here on Thursday evening a week and the following Saturday afternoon. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at the first, with Jan Sibelius's First Symphony featured. Mahler's First Symphony will be the chief item on the second programme.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

7 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS SOLOIST OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their forthcoming concert in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, November 28th, Overture to "The Sold Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' Music Drama "Salome." As soist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The New York season of Boston Symphony concerts will open in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

The present season, which will be the 43rd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion is expected to return to own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne Concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the Opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the had of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was susequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE NEXT TUESDAY EVENING

Pierre Moneux's Farewell Season as Conductor of Orchestra.

Next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season.

A notable programme will introduce Pierre Monteux's farewell season as the conductor of the orchestra. It will include Beethoven's Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Dukas's "Danced Poem: La Peri," and Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

GERMAN CROWDS COURTEOUS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

1 8 192

* * *

Sigrid Onegin, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner, "Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig." The orchestra makes its first appearance of the season here on this occasion, and Mr. Monteux begins his last season here as conductor. The programme includes Beethoven's Symphony in A-Major, No. 7, Dukas's Danced Poem, "La Peri," and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntula."

* * *

A musicale will be given on Tuesday night at 8 o'clock in the Central Baptist Church, under the auspices of the Women's Society, at which the following will appear: Miss Florence H. Slack, reader; William Iannone, baritone; William Cameron, harpist; Mrs. Howard Bacon, soprano, and Mrs. Jerome Farnum, accompanist.

* * *

The operalogue to be given at the home of Mrs. Caesar Misch next Tuesday night will be on "The Barber of Seville." On Nov. 27, Dr. Louis Chapman will discuss "The Siegfried Idyll."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

It has been the province of Montclair to end the dearth of musical attractions in Essex County this season. Through the enterprise of the Rev. Edgar Swan Wiers and his Unity Concert course excellent pabulum for musical appetites has been provided. Of chief interest in the course is the appearance next Saturday evening in the Montclair High School of Ignace Paderewski, who arrived in New York last week. The Montclair recital will be the third concert of the great Pole in this season. It will be preceded only by recitals in Boston and Springfield. As a result a large influx of concert goers from New York may be expected Saturday.

Besides Mr. Paderewski's recital the second of the Symphony Concerts for young people, also under the auspices of the Unity course, will be given in Montclair High School on Tuesday evening. The attraction will be Charles Wakefield Cadman, celebrated American composer and pianist, who will be assisted by Princess Tsianina, an American Indian soprano. Mr. Cadman's opera "Shanewis," produced at the Metropolitan Opera House some seasons ago, was written for the Princess and is based on incidents in her life. As may be expected the program will consist almost entirely of Indian themes and tribal melodies in song and piano selections from Mr. Cadman's creations.

Following the Paderewski recital, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will appear in the High School on Wednesday, November 28. It will play the Rachmaninov E Minor Symphony, No. 2, opus 27; the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"; two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Altogether the Unity Courses are very much worth while.

John Charles Thomas Booked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

8 1923

An interesting score is to be performed by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their New York season next week will be the First Symphony of Mahler in D major—an early score which is said to be quite different in character from his later and larger-proportioned works.

With Madame Onegin as soloist at the Thursday concert, November 29, singing an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs, Pierre Monteux will also present the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, and Richard Strauss's Dance of Some.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 1 8 1923

Opening Boston Symphony Program; Onegin, Soloist.

The following program will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of their Brooklyn season of concerts, at the Academy, on Friday evening, Nov. 30: The First Symphony of Sibelius, in E minor; the "Danced Poem: La Peri," by Paul Dukas, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

As soloist, Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto, who, in the opinion of many, is at her best on the concert platform, will sing the aria "O Righteous God!" from "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "Almighty" and the "Erl King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8 19

Sigrid Onegin

Metropolitan Opera Contralto is Soloist with Opening Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Night at Infantry Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 1 8 1923

RETURNING for the first time th[illegible] season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Carnegie Hall series ten days from now with Sibelius' first symphony, the Brahms-Haydn variations and Strauss's "Salome" dance. Sigrid Onegin will sing two Schubert songs and an air from "Rienzi." Conductor Monteux opens also [illegible] series here with the first [illegible] Mahler.

Mr. Bodanzky's [illegible] for [illegible] Friends of Music next Sunday at [illegible] Hall [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 18 1923

MUSICAL MENTION

Like many an artist who has achieved world fame, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the world renowned contralto who sings at the Albee Theatre this afternoon in the first concert of the Second Steinert series, had many trying obstacles to overcome in her early efforts to be recognized. Her parents were very poor and she herself was handicapped by an unprepossessing appearance. When she first applied at the opera in Vienna for a position at the age of 16 she presented such an impoverished appearance that the director said: "You had better go home and get fed up and then go to a finishing school."

She was taught singing by Marietta Leclair, who it appears was the only person in the world aside from Ernestine who believed in the ultimate success of the girl and who gave her lessons free.

Her first success was at Dresden, where she sang for $600 a year; she remained there four years acquiring a repertoire and then was engaged for important roles in Hamburg. In 1892 she made her London debut, alternating at Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1898, Maurice Grau, then manager of the Metropolitan, secured her at large expense to come to America, since which time she has been the leading figure in our operatic and concert activities.

It is often wondered who will or who can replace Mme. Schumann-Heink when that famous prima donna is taken from our concert halls. Of course, there appears to be no immediate necessity for apprehension on that score because the wonderful woman is still singing to huge audiences everywhere and the press reviews of her concerts glow as always with enthusiasm and wonder at an art ever new and a voice that remains one of the marvels of the world.

Mme. Schumann-Heink has prepared a very interesting and varied program for her concert to-day and she will be assisted by Florence Hardemann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffmann, accompanist.

The program announced is as follows:

1.—(a) "Mitrane aria" (Italian), Rossi; (b) "O, Rest in the Lord" (from Elijah), Mendelssohn—Bartholdy; (c) "Ah, Mon Fils" from the Opera "Le Prophete", Meyerbeer, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

2.—Concerto No. 2 (first movement), Vieuxtemps, Florence Hardemann.

3.—(a) "Ich liebe dich", L. Von Beethoven; (b) "When the Roses Bloom" Louise Reichardt; (c) "Erlkonig" Franz Schubert; (d) "Haiderdslein" Franz Schubert; (e) "Dreamland Gates" Charles Huerter; Mme. Schumann-Heink.

4.—(a) Variations, Tartini-Kreisler; (b) Guitare," Moszkowski; (c) "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; (d) "Caprice Basque," Sarasate; Florence Hardemann.

5.—(a) "There is no Death," O'Hara; (b) "Sweetheart," Humphrey Stewart; (c) "Kerry Dance," Malloy; (d) "Someone Worth While," Ward Stephens; (e) "Bolero," (Leggiero invisible), by request, L. Arditi; Mme Schumann-Heink.

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon, Nov. 25th, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egoists, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say 'it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God.'" But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. DePachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents.

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's sonata, Beethoven of the early period, Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendelssohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and of course, much by [illegible].

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy. The critics have seen fit to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there has been no dis- [illegible] as the prime distiller of [illegible] his genius [illegible] never [illegible]

[illegible] will play an all Chopin program. The program announced is as follows:

1—Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 1, c sharp minor. Third Ballade, Op. 47, A flat major. Fourth Scherzo, Op. 54, E major.

2—Etude, Op. 10, No. 7, C. major. Etude, Op. 25 No. 2, F minor. Etude, Op. 25, No. 3, F major. Etude C., Op. 25, No. 7, C sharp minor. Berceuse, Op. 57, D flat major. Polonaise, Op. 40, No. 1, A major.

Prelude, Op. 28, No. 3, G major. Prelude, Op. 28, No. 2 2,G minor. Prelude, Op. 28, No. 15 D flat major. Mazurka, Op. 67, No. 4 A minor. Mazurka, Op. 33, No. 4 B minor Valse, Op. 70, No. 1, G flat major. Valse (Posthumous), E minor. Valse, Op. 70, No. 1, G flat major. Grande Valse, Op. 42, A flat major.

Quite the most welcome announcement that has been made this season so far as music is concerned is that Eva Gauthier is coming to give a recital here at the Churchill House, Nov. 19. At one recital at least we are assured of something new, something interesting, something out of the routine of out-worn Italian airs, German lieder and syrupy songs in our own vernacular, for Gauthier is nothing if not different and she is of a widely exploring spirit. She has traveled and sung through most of the world and she is music's true cosmopolitan.

She is a Canadian, of French stock, a native of Ottawa, a daughter of Louis Gauthier, the distinguished astronomer and explorer, and a niece of the late Sir Wilfred Laurier, Canada's greatest statesman of the past generation. It was he that encouraged her in her musical studies, sending her to Paris when she was thirteen years old. Even then she had a voice to be reckoned with and by the time she set seriously to the work of its cultivation it had developed into a most uncommon mezzo-soprano, almost contralto, of wide range and unusual power.

First she studied with Dubule and she went to Jacques Bouhy, the greatest singing teacher of his day. With him she worked for four years and then, going to London, she was immediately engaged as mezzo soprano in the company that accompanied Madame Albani on the concert tours that this beloved singer made through Great Britain. And when Albani came to Canada to make her farewell tour of fifty concerts, Gauthier with her.

Shortly after this she made her debut in New York and since that day she has been one of the best liked and most highly esteemed singers in this country. She has sung much in France and upon the continent in general. She has sung in the Orient, the mysterious Far East and she has been bold enough to give a series of five song recitals in Greenwich Village, New York.

With boldness and courage, an innovator who broke through deadly routine, is Eva Gauthier, the French Canadian soprano. She returned from a sojourn in the Far East, bringing with her some fascinatingly exotic folk-songs of the Javanese and the Malays and she put some of these on her programs to the delight of lovers of music. Then she went further, she added to her lists of songs other music that was strange and new, until a Gauthier recital came to be known as something unique and altogether delightful, a refuge from the hackneyed and the shop-worn. How successful this interesting artist has been can be seen from the fact that she was able to give a series of five recitals in the Greenwich Village Theatre in New York, all to crowded houses and then repeated some of these programs further uptown.

Next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20th, in Infantry Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season, with Pierre Monteux in his final year as conductor.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony in A major, Number 7, Dukas's Dancer Poem "La Peri," and Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

[147]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL

NOV [illegible] 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ENJOYED

A large audience greatly appreciated the concert given last evening at City hall auditorium by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, which was brought here under the auspices of the Meriden Woman's club.

This was the Ensemble's second appearance in this city and without doubt will not be the last as it was evident last evening that the type of music offered by the Boston Symphony players held the favor of Meriden's music lovers. The majority of selections offered were familiar to many in the audience, which added to the satifaction of the listeners.

The concert was conducted by Augusto Vannini, and the members of the Ensemble were as follows:

H. Sauviet, concert master; R. Gundersen, violin; H. Warner, violin; C. Wynbergen, viola; J. Langendoen, 'cello; O. Ludwig, bass; P. Amerena, flute; H. Stanislaus, oboe; P. Mimart, clarinet; G. Mager, trumpet; B. Wendler, horn; A. DeVoto, piano.

HITLER IS ARRESTED.

[illegible] olph Hitler

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

V 14 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON NOVEMBER 28

Pierre Monteux has made the following programme for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here which will take place in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, November 28: Overture to "The Bastered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama "Salome". As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted painist will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of the season, where the demand for him is insistant. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting.

THREE BARGE CREWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 18 1923

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the ballet is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale may be read in Mr. Hale's programme notes. Here it will suffice to say that this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture to the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation or summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color, "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 12 1923

On the same evening in Albany a society audience at the hall greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sudden death of Mrs. Alonzo P. Adams, Sr., cast a gloom over a large circle of friends of the family, including Mrs. Edwin Van Wormer, Mrs. Edward G. Cox of Albany and Mrs. John Hayes of Naugatuck, Conn., and Alonzo P. Adams, Jr., children of Mrs. Adams.

Today's morning concert at the Strand, like that of a week ago, was also of deep appeal to music lovers and few were the widely known families not represented at this affair, which gives promise of increased interest with the advance of the winter

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 22 1923

[illegible] in the Phi[illegible] while her husband was stationed there.

NOTABLE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 27. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and beloved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

Secrets Of The M

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 8 1923

MUSICAL MENTION

Like many an artist who has achieved world fame, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the world renowned contralto who sings at the Albee Theatre this afternoon in the first concert of the Second Steinert Series, had many trying obstacles to overcome in her early efforts to be recognized. Her parents were very poor and she herself was handicapped by an unprepossessing appearance. When she first applied at the opera in Vienna for a position at the age of 16 she presented such an impoverished appearance that the director said: "You had better go home and get fed up and then go to a finishing school."

She was taught singing by Marietta Leclair, who it appears was the only person in the world aside from Ernestine who believed in the ultimate success of the girl and who gave her lessons free.

Her first success was at Dresden, where she sang for 800 a year; she remained there four years acquiring a repertoire and then was engaged for important roles in Hamburg. In 1892 she made her London debut, alternating at Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1898, Maurice Grau, then manager of the Metropolitan, secured her at large expense to come to America, since which time she has been the leading figure in our operatic and concert activities.

It is often wondered who will or who can replace Mme. Schumann-Heink when that famous prima donna is taken from our concert halls. Of course, there appears to be no immediate necessity for apprehension on that score because the wonderful woman is still singing to huge audiences everywhere and the press reviews of her concerts glow as always with enthusiasm and wonder at an art ever new and a voice that remains one of the marvels of the world.

Mme. Schumann-Heink has prepared a very interesting and varied program for her concert to-day and she will be assisted by Florence Hardemann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffmann, accompanist.

The program announced is as follows:

1—(a) "Mitrane aria" (Italian), Rossi; (b) "O, Rest in the Lord" (from Elijah), Mendelssohn—Bartholdy; (c) "Ah, Mon Fils" from the Opera "Le Prophete", Meyerbeer, Mme. Schumann-Heink.

2—Concerto No. 2 (first movement), Vieuxtemps, Florence Hardemann.

3—(a) "Ich liebe dich", L. Von Beethoven; (b) "When the Roses Bloom" Louise Reichardt; (c) "Erlkonig" Franz Schubert; (d) "Haiderdslein" Franz Schubert; (e) "Dreamland Gates" Charles Huerter; Mme. Schumann-Heink.

4—(a) Variations, Tartini-Kreisler; (b) Guitare," Moszkowski; (c) "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; (d) "Caprice Basque," Sarasate; Florence Hardemann.

5—(a) "There is no Death," O'Hara; (b) "Sweetheart," Humphrey Stewart; (c) "Kerry Dance," Malloy; (d) "Someone Worth While," Ward Stephens; (e) "Bolero," (Leggiero invisible), by request, L. Arditi; Mme Schumann-Heink.

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon, Nov. 25th, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egoists, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say 'it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God.'" But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. DePachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents.

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendelssohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and of course, [illegible]

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy. The critics have seen fit to disagree. Over DePachmann [illegible] there has been no dis- [illegible] distiller of [illegible] never all Chopin program. The program announced is as follows:

1—Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 1, c sharp minor. Third Ballade, Op. 47, A flat major. Fourth Scherzo, Op. 54, E major.

2—Etude, Op. 10, No. 7, C. major. Etude, Op. 25, No. 2, F minor. Etude, Op. 25, No. 3, F major. Etude C., Op. 25, No. 7, C sharp minor. Berceuse, Op. 57, D flat major. Polonaise, Op. 40, No. 1, A major.

Prelude, Op. 28, No. 3, G major. Prelude, Op. 28, No. 2 2,G minor. Prelude, Op. 28, No. 15, D flat major. Mazurka, Op. 67, No. 4 A minor. Mazurka, Op. 33, No. 4 B minor Valse, Op. 70, No. 1, G flat major. Valse (Posthumous), E minor. Valse, Op. 70, No. 1, G flat major. Grande Valse, Op. 42, A flat major.

Quite the most welcome announcement that has been made this season so far as music is concerned is that Eva Gauthier is coming to give a recital here at the Churchill House, Nov. 19. At one recital at least we are assured of something new, something interesting, something out of the routine of out-worn Italian airs, German lieder and syrupy songs in our own vernacular, for Gauthier is nothing if not different and she is of a widely exploring spirit. She has traveled and sung through most of the world and she is music's true cosmopolitan.

She is a Canadian, of French stock, a native of Ottawa, a daughter of Louis Gauthier, the distinguished astronomer and explorer, and a niece of the late Sir Wilfred Laurier, Canada's greatest statesman of the past generation. It was he that encouraged her in her musical studies, sending her to Paris when she was thirteen years old. Even then she had a voice to be reckoned with and by the time she set seriously to the work of its cultivation it had developed into a most uncommon mezzo-soprano, almost contralto, of wide range and unusual power.

First she studied with Dubule and she went to Jacques Bouhy, the greatest singing teacher of his day. With him she worked for four years and then, going to London, she was immediately engaged as mezzo soprano in the company that accompanied Madame Albani on the concert tours that this beloved singer made through Great Britain. And when Albani came to Canada to make her farewell tour of fifty concerts, Gauthier with her.

Shortly after this she made her debut in New York and since that day she has been one of the best liked and most highly esteemed singers in this country. She has sung much in France and upon the continent in general. She has sung in the Orient, the mysterious Far East and she has been bold enough to give a series of five song recitals in Greenwich Village, New York.

With boldness and courage, an innovator who broke through deadly routine, is Eva Gauthier, the French Canadian soprano. She returned from a sojourn in the Far East, bringing with her some fascinatingly exotic folk-songs of the Javanese and the Malays and she put some of these on her programs to the delight of lovers of music. Then she went further, she added to her lists of songs other music that was strange and new, until a Gauthier recital came to be known as something unique and altogether delightful, a refuge from the hackneyed and the shop-worn. How successful this interesting artist has been can be seen from the fact that she was able to give a series of five recitals in the Greenwich Village Theatre in New York, all to crowded houses and then repeated some of these programs further uptown.

Next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20th, in Infantry Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its opening concert of the Providence season, with Pierre Monteux in his final year as conductor.

The program will include Beethoven's Symphony in A major, Number 7, Dukas's Dancer Poem "La Peri," and Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala."

The distinguished soloist of the evening will be Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company who, although in America only one season, has taken a supreme place among the singers of the day. She is praised even more in concert than in opera. She will sing with the orchestra two songs by Wagner—"Schmerzen" and "Traume," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkonig."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN
CONN.
JOURNAL

NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ENJOYED

A large audience greatly appreciated the concert given last evening at City hall auditorium by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, which was brought here under the auspices of the Meriden Woman's club.

This was the Ensemble's second appearance in this city and without doubt will not be the last as it was evident last evening that the type of music offered by the Boston Symphony players held the favor of Meriden's music lovers. The majority of selections offered were familiar to many in the audience, which added to the satifaction of the listeners.

The concert was conducted by Augusto Vannini, and the members of the Ensemble were as follows:

H. Sauviet, concert master; R. Gundersen, violin; H. Warner, violin; C. Wynbergen, viola; J. Langendoen, 'cello; O. Ludwig, bass; P. Amerena, flute; H. Stanislaus, oboe; P. Mimart, clarinet; G. Mager, trumpet; B. Wendler, horn; A. DeVoto, piano.

HITLER IS ARRESTED.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

V14 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE ON NOVEMBER 28

Pierre Monteux has made the following programme for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here which will take place in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening, November 28: Overture to "The Bastered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama "Salome". As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted painist will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of the season, where the demand for him is insistant. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting.

THREE BARGE CREWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 8 192

Brilliance Marks Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for Opening Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many and various are the interpretations that have been placed upon Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its concert at Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening. Yet the wise listener is he who hears this music for itself alone, without thought of programme or poetic connotation. Save for the almost solemn second movement the most joyous of the symphonies of Beethoven, the Seventh, has more than once been rated the most beautiful of them all, and it is a verdict more readily maintained than refuted.

There is dispute as to the date of Beethoven's beginning work upon this symphony, but we have the composer's own assurance that the score was completed by July, 1812, and its first public performance was at Vienna in December of the following year. Much of the music of Beethoven was not understood by his contemporaries, but this Seventh Symphony seems immediately to have won its way to popular favor and at this first, and again at later performances, the Allegretto was repeated.

Spacious and majestic is the introduction to the first movement, with its broad scale passages for strings against sustained harmonies in the brass and woodwind. But flutes and violins are soon hinting at a livelier rhythm, and gradually the way is prepared for the gay and spirited movement that follows. The infectious, lilting, rhythmic figure upon which this Vivace is based persists almost without cessation, but never to monotony. Rather the hearer is swept along on an irresistible flood of joyous tones.

With the ensuing Allegretto comes a sudden change of mood. Flutes, oboes and clarinets sound the chord of A minor and violas, 'cellos and basses in their lowest register softly intone an insistently rhythmed theme, half wistful, half melancholy. Thrice repeated, each time an octave higher and with richer instrumentation, this theme, at last proclaimed with the full force of the orchestra, becomes broadly impressive, assuming the guise of a stately march. With its subsiding comes an interlude of gentle song for clarinets and bassoons. The initial theme then reappears, and through the rest of the movement it is variously treated, embroidered with figurations and passed from one instrument to another until at length descending to the depths from which it rose, it relapses into silence. And the bodeful, opening chord, sounded once more by the woodwind, brings the end.

And now Beethoven shakes off his brief sadness to enter upon a brisk and lightsome Scherzo, in which a gently songful Trio, based on a pilgrim hymn of Lower Austria, makes effective foil. Scherzo and pilgrim hymn are each repeated, and then ensues the tumultuous, onrushing Finale that Wagner saw fit to term the "apotheosis of the dance." A frenzied, almost a bacchanalian music is this, without parallel or analogy in the length and breadth of Beethoven's other music . . . Not since November, 1918, it may be added, has the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this Seventh Symphony in Providence.

Besides two songs by Schubert and two by Wagner to be sung by Mme. Onegin, two more orchestra pieces make the programme. The first of these, "La Peri" of Dukas, has been but twice heard in Boston and this will be its first performance in Providence. This was, in its original estate, music for a ballet, and the composer has named it a "Danced Poem." The story upon which the balle is based, a fantastic and elaborate tale may be read in Mr. Hale's programme notes. Here it will suffice to say tha this music of Dukas, one of the foremost of living French composers, is poetic imaginative, and of ravishing orchestration.

Likewise glowingly scored is the second of these pieces, Goldmark's Overture t the Sanskrit legend "Sakuntala," unheard in Providence, at least from the Boston Orchestra, since 1915. This, too, has a "programme" too long for quotation o summary in this place. But Goldmark's music scarcely stands in need of explanation. Indeed, were its title simply that of Overture on an Oriental Theme, the listener's enjoyment of the piece would be no less keen. First performed at Vienna in 1865, when Goldmark, then virtually unknown, was in his 36th year, this Overture brought its author immediate and enduring fame. Rich in melody, in harmony and in instrumental color, "Sakuntala" is perhaps the finest work of a composer who caught with singular felicity the opulence, the charm and the fragrance of the East.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY,
N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 1 2 192

On the same evening in Albany a society audience at the hall greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sudden death of Mrs. Alonzo P. Adams, Sr., cast a gloom over a large circle of friends of the family, including Mrs. Edwin Van Wormer, Mrs. Edward G. Cox of Albany and Mrs. John Hayes of Naugatuck, Conn., and Alonzo P. Adams, Jr., children of Mrs. Adams.

Today's morning concert at the Strand, like that of a week ago, was also of deep appeal to music lovers and few were the widely known families not represented at this affair, which gives promise of increased interest with the advance of the winter

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 2 2 192

[illegible] in the Phi[illegible] while her husband was stationed there.

NOTABLE BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 27. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and beloved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM NEWS, NOV 16 1923
Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Opening Concert of the Coming Season In Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Providence season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, with Madame Sigrid Onegin, famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the mightiest ever written, and surely one of the greatest of the immortal nine. By virtue of its insistent and propulsive rhythms, this symphony was described by Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance." It is particularly famous for the Allegretto, which serves as a slow movement.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Dukas' "Danced Poem, La Peri," a modern French score of descriptive suggestion and delicate coloring—also Goldmark's popular overture to "Sakuntala."

Madame Onegin will sing with the orchestra a group of arias and songs to be announced later. This prima donna first came to America last autumn and with her debut her fame was immediate and complete. Her voice is said to be at even finer advantage in concert than in opera.

Vladimir De Pachmann

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist, who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon Nov. 25, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egosits, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God." But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. dePachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's A-major sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendellsohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and, of course, much by Chopin.

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy. The critics seem to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there have been no dissenting voices; as the prime distiller of tonal loveliness his genius has never been challenged.

Other Coming Events

John B. Archer will speak on the music of Russia at his third lecture recital tonight in Memorial Hall under the auspices of the School of Design. The illustrations will be given by Madame Claudia Rhea Fournier, contralto; May Atwood Anderson and Ruth Tripp, pianists.

The meeting of the Schubert Club which was omitted last Monday because of the observance of Armistice Day will take place next Monday.

Florence Hardmann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, will assist Mme. Schumann Heink at her concert at the Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon. The concert will be the first in the second of the Steinert series. The other artists in the series will be Feodor Chaliapin, who comes Jan. 6, and Efrem Zimbalist on March 2.

Madame Emma Calve, the famous French diva and one of the greatest singers of the Carmen role on the grand opera stage will appear in concert in the Albee Theatre on Sunday evening, Dec. 2, under the auspices of the Kiwanis Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 21 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Given Hearty Greeting as He Starts Last Concert Series.

SIDRID ONEGIN SOLOIST

Orchestra Members Show Virtuosity in Rendition of Dukas's Colorful Ballet Music.—Singer Receives Ovation

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Infantry Hall last evening. It was the organization's first appearance here this season and M. Monteux's programme proved one of sustained interest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony in A major led the list of orchestral offerings, the modern French "La Peri: Poeme Dahse," by Dukas, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, featuring the programme's second half. Segrid Onegin, Metropolitan era contralto, was the soloist.

This will be M. Monteux's final year conductor of the Boston orchestra, as returns to France at the conclusion the concert season. As he came forrd for the opening symphony last eveg he was given an unusually hearty eeting, it doubtless coming to the mind many in the audience what this conlentious and capable leader has accomished since he was called to the coictor's desk a few seasons ago. Sooter assuming this leadership he wanfronted with the task of welding in artistic unit a comparatively new estra. A shakeup in personnel ma is work doubly difficult, and that he ha ght his forces to their present sta efficiency is convincing proof of h h qualities as an orchestral conducto Since M. Monteux's advent there ha n a tremenodus awakening of interes the Boston orchestra's concerts here st season, attendance at each event in e series was very large and last eveng's big crowd offered pleasing indicaon of the continued interest in their conerts and a sure growth in appreciation f orchestral music in this city.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

In the symphony M. Monteux was give a fine chance to reveal his qualification as an interpreter of Beethoven, for thi particular work shows the master write of symphonic music in varying moods. It is a work that holds great reward for the conductor. It is a massive tone picture which glows with rich and beautiful tonal coloring as the imagination of the interpreting mind dictates. Whatever scenes or events inspired it, and there seems to be considerable doubt what Beethoven had in mind while writing its four movements, the symphony is music that comes straight from the heart of its creator and makes corresponding appea to the hearer.

There are those who consider M. Monteux a specialist in the interpretation o the moderns, particularly of the Frenc school, rather than a musician natural fitted to reach the heights in the presentation of Brahms or Beethoven. It is difficult to understand this estimate of th French conductor's ability after hearin him conduct many times the finest work of those great classicists. Last evenin little fault could be found with th breadth, the dignity and beauty read int the score of the A-major symphony. was a magnificent performance both b conductor and players.

THRILLING EFFECT

The Dukas number again showed eader's imaginative gifts and likewise virtuosity of his men. Modern harm treatment with its strange effects striking coloring here bring a serie surprises to the listener. The Goldm overture is one that discloses the Hungarian temperament to the full many occasions, and, at the finale, th is brilliancy and to spare in orchestra and execution. The men entered into spirit of the piece with an abandon was thrilling in effect.

Sigrid Onegin received tumultuous plause after her two solo numbers. he two Wagner songs, "Traume" sung with the finer artistry. The " king" showed her to be a singer of peramental qualities, her presentation this song being accompanied by more or less acting. Her voice is strong and telling. It is a voice that easily asserts itself in the midst of full orchestral accompaniment. At the conclusion of "The Erlking" she was given an ovation. Mme. Onegin has a very pleasing presence. This, coupled with her fine vocal gifts, completely won her audience. Her songs were as follows:

Schmerzen
Traume	Wagner
Die Allmacht	Wagner
Erikonig	Schubert
	Schubert

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 24 1923

opportunity to demonstration of

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY THRONG

Sigrid Onegin, Contralto, Shares Honors with Orchestra in Providence.

Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening and a great throng extended an enthusiastic greeting to Conductor Pierre Monteux and his players. It was a glorious opening of a season rich in promise of wonderful things, with a splendid company of players, fresh, unwearied and full of enthusiasm and a soloist new to Providence, who made an instant impression.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang four songs, two each by Wagner and Schubert. She is a woman of commanding, even heroic presence, possessing a voice fully capable of withstanding the test imposed by the accompaniment of a great orchestra. Wagner's "Traume" was gloriously sung, but it remained for her rendition of the "Erlking" of Schubert to awaken the audience to its fullest appreciation.

This noble work was sung with dramatic intensity and power of interpretation rarely heard, reaching a climax which swept the audience before it. A torrent of applause followed, bringing the singer back to the stage time and again to acknowledge the volume of praise.

The symphony, first number on the programme, was played with fine feeling and precision, which was praticularly impressive in the third movement. It swept to a stirring finish in the story fourth movement, described in the programme book as "a wild rondo on two themes," providing a climax which last evening evoked a thunderous response.

The other two orchestral numbers were "LaPeri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, a French composition thoroughly modern, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The former bristles with unusual features, and as might be expected it was interpreted with enthusiasm by M. Monteaux as a modernist himself and a compatriot of the composer. The "Sakuntala" overture was splendidly played and brought a fi[illegible] concert to a fitting close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER

NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert at Woolsey Hall, November 27

For its only concert of the season here, in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievements in symphonic music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps none will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seveu Veils from Richard Strauss' Music rama, "Salome", a score of much scriptive beauty and power, which ilizes the utmost in numbers and ll of the modern symphony orches-s soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is racting increasing attention by his ll and artistry, will appear with orchestra in Cesar Franck's ymphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

For its only concert of the season here in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievement in symphony music The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps one will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Straus's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

"Happy Go Lucky"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

NOV 22 1923

concert tomorrow evening, at Sanders' theater in Cambridge before the union dance.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

There will be a tea at the Boston Yale club after the game on Saturday.

* * *

Chief Justice William Howard Taft was elected honorary governor of the National Society, Sons and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA

NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST NEW YORK RECITAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday with the first Sibelius Symphony in E Minor. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist, singing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs with orchestras; the first Mahler symphony and Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute will be the principal numbers Saturday afternoon. The Sibelius symphony and the solo numbers of Mme. Onegin will be played in Brooklyn, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

[148]

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM NOV 16 1923
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Opening Concert of the Coming Season In Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Providence season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, with Madame Sigrid Onegin, famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the mightiest ever written, and surely one of the greatest of the immortal nine. By virtue of its insistent and propulsive rhythms, this symphony was described by Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance." It is particularly famous for the Allegretto, which serves as a slow movement.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Dukas' "Danced Poem, La Peri," a modern French score of descriptive suggestion and delicate coloring—also Goldmark's popular overture to "Sakuntala."

Madame Onegin will sing with the orchestra a group of arias and songs to be announced later. This prima donna first came to America last autumn and with her debut her fame was immediate and complete. Her voice is said to be at even finer advantage in concert than in opera.

Vladimir De Pachmann

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist, who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon Nov. 25, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egosits, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God." But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. de-Pachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's A-major sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendellsohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and, of course, much by Chopin.

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy The critics seem to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there have been no dissenting voices; as the prime distiller of tonal loveliness his genius has never been challenged.

Other Coming Events

John B. Archer will speak on the music of Russia at his third lecture recital tonight in Memorial Hall under the auspices of the School of Design. The illustrations will be given by Madame Claudia Rhea Fournier, contralto; May Atwood Anderson and Ruth Tripp, pianists.

The meeting of the Schubert Club which was omitted last Monday because of the observance of Armistice Day will take place next Monday.

Florence Hardmann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, will assist Mme. Schumann Heink at her concert at the Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon. The concert will be the first in the second of the Steinert series. The other artists in the series will be Feodor Chaliapin, who comes Jan. 6, and Efrem Zimbalist on March 2.

Madame Emma Calve, the famous French diva and one of the greatest singers of the Carmen role on the grand opera stage will appear in concert in the Albee Theatre on Sunday evening, Dec. 2, under the auspices of the Kiwanis Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

V21 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Given Hearty Greeting as He Starts Last Concert Series.

SIDRID ONEGIN SOLOIST

Orchestra Members Show Virtuosity in Rendition of Dukas's Colorful Ballet Music.—Singer Receives Ovation

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Infantry Hall last evening. It was the organization's first appearance here this season and M. Monteux's programme proved one of sustained interest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony in A major led the list of orchestral offerings, the modern French "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, featuring the programme's second half. Segrid Onegin, Metropolitan era contralto, was the soloist.

This will be M. Monteux's final year conductor of the Boston orchestra, as returns to France at the conclusion the concert season. As he came for rd for the opening symphony last eve ng he was given an unusually hearty eeting, it doubtless coming to the mind many in the audience what this con lentious and capable leader has accom ished since he was called to the co ictor's desk a few seasons ago. Soon ter assuming this leadership he wa nfronted with the task of welding in n artistic unit a comparatively new estra. A shakeup in personnel ma is work doubly difficult, and that he ha ught his forces to their present sta efficiency is convincing proof of h h qualities as an orchestral conducto Since M. Monteux's advent there ha en a tremenodus awakening of interes the Boston orchestra's concerts here st season, attendance at each event in e series was very large and last eve ng's big crowd offered pleasing indica on of the continued interest in their con erts and a sure growth in appreciation f orchestral music in this city.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

In the symphony M. Monteux was give a fine chance to reveal his qualification as an interpreter of Beethoven, for this particular work shows the master writer of symphonic music in varying moods. It is a work that holds great reward for the conductor. It is a massive tone picture which glows with rich and beautiful tonal coloring as the imagination of the interpreting mind dictates. Whatever scenes or events inspired it, and there seems to be considerable doubt what Beethoven had in mind while writing its four movements, the symphony is music that comes straight from the heart of its creator and makes corresponding appea to the hearer.

There are those who consider M. Monteux a specialist in the interpretation of the moderns, particularly of the Frenc school, rather than a musician naturall fitted to reach the heights in the presentation of Brahms or Beethoven. It is difficult to understand this estimate of the French conductor's ability after hearing him conduct many times the finest work of those great classicists. Last evening little fault could be found with th breadth, the dignity and beauty read int the score of the A-major symphony. was a magnificent performance both b conductor and players.

THRILLING EFFECT

The Dukas number again showed eader's imaginative gifts and likewise virtuosity of his men. Modern harm treatment with its strange effects striking coloring here bring a serie surprises to the listener. The Goldm overture is one that discloses the Hungarian temperament to the full many occasions, and, at the finale, t s brilliancy and to spare in orchestra and execution. The men entered into spirit of the piece with an abandon was thrilling in effect.

Sigrid Onegin received tumultuous plause after her two solo numbers. he two Wagner songs, "Traume" sung with the finer artistry. The king" showed her to be a singer of peramental qualities, her presentation this song being accompanied by more or less acting. Her voice is strong and telling. It is a voice that easily asserts itself in the midst of full orchestral accompaniment. At the conclusion of "The Erl-king" she was given an ovation. Mme. Onegin has a very pleasing presence. This, coupled with her fine vocal gifts, completely won her audience. Her songs were as follows:

Schmerzen
Traume	Wagner
Die Allmacht	Wagner
Erikonig	Schubert
	Schubert

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 24 1923

r opportunity to r
demonstration of

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY THRONG

Sigrid Onegin, Contralto, Shares Honors with Orchestra in Providence.

Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening and a great throng extended an enthusiastic greeting to Conductor Pierre Monteux and his players. It was a glorious opening of a season rich in promise of wonderful things, with a splendid company of players, fresh, unwearied and full of enthusiasm and a soloist new to Providence, who made an instant impression.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang four songs, two each by Wagner and Schubert. She is a woman of commanding, even heroic presence, possessing a voice fully capable of withstanding the test imposed by the accompaniment of a great orchestra. Wagner's "Traume" was gloriously sung, but it remained for her rendition of the "Erlking" of Schubert to awaken the audience to its fullest appreciation.

This noble work was sung with dramatic intensity and power of interpretation rarely heard, reaching a climax which swept the audience before it. A torrent of applause followed, bringing the singer back to the stage time and again to acknowledge the volume of praise.

The symphony, first number on the programme, was played with fine feeling and precision, which was praticularly impressive in the third movement. It swept to a stirring finish in the story fourth movement, described in the programme book as "a wild rondo on two themes," providing a climax which last evening evoked a thunderous response.

The other two orchestral numbers were "LaPeri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, a French composition thoroughly modern, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The former bristles with unusual features, and as might be expected it was interpreted with enthusiasm by M. Monteaux as a modernist himself and a compatriot of the composer. The "Sakuntala" overture was splendidly played and brought a concert to a fitting close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER

NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert at Woolsey Hall, November 27

For its only concert of the season here, in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievements in symphonic music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps none will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Ozech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seveu Veils from Richard Strauss' Music rama, "Salome", a score of much scriptive beauty and power, which ilizes the utmost in numbers and ll of the modern symphony orches .

s soloist of the evening, Bruce Si nds, the American pianist, who is racting increasing attention by his ll and artistry, will appear with orchestra in Cesar Franck's ymphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

For its only concert of the season here in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievement in symphony music The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps one will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Straus's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

2 2 1923

concert tomorrow evening, at Sanders' theater in Cambridge before the union dance.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

There will be a tea at the Boston Yale club after the game on Saturday.

Chief Justice William Howard Taft was elected honorary governor of the National Society, Sons and

3

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA

NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST NEW YORK RECITAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday with the first Sibelius Symphony in E Minor. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist, singing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs with orchestras; the first Mahler symphony and Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute will be the principal numbers Saturday afternoon. The Sibelius symphony and the solo numbers of Mme. Onegin will be played in Brooklyn, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonic variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

STABLISHED 1881
FROM NEWS, NOV 16 1923
Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Opening Concert of the Coming Season In Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Providence season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, with Madame Sigrid Onegin, famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the mightiest ever written, and surely one of the greatest of the immortal nine. By virtue of its insistent and propulsive rhythms, this symphony was described by Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance." It is particularly famous for the Allegretto, which serves as a slow movement.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Dukas' "Danced Poem, La Peri," a modern French score of descriptive suggestion and delicate coloring—also Goldmark's popular overture to "Sakuntala."

Madame Onegin will sing with the orchestra a group of arias and songs to be announced later. This prima donna first came to America last autumn and with her debut her fame was immediate and complete. Her voice is said to be at even finer advantage in concert than in opera.

Vladimir De Pachmann

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist, who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon, Nov. 25, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egosits, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God." But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. dePachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's A-major sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendellsohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and, of course, much by Chopin.

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy. The critics seem to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there have been no dissenting voices; as the prime distiller of tonal loveliness his genius has never been challenged.

Other Coming Events

John B. Archer will speak on the music of Russia at his third lecture recital tonight in Memorial Hall under the auspices of the School of Design. The illustrations will be given by Madame Claudia Rhea Fournier, contralto; May Atwood Anderson and Ruth Tripp, pianists.

The meeting of the Schubert Club which was omitted last Monday because of the observance of Armistice Day will take place next Monday.

Florence Hardmann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, will assist Mme. Schumann Heink at her concert at the Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon. The concert will be the first in the second of the Steinert series. The other artists in the series will be Feodor Chaliapin, who comes Jan. 6, and Efrem Zimbalist on March 2.

Madame Emma Calve, the famous French diva and one of the greatest singers of the Carmen role on the grand opera stage will appear in concert in the Albee Theatre on Sunday evening, Dec. 2, under the auspices of the Kiwanis Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

V 21 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Given Hearty Greeting as He Starts Last Concert Series.

SIDRID ONEGIN SOLOIST

Orchestra Members Show Virtuosity in Rendition of Dukas's Colorful Ballet Music.—Singer Receives Ovation

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Infantry Hall last evening. It was the organization's first appearance here this season and M. Monteux's programme proved one of sustained interest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony in A major led the list of orchestral offerings, the modern French "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, featuring the programme's second half. Segrid Onegin, Metropolitan era contralto, was the soloist.

This will be M. Monteux's final year conductor of the Boston orchestra, as returns to France at the conclusion the concert season. As he came forrd for the opening symphony last eveg he was given an unusually hearty eeting, it doubtless coming to the minds many in the audience what this conlentious and capable leader has accomished since he was called to the conictor's desk a few seasons ago. Soon ter assuming this leadership he was nfronted with the task of welding into artistic unit a comparatively new orestra. A shakeup in personnel made is work doubly difficult, and that he has ght his forces to their present state efficiency is convincing proof of his h qualities as an orchestral conductor. Since M. Monteux's advent there has en a tremenodus awakening of interest the Boston orchestra's concerts here. st season, attendance at each event in e series was very large and last eveng's big crowd offered pleasing indicaon of the continued interest in their conerts and a sure growth in appreciatio orchestral music in this city.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

In the symphony M. Monteux was give a fine chance to reveal his qualification as an interpreter of Beethoven, for this particular work shows the master writer of symphonic music in varying moods. It is a work that holds great reward fo the conductor. It is a massive tone picture which glows with rich and beautifu tonal coloring as the imagination of the interpreting mind dictates. Whatever scenes or events inspired it, and there seems to be considerable doubt what Beethoven had in mind while writing its four movements, the symphony is musi that comes straight from the heart of its creator and makes corresponding appea to the hearer.

There are those who consider M. Monteux a specialist in the interpretation of the moderns, particularly of the Frenc school, rather than a musician naturall fitted to reach the heights in the presentation of Brahms or Beethoven. It is difficult to understand this estimate of th French conductor's ability after hearing him conduct many times the finest work of those great classicists. Last evening little fault could be found with th breadth, the dignity and beauty read int the score of the A-major symphony. was a magnificent performance both b conductor and players.

THRILLING EFFECT

The Dukas number again showed eader's imaginative gifts and likewise virtuosity of his men. Modern harm treatment with its strange effects striking coloring here bring a serie surprises to the listener. The Goldm overture is one that discloses the f Hungarian temperament to the full many occasions, and, at the finale, t s brilliancy and to spare in orchestra and execution. The men entered into spirit of the piece with an abandon was thrilling in effect.

Sigrid Onegin received tumultuous plause after her two solo numbers. he two Wagner songs, "Traume" sung with the finer artistry. The " king" showed her to be a singer of t peramental qualities, her presentation this song being accompanied by more or less acting. Her voice is strong and telling. It is a voice that easily asserts itself in the midst of full orchestral accompaniment. At the conclusion of "The Erlking" she was given an ovation. Mme. Onegin has a very pleasing presence. This, coupled with her fine vocal gifts, completely won her audience. Her songs were as follows:

Schmerzen	Wagner
Traume	Wagner
Die Allmacht	Schubert
Erikonig	Schubert

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY THRONG

Sigrid Onegin, Contralto, Shares Honors with Orchestra in Providence.

Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening and a great throng extended an enthusiastic greeting to Conductor Pierre Monteux and his players. It was a glorious opening of a season rich in promise of wonderful things, with a splendid company of players, fresh, unwearied and full of enthusiasm and a soloist new to Providence, who made an instant impression.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang four songs, two each by Wagner and Schubert. She is a woman of commanding, even heroic presence, possessing a voice fully capable of withstanding the test imposed by the accompaniment of a great orchestra. Wagner's "Traume" was gloriously sung, but it remained for her rendition of the "Erlking" of Schubert to awaken the audience to its fullest appreciation.

This noble work was sung with dramatic intensity and power of interpretation rarely heard, reaching a climax which swept the audience before it. A torrent of applause followed, bringing the singer back to the stage time and again to acknowledge the volume of praise.

The symphony, first number on the programme, was played with fine feeling and precision, which was praticularly impressive in the third movement. It swept to a stirring finish in the story fourth movement, described in the programme book as "a wild rondo on two themes," providing a climax which last evening evoked a thunderous response.

The other two orchestral numbers were "LaPeri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, a French composition thoroughly modern, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The former bristles with unusual features, and as might be expected it was interpreted with enthusiasm by M. Monteaux as a modernist himself and a compatriot of the composer. The "Sakuntala" overture was splendidly played and brought a concert to a fitting close.

Moose Meeting Tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

2 192

concert tomorrow evening, at Sanders' theater in Cambridge before the union dance.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

There will be a tea at the Boston Yale club after the game on Saturday.

Chief Justice William Howard Taft was elected honorary governor of the National Society, Sons and

---

NOV 22 19

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

For its only concert of the season here in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievement in symphony music The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps one will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Straus's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

"Happy Go Lucky"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER

NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert at Woolsey Hall, November 27

For its only concert of the season here, in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievements in symphonic music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps none will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Ozech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss' Music Drama, "Salome", a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA

NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST NEW YORK RECITAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday with the first Sibelius Symphony in E Minor. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist, singing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs with orchestras; the first Mahler symphony and Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute will be the principal numbers Saturday afternoon. The Sibelius symphony and the solo numbers of Mme. Onegin will be played in Brooklyn, Friday.

MODERN MUSIC PROGRAM BY

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 24 1923

BOSTON BAND PLAYS HERE NEXT WEEK

The Boston Orchestra, always the last of the symphony bands to begin its season in New York, gives the first pair of its ten local concerts in Carnegie Hall on the evening of Thanksgiving Day and the following Saturday afternoon. This is Pierre Monteux's last year as conductor of the orchestra, announcement having already been made that he is to be succeeded next season by Sergei Kussevitsky, the Russian, who has become famous abroad for his concerts in Paris and London.

Breaking a rule of recent years, the Boston Orchestra will have a soloist on its opening programme. This is Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto, who is most favorably known here for her singing in both concert and opera. She will sing the third-act scena and aria of Adriano from Wagner's early opera, "Rienzi," and afterward Schubert's

"D Allmacht" and "Der Erlkoeig."

Mr. Monteux will play the seldom heard First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's "Salome."

The programme at the Saturday concert consists of Mahler's First Symphony, Ottorino Respighi's arrangement of old Italian dances, Paul Dukas's "La Peri" and the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride."

Paris cess ica. Chape ing; i d'Indy erican t poser. peared as adelphia or and a numb has given rec various cities

He will play Symphony orche concert, Cecar F mphonic Variations. Pier onteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonic variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS, NOV 1 6 1923
Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Opening Concert of the Coming Season In Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Providence season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, with Madame Sigrid Onegin, famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the mightiest ever written, and surely one of the greatest of the immortal nine. By virtue of its insistent and propulsive rhythms, this symphony was described by Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance." It is particularly famous for the Allegretto, which serves as a slow movement.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Dukas' "Danced Poem, La Peri," a modern French score of descriptive suggestion and delicate coloring—also Goldmark's popular overture to "Sakuntala."

Madame Onegin will sing with the orchestra a group of arias and songs to be announced later. This prima donna first came to America last autumn and with her debut her fame was immediate and complete. Her voice is said to be at even finer advantage in concert than in opera.

Vladimir De Pachmann

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist, who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon Nov. 25, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egosits, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God." But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. de-Pachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's A-major sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendellsohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and, of course, much by Chopin.

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy. The critics seem to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there have been no dissenting voices; as the prime distiller of tonal loveliness his genius has never been challenged.

Other Coming Events

John B. Archer will speak on the music of Russia at his third lecture recital tonight in Memorial Hall under the auspices of the School of Design. The illustrations will be given by Madame Claudia Rhea Fournier, contralto; May Atwood Anderson and Ruth Tripp, pianists.

The meeting of the Schubert Club which was omitted last Monday because of the observance of Armistice Day will take place next Monday.

Florence Hardmann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, will assist Mme. Schumann Heink at her concert at the Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon. The concert will be the first in the second of the Steinert series. The other artists in the series will be Feodor Chaliapin, who comes Jan. 6, and Efrem Zimbalist on March 2.

Madame Emma Calve, the famous French diva and one of the greatest singers of the Carmen role on the grand opera stage will appear in concert in the Albee Theatre on Sunday evening, Dec. 2, under the auspices of the Kiwanis Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES
1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY THRONG

Sigrid Onegin, Contralto, Shares Honors with Orchestra in Providence.

Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening and a great throng extended an enthusiastic greeting to Conductor Pierre Monteux and his players. It was a glorious opening of a season rich in promise of wonderful things, with a splendid company of players, fresh, unwearied and full of enthusiasm and a soloist new to Providence, who made an instant impression.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang four songs, two each by Wagner and Schubert. She is a woman of commanding, even heroic presence, possessing a voice fully capable of withstanding the test imposed by the accompaniment of a great orchestra. Wagner's "Traume" was gloriously sung, but it remained for her rendition of the "Erlking" of Schubert to awaken the audience to its fullest appreciation.

This noble work was sung with dramatic intensity and power of interpretation rarely heard, reaching a climax which swept the audience before it. A torrent of applause followed, bringing the singer back to the stage time and again to acknowledge the volume of praise.

The symphony, first number on the programme, was played with fine feeling and precision, which was praticularly impressive in the third movement. It swept to a stirring finish in the story fourth movement, described in the programme book as "a wild rondo on two themes," providing a climax which last evening evoked a thunderous response.

The other two orchestral numbers were "LaPeri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, a French composition thoroughly modern, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The former bristles with unusual features, and as might be expected it was interpreted with enthusiasm by M. Monteaux as a modernist himself and a compatriot of the composer. The "Sakuntala" overture was splendidly played and brought a fine concert to a fitting close.

Moose Meeting Tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION
NOV 2 2 1923

concert tomorrow evening, at Sanders' theater in Cambridge before the union dance.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

There will be a tea at the Boston Yale club after the game on Saturday.

Chief Justice William Howard Taft was elected honorary governor of the National Society, Sons and

3

NOV 2 2 19

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

For its only concert of the season here in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievement in symphony music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps one will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Straus's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 2 2 1923

Boston Symph Concert at Hall, N

WE

For its only concert here, in Woolsey Hall evening, November 27th, the Symphony Orchestra, under Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievements in symphonic music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps none will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seveu Veils from Richard Strauss' Music Drama, "Salome", a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA
NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMP FIRST NEW

The Boston Sym will open its New Carnegie Hall on Thu first Sibelius Symphony in E Minor, Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist, singing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs with orchestras; the first Mahler symphony and Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute will be the principal numbers Saturday afternoon. The Sibelius symphony and the solo numbers of Mme. Onegin will be played in Brooklyn, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
V 2 1 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Given Hearty Greeting as He Starts Last Concert Series.

SIDRID ONEGIN SOLOIST

Orchestra Members Show Virtuosity in Rendition of Dukas's Colorful Ballet Music.—Singer Receives Ovation

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Infantry Hall last evening. It was the organization's first appearance here this season and M. Monteux's programme proved one of sustained interest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony in A major led the list of orchestral offerings, the modern French "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, featuring the programme's second half. Segrid Onegin, Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist.

This will be M. Monteux's final year as conductor of the Boston orchestra, as he returns to France at the conclusion of the concert season. As he came forward for the opening symphony last evening he was given an unusually hearty greeting, it doubtless coming to the minds of many in the audience what this conscientious and capable leader has accomplished since he was called to the conductor's desk a few seasons ago. Soon after assuming this leadership he was confronted with the task of welding into an artistic unit a comparatively new orchestra. A shakeup in personnel made his work doubly difficult, and that he has brought his forces to their present state of efficiency is convincing proof of his high qualities as an orchestral conductor.

Since M. Monteux's advent there has been a tremenodus awakening of interest in the Boston orchestra's concerts here. Last season, attendance at each event in the series was very large and last evening's big crowd offered pleasing indication of the continued interest in their concerts and a sure growth in appreciation of orchestral music in this city.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

In the symphony M. Monteux was given a fine chance to reveal his qualifications as an interpreter of Beethoven, for this particular work shows the master writer of symphonic music in varying moods. It is a work that holds great reward for the conductor. It is a massive tone picture which glows with rich and beautiful tonal coloring as the imagination of the interpreting mind dictates. Whatever scenes or events inspired it, and there seems to be considerable doubt what Beethoven had in mind while writing its four movements, the symphony is music that comes straight from the heart of its creator and makes corresponding appeal to the hearer.

There are those who consider M. Monteux a specialist in the interpretation of the moderns, particularly of the French school, rather than a musician naturally fitted to reach the heights in the presentation of Brahms or Beethoven. It is difficult to understand this estimate of the French conductor's ability after hearing him conduct many times the finest works of those great classicists. Last evening little fault could be found with the breadth, the dignity and beauty read into the score of the A-major symphony. was a magnificent performance both by conductor and players.

THRILLING EFFECT

The Dukas number again showed leader's imaginative gifts and likewise virtuosity of his men. Modern harm treatment with its strange effects striking coloring here bring a series surprises to the listener. The Goldm overture is one that discloses the Hungarian temperament to the full many occasions, and, at the finale, is brilliancy and to spare in orchestral and execution. The men entered into spirit of the piece with an abandon was thrilling in effect.

Sigrid Onegin received tumultuous plause after her two solo numbers. the two Wagner songs, "Traume" sung with the finer artistry. The king" showed her to be a singer of peramental qualities, her presentation this song being accompanied by more or less acting. Her voice is strong and telling. It is a voice that easily asserts itself in the midst of full orchestral accompaniment. At the conclusion of "The Erlking" she was given an ovation. Mme. Onegin has a very pleasing presence. This, coupled with her fine vocal gifts, completely won her audience. Her songs were as follows:

Schmerzen	Wagner
Traume	Wagner
Die Allmacht	Schubert
Erikonig	Schubert

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
NOV 2 4 1923

r opportunity to r
demonstration of Overland Champio public interest a

Bo
P
N

The last c its s first in C Thanksgiving Day and the following Saturday afternoon. This is Pierre Monteux's last year as conductor of the orchestra, announcement having already been made that he is to be succeeded next season by Sergei Kussevitsky, the Russian, who has become famous abroad for his concerts in Paris and London.

Breaking a rule of recent years, the Boston Orchestra will have a soloist on its opening programme. This is Sigrid Onegin, the Swedish contralto, who is most favorably known here for her singing in both concert and opera. She will sing the third-act scena and aria of Adriano from Wagner's early opera, "i," and afterward Schubert's n in

---

he und
Vi
wi
dom

M Paris
cess ica.
Chape
ing; i d'Indy erican t poser.
peared as adelphia o and a numb has given rec various cities

He will play Symphony orche concert, Cecar F mphonic Variations. Pierr onteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat
Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM NEWS, NOV 16 1923
Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Its Opening Concert of the Coming Season In Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Providence season in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, with Madame Sigrid Onegin, famous contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company as soloist. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the mightiest ever written, and surely one of the greatest of the immortal nine. By virtue of its insistent and propulsive rhythms, this symphony was described by Richard Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance." It is particularly famous for the Allegretto, which serves as a slow movement.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Dukas' "Danced Poem, La Peri," a modern French score of descriptive suggestion and delicate coloring—also Goldmark's popular overture to "Sakuntala."

Madame Onegin will sing with the orchestra a group of arias and songs to be announced later. This prima donna first came to America last autumn and with her debut her fame was immediate and complete. Her voice is said to be at even finer advantage in concert than in opera.

Vladimir De Pachmann

There are some who undoubtedly think that Mr. DePachmann, the famous pianist, who will be heard at the Albee Theatre Sunday afternoon Nov. 25, in the second concert of the first Steinert series, is the egoist of all egosits, for he is reported as saying when he landed in New York: "I am the great player, the greatest player. When I hear what I have played, I say it is finished—a perfect thing, thank God." But those who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. dePachmann outside the concert hall are not offended by this burst of self appreciation. Nine out of 10 pianists, violinists or singers, think equally as well about themselves but they are not so honest as Mr. DePachmann in trumpeting their fame. For that they hire press agents

Mr. DePachmann is, indeed, a great pianist, the most poetic interpreter of Chopin that we know. No pianist produces more beautiful tones from a piano than he does. To DePachmann, technique is not so much in the noise and clatter of ponderous passages as in the calm of simple things, of pure "velvet" tone in melody playing of ordinary chord progression, of inner voices and the detail of quiet embellishment. Such is the message he would bring to students. The pieces that he now plays represent but few composers. Mr. DePachmann clings to Mozart's A-major sonata, Beethoven of the early period. Schumann of the smaller forms, Schubert, Mendellsohn, one rhapsody No. 8 by Liszt and the waltzes (Op. 39) by Brahms and, of course, much by Chopin.

DePachmann lives solely for his art and while exacting in many trifles, troubles himself slightly with the practical concerns of life. Over other masters of the pianoforte there has always been room for controversy The critics seem to disagree. Over DePachmann, however, there have been no dissenting voices; as the prime distiller of tonal loveliness his genius has never been challenged.

Other Coming Events

John B. Archer will speak on the music of Russia at his third lecture recital tonight in Memorial Hall under the auspices of the School of Design. The illustrations will be given by Madame Claudia Rhea Fournier, contralto; May Atwood Anderson and Ruth Tripp, pianists.

The meeting of the Schubert Club which was omitted last Monday because of the observance of Armistice Day will take place next Monday.

Florence Hardmann, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, will assist Mme. Schumann Heink at her concert at the Albee Theatre next Sunday afternoon. The concert will be the first in the second of the Steinert series. The other artists in the series will be Feodor Chaliapin, who comes Jan. 6, and Efrem Zimbalist on March 2.

Madame Emma Calve, the famous French diva and one of the greatest singers of the Carmen role on the grand opera stage will appear in concert in the Albee Theatre on Sunday evening, Dec. 2, under the auspices of the Kiwanis Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PAWTUCKET
R. I.
TIMES
1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREETED BY THRONG

Sigrid Onegin, Contralto, Shares Honors with Orchestra in Providence.

Beethoven's seventh symphony opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening and a great throng extended an enthusiastic greeting to Conductor Pierre Monteux and his players. It was a glorious opening of a season rich in promise of wonderful things, with a splendid company of players, fresh, unwearied and full of enthusiasm and a soloist new to Providence, who made an instant impression.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang four songs, two each by Wagner and Schubert. She is a woman of commanding, even heroic presence, possessing a voice fully capable of withstanding the test imposed by the accompaniment of a great orchestra. Wagner's "Traume" was gloriously sung, but it remained for her rendition of the "Erlking" of Schubert to awaken the audience to its fullest appreciation.

This noble work was sung with dramatic intensity and power of interpretation rarely heard, reaching a climax which swept the audience before it. A torrent of applause followed, bringing the singer back to the stage time and again to acknowledge the volume of praise.

The symphony, first number on the programme, was played with fine feeling and precision, which was praticularly impressive in the third movement. It swept to a stirring finish in the story fourth movement, described in the programme book as "a wild rondo on two themes," providing a climax which last evening evoked a thunderous response.

The other two orchestral numbers were "LaPeri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, a French composition thoroughly modern, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." The former bristles with unusual features, and as might be expected it was interpreted with enthusiasm by M. Monteaux as a modernist himself and a compatriot of the composer. The "Sakuntala" overture was splendidly played and brought a fine concert to a fitting close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION
2 2 192

give a concert tomorrow evening at Sanders' theater in Cambridge before the union dance.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

There will be a tea at the Boston Yale club after the game on Saturday.

Chief Justice William Howard Taft was elected honorary governor of the National Society, Sons and

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert at Woolsey Hall, November 27

For its only concert of the season here, in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievements in symphonic music. The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps none will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss' Music Drama, "Salome", a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION
NOV 22 1923

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

For its only concert of the season here in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present a programme which, although unhackneyed, is of direct appeal and represents the finest achievement in symphony music The symphony which Pierre Monteux has chosen will be the First in E minor by Jan Sibelius, the famous living Finnish composer. This score abounds in characteristic traits of this northern people. It is full of melodies, melancholy in character but haunting and appealing in the extreme. No principal work of Sibelius is as popular, and perhaps one will be remembered as long. The symphony will be introduced by the overture to "The Bartered Bride," the opera by the noted Czech composer, Smetana. Certainly his masterpiece, this score is an exciting work of cumulative rhythm and a tour de force for the string section. The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Straus's music drama, "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations."

"Happy Go Lucky"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANCASTER
PA.
NEW ERA
NOV 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST NEW YORK RECITAL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday with the first Sibelius Symphony in E Minor. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist, singing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs with orchestras; the first Mahler symphony and Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute will be the principal numbers Saturday afternoon. The Sibelius symphony and the solo numbers of Mme. Onegin will be played in Brooklyn, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
V 2 1 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Pierre Monteux Given Hearty Greeting as He Starts Last Concert Series.

SIDRID ONEGIN SOLOIST

Orchestra Members Show Virtuosity in Rendition of Dukas's Colorful Ballet Music.—Singer Receives Ovation

A crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at Infantry Hall last evening. It was the organization's first appearance here this season and M. Monteux's programme proved one of sustained interest. Beethoven's 7th Symphony in A major led the list of orchestral offerings, the modern French "La Peri: Poeme Danse," by Dukas, and Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, featuring the programme's second half. Segrid Onegin, Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist.

This will be M. Monteux's final year conductor of the Boston orchestra, as returns to France at the conclusion the concert season. As he came forard for the opening symphony last evening he was given an unusually hearty eeting, it doubtless coming to the minds many in the audience what this conscientious and capable leader has accomplished since he was called to the conductor's desk a few seasons ago. Soon ter assuming this leadership he was confronted with the task of welding into n artistic unit a comparatively new orchestra. A shakeup in personnel ma is work doubly difficult, and that he ha ught his forces to their present sta efficiency is convincing proof of hi h qualities as an orchestral conducto Since M. Monteux's advent there ha en a tremenodus awakening of interes the Boston orchestra's concerts here st season, attendance at each event i e series was very large and last eve ng's big crowd offered pleasing indica n of the continued interest in their co rts and a sure growth in appreciatio orchestral music in this city.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY

In the symphony M. Monteux was give a fine chance to reveal his qualificatio as an interpreter of Beethoven, for th particular work shows the master write of symphonic music in varying moods. I is a work that holds great reward for the conductor. It is a massive tone picture which glows with rich and beautiful tonal coloring as the imagination of the interpreting mind dictates. Whatever scenes or events inspired it, and there seems to be considerable doubt what Beethoven had in mind while writing its four movements, the symphony is music that comes straight from the heart of its creator and makes corresponding appea to the hearer.

There are those who consider M. Monteux a specialist in the interpretation o the moderns, particularly of the Frenc school, rather than a musician natural fitted to reach the heights in the presentation of Brahms or Beethoven. It is difficult to understand this estimate of th French conductor's ability after hearing him conduct many times the finest work of those great classicists. Last evening little fault could be found with th breadth, the dignity and beauty read int the score of the A-major symphony. was a magnificent performance both b conductor and players.

THRILLING EFFECT

The Dukas number again showed leader's imaginative gifts and likewise virtuosity of his men. Modern harm treatment with its strange effects striking coloring here bring a serie surprises to the listener. The Goldm overture is one that discloses the Hungarian temperament to the full many occasions, and, at the finale, t is brilliancy and to spare in orchestra and execution. The men entered into spirit of the piece with an abandon was thrilling in effect.

Sigrid Onegin received tumultuous plause after her two solo numbers. he two Wagner songs, "Traume" sung with the finer artistry. The " king" showed her to be a singer of peramental qualities, her presentation this song being accompanied by more or less acting. Her voice is strong and telling. It is a voice that easily asserts itself in the midst of full orchestral accompaniment. At the conclusion of "The Erlking" she was given an ovation. Mme. Onegin has a very pleasing presence. This, coupled with her fine vocal gifts, completely won her audience. Her songs were as follows:

Schmerzen .... Wagner
Traume .... Wagner
Die Allmacht .... Schubert
Erikonig .... Schubert

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
NOV 24 1923

r opportunity to demonstration of

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD
NOV 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

[149]

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 2 3 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The First Symphony of Sibelius in minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall Tuesday evening. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and loved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's Music Drama "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

24 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS HAS HAD FINE TRAINING

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical abilty at an early age playing Beethoven and Bach in public when eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano play-

---

TON GLOBE

...ir forefathers li... century ago. In ...ch famous histo... John Jacob ...derbilt (p... ...dy, by ...

GHTERS ODAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra a notable Wagner program in that last Sunday afternoon. The proc were devoted to the pension fund of orchestra.

From NOV 2 4 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Gustav Mahler's less known First Symphony in D major will be a feature of the opening concerts in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 29, and Saturday afternoon, December 1.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin will be soloist at the Thursday concert, singing Wagner and Schubert numbers, while Pierre Monteux will present the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome." It is at the Saturday concert that the Mahler will be played, along with Respiglie's Ancient Dances, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

The New York Symphony O...

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

2 4 192

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall with Sigrid Onegin as soloist at the Thursday concert. She will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

The Saturday matinée programme will include the First Symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas's "La Péri," and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

N Y HERALD

NOV 25 1923

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the opening of the New York season of five pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following program: Thursday—Sibelius symphony No. 1, E minor; Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils, from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's two songs, "The Almighty" and "Erlking." The feature of the Saturday matinee will be Symphony No. 1 of Mahler, in D; [illegible] airs for the Lute, freely [illegible] Italian com- [illegible] Dukas's [illegible]

MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra In New Haven Tuesd

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations.

The New oYrk season of Boston symphony concerts will open in Carnegie hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. In France he became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris, as well as the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston symphony orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well be most important to be hear

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening News
Newark, N. J.

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestr

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which Pierre Monteux is conductor, give the second entertainment in Unity Concert Course in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night. The following evening will open its series of concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York.

According to the critical reviewers its performances in Boston thus far this season, the orchestra was never in better artistic condition than it is today. It has wholly recovered from the troubles which beset it after the enforced resignation of Conductor Karl Muck after America's entrance into the war and the subsequent dissensions among some of the younger and radical members. Under direction of Mr. Monteux, now in his fifth season as its conductor, it has been restored to the high plane on which it formerly moved. Again it gives the finely shaded and polished performances for which it was long noted.

The program to be presented Wednesday night follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz"...Weber
Symphony No. 2 in D minor...Dvorak
Prelude and "Death of Love" from "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
Two Nocturnes ...Debussy
(a)—"Clouds."
(b)—"Festivals."
Dances from "Prince Igor"...Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 5 192

Opening Boston Symphony Program.

With Sigfrid Onegin as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer.

The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" on a fairy subject, by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance.

The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian medieval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King.".

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

V 2 5 1923

With Sigrid Onegin, the great contralto, as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer. The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem," on a fairy subject by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance. The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian mediaeval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life. Madame Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 2 5 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the opening of the New York season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following programs:

For the Thursday concert the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's songs, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

The feature of the Saturday matinee will be the First Symphony of Mahler in D major. There will also be played old dances and airs for the lute freely arranged by Respighi from Italian composers of the sixteenth century, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 2 5 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-24.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
NOV 2 5 1923
TELEGRAM

Rival Orchestras to Play Novel Programs

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Sigrid Onegin, at the Thursday concert, will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, and Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils," from "Salome."

The Saturday matinee program will include the first symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas' "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

This afternoon the Philharmonic Orchestra will play a Brahms-Beethoven program under Willem van Hoogstraten at Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Haydn variations and violin concerto of Brahms and the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Huberman will be the soloist.

The Philharmonic concerts during the week will be given on Wednesday evening and Friday afternoon, the schedule having been prepared to permit of the observance of Thanksgiving by Philharmonic subscribers and musicians. Mitja Nikisch, soloist, will play the Tschaikowsky piano concerto at the pair of concerts, which will include Mozart's concertante for oboe clarinet, bassoon, horn and orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the flute solo part played by John Amans, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be heard in the third Sunday afternoon subscription concert in Aeolian Hall today with Harold Bauer, pianist, as the assisting artist. Mr. Damrosch has selected for performance the second and third parts of Pierne's suite No. 1 from the ballet "Cydalise."

---

5 192

Distinguished Career Of Bruce Simonds

BRUCE SIMONDS
The Great Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, Conn., he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied the piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has give recitals in New York and various cities of

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

N Y Tribune

NOV 2 5 1923

ent Exhibitio

grace. No subject better ex this combination of qualities th figure of a dancing girl, in higher color key of lavend achieves a lovely, rich quality.

Mr. Grant brings out in fu color and fascination of the hig

The Boston Symphony Orch opens its regular New York series five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall this week. Pierre Monteux wi offer the first symphony of Sibelius, E minor, on Thursday, and Mahler first symphony, in D major, on Saturday afternoon, when Respighi's fre arrangements of old dances and air for the lute by sixteenth century Italian composers will also be given. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening, while there will be no soloi on Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

OV 2 7 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

OLYMPIA

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 2 5 192

Boston Symphony Returns.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its thirty-eighth season of visits to New York and for forty-three years a pioneer upholder of musical culture in America, returns to Carnegie Hall for the first of ten pairs of concerts, opening Thursday night with Sigrid Onegin of the Metropolitan as soloist, and the following program under Pierre Monteux:

Symphony No. 1, E minor..........Sibelius
Air from "Rienzi"..........Wagner
Variations on a Haydn theme..........Brahms
"Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig"...Schubert
"Salome's Dance"..........Strauss

Mr. Monteux's program on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is devoted to the following works of modern composers:

Symphony No. 1, D major..........Mahler
Three dances for lute..........Respighi
"La Peri"..........Dukas
Overture, "The Sold Bride"..........Smetana

Playing Friday night in the first of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, the Bostonians will present there Sibelius's symphony, Duka's "Peri," Liszt's "Tasso" and the Wagner and Schubert airs for Mme. Onegin.

[149

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 2 3 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The First Symphony of Sibelius in minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall Tuesday evening. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and beloved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's Music Drama "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra a notable Wagner program in that last Sunday afternoon. The proc were devoted to the pension fund of orchestra.

From NOV 2 4 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Gustav Mahler's less known First Symphony in D major will be a feature of the opening concerts in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 29, and Saturday afternoon, December 1.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin will be soloist at the Thursday concert, singing Wagner and Schubert numbers, while Pierre Monteux will present the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome." It is at the Saturday concert that the Mahler will be played, along with Respiglie's Ancient Dances, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

The New York Symphony O

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

24 192

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall with Sigrid Onegin as soloist at the Thursday concert. She will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

The Saturday matinée programme will include the First Symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas's "La Péri," and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride."

[illegible] HERALD

NOV 25 1923

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the opening of the New York season of five pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following program: Thursday—Sibelius symphony No. 1, E minor [illegible] Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils, from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's two songs, "The Almighty" and "Erlking." The feature of the Saturday matinee will be Symphony No. 1 of Mahler, in D; [illegible] for the Lute, freely [illegible]

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

24 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS HAS HAD FINE TRAINING

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical abilty at an early age playing Beethoven and Bach in public when eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano play-

---

TON GLOBE

FIGHTERS TODAY

eir forefathers li century ago. In ch famous histo John Jacob derbilt (p dy, by t

---

MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra In New Haven Tuesd

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations.

The New oYrk season of Boston symphony concerts will open in Carnegie hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. In France he became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris, as well as the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston symphony orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well be most important to be hear

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening News
Newark, N. J.

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which Pierre Monteux is conductor, give the second entertainment in Unity Concert Course in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night. The following evening will open its series of concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York.

According to the critical reviewers its performances in Boston thus far season, the orchestra was never in better artistic condition than it is to. It has wholly recovered from the trou which beset it after the enforced resignation of Conductor Karl Muck after America's entrance into the war and the subsequent dissensions among some of younger and radical members. Under direction of Mr. Monteux, now in fifth season as its conductor, it has restored to the high plane on which formerly moved. Again it gives the fi shaded and polished performances which it was long noted.

The program to be presented Wednesday night follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz"...Weber
Symphony No. 2 in D minor...Dvorak
Prelude and "Death of Love" from "Tristan and Isolde"...Wagner
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
(a)—"Clouds."
(b)—"Festivals."
Dances from "Prince Igor"....Borodin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 5 192

Opening Boston Symphony Program.

With Sigfrid Onegin as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer.

The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" on a fairy subject, by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance.

The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian medieval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

NOV 25 1923

With Sigrid Onegin, the great contralto, as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer. The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem," on a fairy subject by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance. The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian mediaeval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life. Madame Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 2 5 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the opening of the New York season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following programs:

For the Thursday concert the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's songs, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

The feature of the Saturday matinee will be the First Symphony of Mahler in D major. There will also be played old dances and airs for the lute freely arranged by Respighi from Italian composers of the sixteenth century, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 2 5 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-24.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
NOV 2 5 1923
TELEGRAM

Rival Orchestras to Play Novel Programs

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Sigrid Onegin, at the Thursday concert, will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, and Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils," from "Salome."

The Saturday matinee program will include the first symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas' "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

This afternoon the Philharmonic Orchestra will play a Brahms-Beethoven program under Willem van Hoogstraten at Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Haydn variations and violin concerto of Brahms and the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Huberman will be the soloist.

The Philharmonic concerts during the week will be given on Wednesday evening and Friday afternoon, the schedule having been prepared to permit of the observance of Thanksgiving by Philharmonic subscribers and musicians. Mitja Nikisch, soloist, will play the Tschaikowsky piano concerto at the pair of concerts, which will include Mozart's concertante for oboe clarinet, bassoon, horn and orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the flute solo part played by John Amans, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be heard in the third Sunday afternoon subscription concert in Aeolian Hall today with Harold Bauer, pianist, as the assisting artist. Mr. Damrosch has selected for performance the second and third parts of Pierne's suite No. 1 from the ballet "Cydalise."

---

5 192

Distinguished Career Of Bruce Simonds

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, Conn., he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public fro mthe age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied the piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has give recitals in New York and various cities of N

BRUCE SIMONDS
The Great Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

N Y [illegible]

NOV 2 5 1923

ent Exhibitio

grace. No subject better ex this combination of qualities th figure of a dancing girl, in higher color key of lavend achieves a lovely, rich quality.

Mr. Grant brings out in fu color and fascination of the hig

The Boston Symphony Orch opens its regular New York series five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall this week. Pierre Monteux wi offer the first symphony of Sibelius, E minor, on Thursday, and Mahler first symphony, in D major, on Saturday afternoon, when Respighi's fre arrangements of old dances and air for the lute by sixteenth century Italian composers will also be given Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening, while there will be no solo [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 2 7 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

OLYMPIA

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 25 192

Boston Symphony Returns.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its thirty-eighth season of visits to New York and for forty-three years a pioneer upholder of musical culture in America, returns to Carnegie Hall for the first of ten pairs of concerts, opening Thursday night with Sigrid Onegin of the Metropolitan as soloist, and the following program under Pierre Monteux:

Symphony No. 1, E minor..........	Sibelius
Air from "Rienzi"..........	Wagner
Variations on a Haydn theme..........	Brahms
"Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig"...	Schubert
"Salome's Danse"..........	Strauss

Mr. Monteux's program on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is devoted to the following works of modern composers:

Symphony No. 1, D major..........	Mahler
Three dances for lute..........	Respighi
"La Peri"..........	Dukas
Overture, "The Sold Bride"..........	Smetana

Playing Friday night in the first of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, the Bostonians will present there Sibelius's symphony, Dukas's "Peri," Liszt's "Tasso" and the Wagner and Schubert airs for Mme. Onegin.

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

[149]

NOV 23 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall Tuesday evening. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and beloved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's Music Drama "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

NOV 24 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra a notable Wagner program in that last Sunday afternoon. The proc were devoted to the pension fund of orchestra.

From NOV 24 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Gustav Mahler's less known First Symphony in D major will be a feature of the opening concerts in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 29, and Saturday afternoon, December 1.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin will be soloist at the Thursday concert, singing Wagner and Schubert numbers, while Pierre Monteux will present the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome." It is at the Saturday concert that the Mahler will be played, along with Respiglie's Ancient Dances, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

The New York Symphony

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

24 19

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor will open its New York season a Carnegie Hall with Sigrid Onegin a soloist at the Thursday concert. Sh will sing an aria from "Rienzi" an Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl King." Pierre Monteux will conduc the First Symphony of Sibeliu Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

The Saturday matinée programme will include the First Symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas's "La Péri," and Smetana's Overture to "The Barte Bride."

---

24 HERALD

NOV 25 1923

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the opening of the New York season of five pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following program: Thursday—Sibelius symphony No. 1, E minor; Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils, from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's two songs, "The Almighty" and "Erlking." [illegible] feature of the Saturday matinee will [illegible] No. 1 of Mahler, in D; [illegible] Airs for the Lute, freely [illegible] from Italian com[illegible] Dukas's [illegible] to [illegible]

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

24 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS HAS HAD FINE TRAINING

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~Woolsey Hall~~ next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical abilty at an early age playing Beethoven and Bach in public whin eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano play-

---

TON GLOBE

eir forefathers li century ago. In h famous histo John Jacob derbilt (p dy, by t

GHTERS ODAY

MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra In New Haven Tuesda

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations.

The New oYrk season of Boston symphony concerts will open in Carnegie hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. In France he became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris, as well as the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston symphony orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well be the most important to be hear hearabouts this season

---

ews
N. J.

NOV 24 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestr

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which Pierre Monteux is conductor, give the second entertainment in Unity Concert Course in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night. The following evening it will open its series of concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York.

According to the critical reviewers of its performances in Boston thus far this season, the orchestra was never in a better artistic condition than it is today. It has wholly recovered from the troubles which beset it after the enforced resignation of Conductor Karl Muck after America's entrance into the war and the subsequent dissensions among some of its younger and radical members. Under the direction of Mr. Monteux, now in his fifth season as its conductor, it has been restored to the high plane on which it formerly moved. Again it gives the finely shaded and polished performances for which it was long noted.

The program to be presented Wednesday night follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz" . . . Web
Symphony No. 2 in D minor. . . . Dvor
Prelude and "Death of Love" from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagn
Two Nocturnes . . . . Debuss
(a)—"Clouds."
(b)—"Festivals."
Dances from "Prince Igor" . . . Borod

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 25 19

Opening Boston Symphony Program.

With Sigrid Onegin as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer.

The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" on a fairy subject, by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance.

The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian medieval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

25

With Sigrid Onegin, the great contralto, as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer. The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem," on a fairy subject by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance. The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian mediaeval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life. Madame Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 25 1923

oston Symphony Orchestra.

the opening of the New York season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following programs:

For the Thursday concert the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." As solo of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin w sing the aria, "My Life Fades in I Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," ar Schubert's songs, "The Almighty" an "Erl-King."

The feature of the Saturday matine will be the First Symphony of Mahle in D major. There will also be playe old dances and airs for the lute freely arranged by Respighi from Italian composers of the sixteenth century, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 25 1923

number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book con page announcement saying: annual expenses of the Symphony Orchestra exceed its income by about $95,000. This deficit is met by subscrip. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-24.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
NOV 25 1923
TELEGRAM

Rival Orchestras to Play Novel Programs

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Sigrid Onegin, at the Thursday concert, will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, and Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils," from "Salome."

The Saturday matinee program will include the first symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas' "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

This afternoon the Philharmonic Orchestra will play a Brahms-Beethoven program under Willem van Hoogstraten at Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Haydn variations and violin concerto of Brahms and the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Huberman will be the soloist.

The Philharmonic concerts during the week will be given on Wednesday evening and Friday afternoon, the schedule having been prepared to permit of the observance of Thanksgiving by Philharmonic subscribers and musicians. Mitja Nikisch, soloist, will play the Tschaikowsky piano concerto at the pair of concerts, which will include Mozart's concertante for oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn and orchestra, Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the flute solo part played by John Amans, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be heard in the third Sunday afternoon subscription concert in Aeolian Hall today with Harold Bauer, pianist, as the assisting artist. Mr. Damrosch has selected for performance the second and third parts of Pierne's suite No. 1 from the ballet "Cydalise."

25

Distinguished Career Of Bruce Simonds

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, Conn., he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public fro mthe age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied the piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has give recitals in New York and various cities of

BRUCE SIMONDS
The Great Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

N Y Tribune

NOV 25 1923

NEW YORK
TIMES

Boston Symphony Begins Its New York Series This Week

Philharmonic to Make Four Appearances This Week, Playing Wednesday Instead of Thursday; New York Symphony to Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its regular New York series five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall this week. Pierre Monteux wi offer the first symphony of Sibelius, E minor, on Thursday, and Mahler first symphony, in D major, on Saturday afternoon, when Respighi's fre arrangements of old dances and air for the lute by sixteenth century Italian composers will also be given. Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist a Carnegie Hall on Thursday and the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening, while there will be no soloist on Saturday.

is program under Monteux:

Symphony No. 1, E minor. . . . . Sibelius
Air from "Rienzi" . . . . Wagner
Variations on a Haydn theme. . . . . . . Brahms
"Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" . . . Schubert
"Salome's Dance" . . . . Strauss

Mr. Monteux's program on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is devoted to the following works of modern composers:

Symphony No. 1, D major. . . . . Mahler
Three dances for lute. . . . . Respighi
"La Peri" . . . . Dukas
Overture, "The Bold Bride" . . . . Smetana

Playing Friday night in the first of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, the Bostonians will present there Sibelius's symphony, Dukas's "Peri," Liszt's "Tasso" and the Wagner and Schubert airs for Mme. Onegin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 27 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

OLYMPIA

[149]

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 2 3 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The First Symphony of Sibelius in minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall Tuesday evening. This score of the famous living Finnish composer has perhaps made his name known and beloved more than any other. It abounds with melancholy but hauntingly beautiful melodies which could only have come from this bleak northern land.

The opening number on the program will be Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," which has some of the most difficult measures ever written for the string orchestra and is likewise of much brilliance and rhythmic verve.

The evening will close with the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's Music Drama "Salome," a score of much descriptive beauty and power, which utilizes the utmost in numbers and skill of the modern symphony orchestra.

As soloist of the evening, Bruce Simonds, the American pianist, who is attracting increasing attention by his skill and artistry, will appear with the orchestra in Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra a notable Wagner program in that last Sunday afternoon. The proc were devoted to the pension fund of orchestra.

From NOV 2 4 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Gustav Mahler's less known First Symphony in D major will be a feature of the opening concerts in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 29, and Saturday afternoon, December 1.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin will be soloist at the Thursday concert, singing Wagner and Schubert numbers, while Pierre Monteux will present the First Symphony of Sibelius, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Richard Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome." It is at the Saturday concert that the Mahler will be played, along with Respiglie's Ancient Dances, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture.

The New York Symphony O

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

24 192

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening and Satur day afternoon the Boston Symphon Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor will open its New York season a Carnegie Hall with Sigrid Onegin a soloist at the Thursday concert. Sh will sing an aria from "Rienzi" an Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Er King." Pierre Monteux will cond the First Symphony of Sibeli Brahms's Variations on a Theme Haydn, and Strauss's Dance of Seven Veils from "Salome."

The Saturday matinée program will include the First Symphony Mahler in D major, Respighi's rangement of sixteenth century ian dances, Dukas's "La Péri," Smetana's Overture to "The Barte Bride."

NY HERALD

NOV 25 1923

Boston Symphony Programs.

For the opening of the New York season of five pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following program: Thursday—Sibelius symphony No. 1, E minor; Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Strauss, Dance of the Seven Veils, from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in its Blossom" from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's two songs, "The Almighty" and "Erlking." feature of the Saturday matinee will No. 1 of Mahler, in D; Airs for the Lute, freely from Italian com- Dukas's

---

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

24 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS HAS HAD FINE TRAINING

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical abilty at an early age playing Beethoven and Bach in public when eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano play-

---

TON GLOBE

ir forefathers li century ago. In h famous histo John Jacob derbilt (p dy, by t

GHTERS ODAY

MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra In New Haven Tuesd

Pierre Monteux has made t following program for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations.

The New oYrk season of Boston symphony concerts will open in Carnegie hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him insistent. In France he became familiar figure presiding over t Colonne Concerts and the foremo symphony orchestras in Paris, well as the opera and at his ov Monteux concerts. He toured E rope four years at the head of t Ballet Russe and first came America as leader of that organiz tion. He was subsequently Frenc conductor at the Metropolitan o era house in New York. From thi post he came to the Boston sy phony orchestra where, accordin to general opinion, his genius h found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well b important to be hear

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening News
Newark, N. J.

NOV 2 4 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestr

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which Pierre Monteux is conductor, give the second entertainment in Unity Concert Course in the auditorium of the Montclair High School next Wednesday night. The following evening will open its series of concerts in Carne Hall, New York.

According to the critical reviewer its performances in Boston thus far season, the orchestra was never i better artistic condition than it is to It has wholly recovered from the trou which beset it after the enforced resi tion of Conductor Karl Muck after Am ica's entrance into the war and the su quent dissensions among some of younger and radical members. Unde direction of Mr. Monteux, now in fifth season as its conductor, it has restored to the high plane on whic formerly moved. Again it gives the fi shaded and polished perfofmances which it was long noted.

The program to be presented We nesday night follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz" . . . Web
Symphony No. 2 in D minor. . . . Dvora Prelude and "Death of Love" from "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagn
Two Nocturnes . . . . Debuss
(a)—"Clouds."
(b)—"Festivals."
Dances from "Prince Igor" . . . . Borod

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 2 5 19

Opening Boston Symphony Program.

With Sigrid Onegin as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer.

The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem" on a fairy subject, by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance.

The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian medieval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life.

Madame Onegin will sing the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

5

With Sigrid Onegin, the great contralto, as the soloist of the occasion, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will begin his farewell season as conductor of the orchestra with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, a score which more than any other is eloquent with the remarkable melodic genius of its Finnish composer. The French school will be represented by "La Peri," the "Danced Poem," on a fairy subject by Paul Dukas, a score which has never been staged according to the original intention, but which has found much favor in symphonic performance. The closing number will be Liszt's Second Symphony Poem "Tasso," which depicts the Italian mediaeval poet in the romantic and contrasting episodes of his life. Madame Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two songs of Schubert, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 2 5 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the opening of the New York season of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Pierre Monteux has made the following programs:

For the Thursday concert the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome." As soloist of the evening Mme. Sigrid Onegin will sing the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi," and Schubert's songs, "The Almighty" and "Erl-King."

The feature of the Saturday matinee will be the First Symphony of Mahle in D major. There will also be playe old dances and airs for the lute freely arranged by Respighi from Italian composers of the sixteenth century, Dukas's "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 2 5 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-24.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 5 1923

Rival Orchestras to Play Novel Programs

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Sigrid Onegin, at the Thursday concert, will sing an aria from "Rienzi" and Schubert's "The Almighty" and "Erl-King." Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Sibelius in E minor, Brahms' "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, and Strauss' "Dance of the Seven Veils," from "Salome."

The Saturday matinee program will include the first symphony of Mahler in D major, Respighi's arrangement of sixteenth century Italian dances, Dukas' "La Peri" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride."

This afternoon the Philharmonic Orchestra will play a Brahms-Beethoven program under Willem van Hoogstraten at Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Haydn variations and violin concerto of Brahms and the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Huberman will be the soloist.

The Philharmonic concerts during the week will be given on Wednesday evening and Friday afternoon, the schedule having been prepared to permit of the observance of Thanksgiving by Philharmonic subscribers and musicians. Mitja Nikisch, soloist, will play the Tschaikowsky piano concerto at the pair of concerts, which will include Mozart's concertante for oboe clarinet, bassoon, horn and orchestra. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the flute solo part played by John Amans, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, will be heard in the third Sunday afternoon subscription concert in Aeolian Hall today with Harold Bauer, pianist, as the assisting artist. Mr. Damrosch has selected for performance the second and third parts of Pierne's suite No. 1 from the ballet "Cydalise."

5

Distinguished Career Of Bruce Simonds

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, Conn., he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public fro mthe age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied the piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has give recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He w with the Boston Symph at the coming conc Symphonic Va ll also

BRUCE SIMONDS
The Great Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from "Salome."

V 2 5 1923

B Exhibitions

grace. No subject better expresses this combination of qualities than th figure of a dancing girl, in whos higher color key of lavender h achieves a lovely, rich quality.

Mr. Grant brings out in full th color and fascination of the high se

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its regular New York series five Thursday evening and five Satu day afternoon concerts at Carneg Hall this week. Pierre Monteux wi offer the first symphony of Sibelius, E minor, on Thursday, and Mahler first symphony, in D major, on Satur day afternoon, when Respighi's fre arrangements of old dances and air for the lute by sixteenth century Ital ian composers will also be given Sigrid Onegin will be the soloist at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening, while there will be no soloist on Saturday.

NEW YORK
TIMES

NOV 2 5 1923

ston Symphony Returns.

ston Symphony Orchestra, now irty-eighth season of visits to rk and for forty-three years a upholder of musical culture in returns to Carnegie Hall for of ten pairs of concerts, opening rsday night with Sigrid Onegin Metropolitan as soloist, and the program under Pierre Monteux:

Symphony No. 1, E minor. . . . . Sibelius
Air from "Rienzi" . . . . Wagner
Variations on a Haydn theme. . . . . . . Brahms
"Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" . . . Schubert
"Salome's Dance" . . . . Strauss

Mr. Monteux's program on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is devoted to the following works of modern composers:

Symphony No. 1, D major. . . . . Mahler
Three dances for lute. . . . . Respighi
"La Peri" . . . . Dukas
Overture, "The Bold Bride" . . . . Smetana

Playing Friday night in the first of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, the Bostonians will present there Sibelius's symphony, Dukas's "Peri," Liszt's "Tasso" and the Wagner and Schubert airs for Mme. Onegin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

OV 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

OLYMPIA

CONN.

POST

NOV 1923

musical show now travelling.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN N
Farewell Season of Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux has the following programme for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27th:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The New York season of Boston Symphony concerts will open in Carnegie Hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting. He became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris as well as the Opera and at his own Monteux Concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well be the most important to be heard hereabouts this season.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

REGISTER

NOV 25 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY HERE

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, Nov, 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris were he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by dIndy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierrs Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the sevne veils from 'Salome."

UNION

5 1923

Cross, Mrs. Arthur Corbin, and Mrs. William Lyon Phelps.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

Miss Katherine Hulbert, who has been teaching for two years in Beirut, Syria, will spend this winter

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

TIMES

Nov 28 1923

MUSIC NOTES.

The Philharmonic plays tonight instead of tomorrow in Carnegie Hall "to permit its patrons to celebrate Thanksgiving."

The Boston Symphony, opening [illegible] season here tomorrow, appears also Friday in Brooklyn, assisted by Sigrid Onegin.

Abraham Sopkin, violinist, is assisted by Walter Gold[illegible] in a recital this evening at Aeolian Hall.

NEW YORK

TIMES

NOV 25 1923

"In Boston," writes R. R. G. in The Boston Herald, "we hear little opera, and when we do the orchestra is not precisely the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke, a good many years ago made an effort no less than sensational by following the 'Tannhaeuser' overture with the 'Bacchanale,' and the first scene duet sung by Miss Ternina and Ellison Van Hoose. Even in the opera house a performance like unto that is not often heard. Why would it not prove a pleasure to hear the last scene of 'Siegfried' in concert, a scene that scarcely a living tenor has the voice to sing adequately on the stage, after he has struggled with two exacting acts?

"There are other scenes, too, for instance that of the Norns, which is not often sung at all. And, not to halt at Wagner, how many people have heard the finale of 'Don Giovanni'? The experiment, at all events, could do no harm, and one may venture to guess that two or three long excerpts judiciously chosen would leave a deeper impression behind them than bits of this opera and that."

Tel. Chelsea 8860 3 Concert

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER

NOV 26 1923

offering.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tuesday

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist, who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical ability at an early age, playing Beethoven and Bach in public when eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris, where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. in London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Sym-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
UNION

NOV 27 1923

song.

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, their conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's programme will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overtura to "Prodana Nevasta" (The Bold Bride) by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from his Music Drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the programme promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD

NOV 26 1923

(Continued on Twelfth Page.)

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER

NOV 27 1923

Boston Symphony Concert At Woolsey Hall

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include the appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 28 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra

That admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, assisted by Bruce Simonds, pianist, gave a concert at Woolsey hall last evening

BRUCE SIMONDS

Brilliant pianist of the Boston Symphony concert at Woolsey hall last night.

under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. It was a pleasure to greet this admirable body of musicians, and no music season is complete without at least one concert by this orchestra.

It was a well chosen program, opening with Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Its mood is cheerful and dashing. There are many distinctive orchestral figures which the orchestra emphasized and the overture was strong in rhythmic accent and instrumental eloquence. It received generous applause.

The symphony was the E minor, No. 1, by Sibelius, characteristic of that composer and his Northern country. The most northern of all civilized countries, climatic influences have made the Finnish temperament sober, with a touch of melancholy. Sibelius' music reflects these national characteristics but through a strong individuality which expresses itself in its own way.

In this symphony the instrumentation is vivid, there are strange figures for the strings, syncopated rhythms, and defiant blasts from the brass. The "Andante" sings a folk song of simple melody with a touch of gentle pathos.

The allegro is varied in mood, fantastical, graceful and capricious in turn, and the finale is filled with passionate restlessness. It is sturdy and rugged music, modern, but with none of the eccentricities of the ultra-modern school.

The symphony pulsated with life and energy, there were broad sweeps and sublime moments in which the music rose to great heights and made a profound impression. Mr. Monteux was many times recalled.

The Franck Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra is in Papa Francks best vein ranking high—the finest piece of its kind ever written—colorful and abounding in pianistic difficulties. It was ideally played by Mr. Simonds, whose many successful appearances both here and abroad reached a climax as soloist with this distinguished orchestra. It was also a notable occasion for the Yale School of Music and marked a distinct achievement of the pianoforte department and Prof. H. Stanley Knight.

It was a performance finely felt, there was technical brilliance and tonal charm. Mr. Simonds paints his colors and portrays the musical poetry of the score. It was a performance that compelled admiration and aroused enthusiasm in which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra joined. Mr. Simonds received recalls without number, indicating that the audience desired an encore.

The concert ended with "Salome's Dance" from Strauss music drama, oriental and barbaric. Its characteristic features were well emphasized and the performance was vivid and convincing. At its close Mr. Monteux was recalled with enthusiasm.

T.M.P.

[150]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

CONN.
POST
NOV 192

...the pictorial display in any musical show now travelling.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN N...
Farewell Season of Pierre Monteux,

Pierre Monteux has ... following programme for the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, next Tuesday evening, November 27th:—Overture to "The Bartered Bride" by Smetana, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Strauss's Music Drama, "Salome." As soloist, Bruce Simonds, the noted pianist, will appear with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The New York season of Boston Symphony concerts will open in Carnegie Hall on the following Thursday evening.

The great French conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fulfilling his fifth season at this post, and at its conclusion is expected to return to his own country, where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that he first attracted general attention by his abilities in conducting. He became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the foremost symphony orchestras in Paris as well as the Opera and at his own Monteux Concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The coming concert may well be the most important to be heard hereabouts this season.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

REGISTER
NOV 25 1923

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY HERE

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris were he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by dIndy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierrs Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the sevne veils from 'Salome."

UNION
5 1923

...ur Cross, Mrs. Arthur Corbin, and Mrs. William Lyon Phelps.

* * *

Bruce Simonds will play as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Tuesday evening.

* * *

Miss Katherine Hulbert, who has been teaching for two years in Beirut, Syria, will spend this winter...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
Nov 28 1923

MUSIC NOTES.

The Philharmonic plays tonight instead of tomorrow in Carnegie Hall "to permit its patrons to celebrate Thanksgiving."

The Boston Symphony, opening its season here tomorrow, appears also Friday in Brooklyn, assisted by Sigrid Onegin.

Abraham Sopkin, violinist, is assisted by Walter Golde in a recital this evening at Aeolian Hall...

NEW YORK
TIMES
NOV 25 1923

"In Boston," writes R. R. G. in The Boston Herald, "we hear little opera, and when we do the orchestra is not precisely the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke, a good many years ago made an effort no less than sensational by following the 'Tannhaeuser' overture with the 'Bacchanale,' and the first scene duet sung by Miss Ternina and Ellison Van Hoose. Even in the opera house a performance like unto that is not often heard. Why would it not prove a pleasure to hear the last scene of 'Siegfried' in concert, a scene that scarcely a living tenor has the voice to sing adequately on the stage, after he has struggled with two exacting acts?

"There are other scenes, too, for instance that of the Norns, which is not often sung at all. And, not to halt at Wagner, how many people have heard the finale of 'Don Giovanni'? The experiment, at all events, could do no harm, and one may venture to guess that two or three long excerpts judiciously chosen would leave a deeper impression behind them than bits of this opera and that."

---

3 Concert

Tel. Chelsea 8860
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 26 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tuesday

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist, who is to appear as soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey Hall next Tuesday evening, November 27th, appeared two seasons ago at the regular Boston concerts of this orchestra when Vincent d'Indy was guest conductor.

This musician was born in Bridgeport. He manifested musical ability at an early age, playing Beethoven and Bach in public when eight years old. At the Yale School of Music he studied under Horatio Parker and pursued his training with Harold Bauer before he went abroad in 1919.

His first objective was Paris, where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy, and studied piano with Matthay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. in London he was awarded the Chapel Gold Medal for piano playing; in Paris he was invited by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distinguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Overture to "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana, the Symphony of Sibelius in and Richard Strauss' Seven Veils from

---

...Tonight

...usicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, their conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include an appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's programme will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevasta" (The Bold Bride) by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from his Music Drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the programme promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
MERIDEN
CONN.
RECORD
NOV 27 1923

ontinued on Twelfth Page.)

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW HAVEN
CONN.
TIMES-LEADER
NOV 27 1923

Boston Symphony Concert At Woolsey Hall

The 104 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, the conductor, are scheduled to arrive in New Haven early this afternoon in readiness for their annual New Haven concert which will take place in Woolsey hall tonight at 8:15 sharp. This concert will be the first of a week's tour which will also include the appearance in Montclair, N. J., and culminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York.

Tonight's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance of the Seven Veils from his music drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, will play with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

The nature of the program promises one of the very finest symphony concerts which has been heard for seasons in this part of the country.

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
8 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra

That admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, assisted by Bruce Simonds, pianist, gave a concert at Woolsey hall last evening

BRUCE SIMONDS

Brilliant pianist of the Boston Symphony concert at Woolsey hall last night.

under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. It was a pleasure to greet this admirable body of musicians, and no music season is complete without at least one concert by this orchestra.

It was a well chosen program, opening with Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Its mood is cheerful and dashing. There are many distinctive orchestral figures which the orchestra emphasized and the overture was strong in rhythmic accent and instrumental eloquence. It received generous applause.

The symphony was the E minor, No. 1, by Sibelius, characteristic of that composer and his Northern country. The most northern of all civilized countries, climatic influences have made the Finnish temperament sober, with a touch of melancholy. Sibelius' music reflects these national characteristics but through a strong individuality which expresses itself in its own way.

In this symphony the instrumentation is vivid, there are strange figures for the strings, syncopated rhythms, and defiant blasts from the brass. The "Andante" sings a folk song of simple melody with a touch of gentle pathos.

The allegro is varied in mood, fantastical, graceful and capricious in turn, and the finale is filled with passionate restlessness. It is sturdy and rugged music, modern, but with none of the eccentricities of the ultra-modern school.

The symphony pulsated with life and energy, there were broad sweeps and sublime moments in which the music rose to great heights and made a profound impression. Mr. Monteux was many times recalled.

The Franck Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra is in Papa Francks best vein ranking high—the finest piece of its kind ever written—colorful and abounding in pianistic difficulties. It was ideally played by Mr. Simonds, whose many successful appearances both here and abroad reached a climax as soloist with this distinguished orchestra. It was also a notable occasion for the Yale School of Music and marked a distinct achievement of the pianoforte department and Prof. H. Stanley Knight.

It was a performance finely felt, there was technical brilliance and tonal charm. Mr. Simonds paints his colors and portrays the musical poetry of the score. It was a performance that compelled admiration and aroused enthusiasm in which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra joined. Mr. Simonds received recalls without number, indicating that the audience desired an encore.

The concert ended with "Salome's Dance" from Strauss music drama, oriental and barbaric. Its characteristic features were well emphasized and the performance was vivid and convincing. At its close Mr. Monteux was recalled with enthusiasm.

T.M.P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 2 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY THRILLS AUDIENCE AT WOOLSEY HALL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Bruce Simonds, of the Yale School of Music as solo pianist, gave a magnificent concert at Woolsey hall last evening.

The prestige of this organization, international in its scope, is enviable. Its concert last evening is the first of a week's tour which will include appearances in Montclair, N. J., Brooklyn and two in New York city.

M. Monteux, who is now completing his fifth and last season as its conductor, presented a remarkable program. It opened with the overture to "The Sold Bride" (Smetana), a work demanding much of the players, especially of the strings. The control over the violin section was marvelous—playing as one man. This is a comic opera, but its grandeur and massiveness hardly portrays the fact.

Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, now nearly 60 years old, has written several symphonies, the one in E minor, presented last evening, surpassing in creative genius all the others, although his orchestral legends on Kalevala subjects, the suite "Carelia" and "King Christian IV, another suite, are marvelous in their instrumentation and dynamic effects. In this symphony, one becomes bewildered with the many crashing effects, the wierd screaming motives carried so sonorously by the strings and the curious effects wrought by bassoons and flutes combined. The work teems with the wildest of imagination, a conglomeration of savage instrumentation but nevertheless all ingeniously knit together and superbly portrayed under the skillful leadership of M. Monteux.

The height of achievement of every instrumentalist, is some day to appear as soloist with one of the great orchestras, and especially the Boston Symphony. This honor was conferred upon Bruce Simonds last evening. He played the pianoforte score of the Cesar Frank Symphonic Variations with masterly skill and artistic phrasing. His is a facile technic well adapted to the work chosen. He is asympathetic and gifted artist with a warm tone and musical conception. An important part of the work was the beautiful orchestral accompaniment. The pianist was in the hands and heart of his friends who recalled him a half dozen times, with the hope of an encore.

Richard Strauss in his "Salome" music adopted an unprecedented sort of musical realism, amply suggested by the text which is almost a literal translation of Oscar Wildle's drama. There are in this work passages of great beauty, but the love music of "Salome" is frankly passionate and sensual, and the brutality of her blood-orgy was pictured forth with all the resources of modern orchestral tone painting of which Strauss is master and Monteux a vivid interpreter.

To have the Boston Symphony in this unusually arranged program, is a musical treat long to be remembered.

E. A. LEOPOLD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

N Y Tribune

NOV 30 1923

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

These Thanksgiving Day Offerings: "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan; and the Season's First Boston Symphony

Kundry, that "hysterical hussy," as Nietzsche called her, is with us once more, and yesterday she tempted Parsifal in vain to the loveliest music that ever an enchantress wasted upon male frigidity.

The Kundry of yesterday afternoon's performance was a familiar apparition: Mme. Matzenauer; but the Parsifal was a stranger in this region. The rôle was assumed by Mr. Laubenthal, the Metropolitan's new German tenor, who is proceeding sturdily on his pilgrimage through the lyric-dramas of Wagner. He has now been observed here as Walther von Stolzing in "Die Meistersinger"; as Tannhäuser, and as the last and least interesting of Wagner's heroes. For the more one lives in the same imaginative world with this strange creation of the old wizard of Bayreuth, the more one inclines toward a sneaking sympathy with Ulick Dean's brusque dismissal of Parsifal as a hero whose activities may be summed up as "the killing of a swan and the refusal of a kiss."

That is, of course, too vivacious to be wholly just. Parsifal went further than that—he did succor the distressful Amfortas, and he did put Monsalvat in running order again. Yet it is hard to feel that these achievements add much to his saliency as a dramatic figure.

* * *

Is it possible, one wonders, to make Parsifal a sympathetic or engrossing figure? We doubt it. We have seen many a singing-actor in this rôle, some of them accomplished and magnetic artists, but we have never yet seen a Parsifal who was not a bore.

This is, indeed, an opera overpopulated with bores. Gurnemanz—even when he is so nobly and affectingly impersonated as he is by Mr. Bender in the Metropolitan production—is a bore for 90 per cent of the time that he is on the stage, though he has a wonderful ten minutes in the Good Friday scene. The Monsalvat celibates, with their protracted marching and choiring, are not easy to endure. Nor is the deciduous Titurel who, fortunately, dies before the third act is reached.

The only persons in the drama whom one does not dread to meet again are (as is so often, unhappily, the case) the considerable assortment of sinners whom Wagner included among his characters. Kundry is an enigmatic but alluring and touching figure; Amfortas is deeply affecting; the shameless Flower Girls are among Wagner's most winsome inventions; even the maleficent Klingsor, a bad citizen if ever there was one, holds the eye and the ear.

* * *

The blunt truth is that one does not always find it easy to be patient with Wagner's glorification of the monastic ideal or with the longueurs in which its exposition involves him. One abides it only because of the marvellous impressiveness of the musical and spectacular setting that Wagner has contrived for it. We have never been able to understand how any one can listen quite calmly to such scenes as the unveiling and illumination of the Grail, the exquisite Herzeleide song of Kundry, the poignantly tender music of the Good Friday episode—a page as wonderful as any that Wagner ever wrote: music which at the hundredth hearing turns the heart to water. And what is there to say of the ineffable last scene—the scene of the Glorification, with its blue and silver lights, its radiant, hovering dove, the ecstatic Parsifal and the refulgent Grail, the worshiping Knights and Wagner's wondrous music, for whose serene, transfiguring beauty there are no words that will not seem impertinent?

So "Parsifal," despite its slowness of pulse and its trying dramatis personæ, endures from year to year because a colossal and necromantic genius wove his spells about it. We listen, bored and resentful, but enchanted, and at the end we are one with the worshiping company of knights prostrate before this conquering revelation of immortal loveliness.

* * *

Yesterday's performance at the Metropolitan gained greatly over those of recent years through the presence of Mr. Laubenthal, whose Parsifal is not only his best impersonation so far but the best that we have seen here for a long time. It is simply, sincerely and at times quite movingly conceived, and Mr. Laubenthal keeps himself well within the skin of the character. He is not greatly equipped, either as actor or as singer, but he has feeling and intelligence, and he is an illusive figure in his boyishness and his slimness—but we deplore his taste in wigs.

Mme. Matzenauer, as we remember was the case last year, succeeded better with the wild and disheveled Kundry of the first act and the static penitent of the third than with the seductress of Klingsor's magic garden. Possibly her infelicitous costuming of the part in the second act had something to do with this. Certainly Mme. Matzenauer's mind seemed to be rather on the network of pearls that encompassed her than upon "Parsifal" and her assignment, for she was kept busy disentangling herself from her festoons of jewels and other adornments during a [illegible] of the act. And did Wagner, was on hand, with an infrequently heard symphony of Sibelius—his first, in E minor—and with Mme. Onegin, the contralto of the sumptuous voice and the grand manner, as soloist in an aria from "Rienzi" ("Gerechter Gott") and two Schubert songs: "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig." The rest of the bill promised the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Salome's Dance from the opera of Richard Strauss.

It is delightful to welcome the great organization again to New York—for its concerts have been unjustly neglected in recent years. The orchestra played well last season; it plays better this: with beauty and nobility of tone, with splendid virility and élan, with plasticity and responsiveness. It is now an instrument of wide range and flexibility and finesse; and there is no doubt of its indebtedness to Mr. Monteux for this notable achievement.

They played the symphony of Sibelius—which is seldom heard hereabouts—with superb eloquence; and the work was worthy of that eloquence. This First Symphony of the Finnish master is characteristic, though it is almost [illegible] old, and is far is at bottom the utterance of a tragic poet who returns again and again to the realization that human life is at best but "a dream that lingers a moment . . . a breath, a flame in the doorway, a feather in the wind." He remembers the sorrowing echoes of beauty and delight, the shadow of the darkening Wings; and he is moved by these things, not to the pitifully abandoned lamentations of Tchaikovsky, the twilight brooding of Schumann, the noble gravity of Brahms, but to a constrained and somber melancholy that turns inward upon itself, that is unable to find release in what Rossetti called "the legitimate exercise of anguish." It may ultimately be said of him, as Arnold said of the poet Gray, that "he never spoke out."

Sibelius spoke of himself to Ivan Narodny as "a dreamer and poet of Nature." A dreamer and poet, indisputably. But there are dreamers and dreamers, poets and poets. It is sufficiently obvious that Sibelius is no poet of the sentimental tradition, no voluptuously enchanted dreamer in a world where—as Mr. Santayana once ironically observed—"there should be none but gentle tears, and fluttering, tip-toe loves . . . lights and shadows . . . roses and vices." And Sibelius, in his truly typical works, is equally remote from the emotional exuberance of the Romantics and the iridescent subtleties of the Impressionists.

* * *

this early work he had not quite n himself free from the lure of bvious. There is a melody in the e—the second theme, for the vio- that sounds like Saint-Saëns at ost sentimentally depraved. But with this, there are frequent es of originality in harmonic ex- ion, in instrumentation (how ng and unconventional is the of the first movement for exam-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NOV 30 1923

"Parsifal," "Wagner's Worst," Presented with Excellent Cast

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THANKSGIVING thoughts did not fill my heart until late in the afternoon yesterday, when Wagner's "Parsifal" ended its tortuous length at the Metropolitan Metropolitan Opera House. It had been wending its dreary way from one o'clock and with its psuedo-religious plot and quasi-devotional music lured a fairly large house-full of listeners away from the succulent Thanksgiving turkey with all its toothsome trimmings.

LEONARD LIEBLING

Most fortunately I had eaten my holiday helping early.

Let me confess that I despise "Parsifal" and for these reasons:

1—If it is an attempt to picture certain episodes in the life of Christ and to project His figure upon the stage, it should not be permitted public performance here, where there has been for years, a strong objection to theatrical representation of the Saviour. If, on the other hand, the "Parsifal" story is purely imaginary, and not concerned with the Divine Figure, it should not be treated like a religious rite and the public should not be asked to regard it as such.

2—I believe that the Grail passages and the Magdalene episode of the washing of the feet, prove Wagner's intention to operatize Jesus Christ under the name of Parsifal.

3—Wagner was an avowed atheist all his life until he discovered that the Passion Play at Oberammergau had become highly profitable, and that it was possible to commercialize religion in the same way in opera by writing his "Parsifal," monopolizing it for Bayreuth, and making its hearings a pilgrimage to a musical shrine.

4—"Parsifal" is a mockery of the Christian religion, for the libretto is a mixture of old Hindu beliefs and rituals with Scriptural dogmas and ceremonies.

5—Wagner dumped into "Parsifal" also other cults, like vegetarianism, misogynism, homeopathism, not to speak of homo-sexualism, and the bi-sexualism of the second act, with the shameless temptation of Parsifal by Kundry and her young lady boarders.

6—The second act was devised by Wagner solely with a view to affording contrast and relief from the churchly atmosphere of the first and third acts.

7—The music is Wagner's worst. It is emasculated, jejune, sickly, senile. The themes are few and without distinction, their repetition is sheer endless, the orchestration lacks entirely Wagner's customary rich coloring. It is the score of an old man, dulled in imagination and cunningly contriving to hide, under the cloak of religion, the sterility of his once exuberant fancy and abundant inventiveness.

Aside from the foregoing indictment, I like "Parsifal" very much, as you doubtless have gathered.

Yesterday's performance presented some impressive stage-pictures—all the scenic settings at the Metropolitan this Winter are remarkably fine—excellent orchestral playing presided over by Arthur Bodanzky, and a very able cast of artists who sang and acted with the air of sanctity that is considered appropriate at these solemn "Parsifal" occasions.

William Gustafson did that jack-in-the-box, Titurel, who pops in and out on several unnecessary occasions. The magician, Klingsor, had Gustav Schuetzendorf as his interpreter. Marcella Roeseler headed the very well-drilled and tuneful flower maidens, Grace Anthony, Raymonde Delaunois, Laura Robertson, Phradie Wells, Henriette Wakefield. Knights and Esquires of the Grail were Merle Alcock, Angelo Bada, Louis D'Angelo, Ellen Dalossy, Louise Hunter, George Meader and Pietro Audisio.

It was good to note that at least one silly myth had been exploded in connection with the supposedly religious atmosphere of "Parsifal"—those who liked the show, applauded.

* * *

Lovers of song agreeable in tone and refined in delivery, were well satisfied with Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, last evening. Other qualities she displayed were warm temperament and musical assurance. Her performance of an aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" ("My Life Fades in Its Blossom") and two Schubert songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig," was productive of a deserved success with the listeners.

The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, gave a lucid and subtly shaded reading of Sibelius' somewhat mournful E minor symphony, and an animated rendering of Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme. The symphonic dance from Strauss' "Salome" closed the programme colorfully.

From NOV 30 1923
Evening News
Newark, N. J.

Boston Symphony Giv Concert in Montc

In Fine Form, the Orchestra Under Monteux Compels Plaudits by Its Performances.

Variety Adds Spice to the Program

Returning to the Montclair High School Saturday night after an absence of a year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reappearing under the auspices of the Unity Course, was welcomed by an audience so large as to leave no vacant seats in the hall. By its performances it stirred the enthusiasm expected when the letter and the spirit in symphonic and other compositions by the elect among creative musicians are set forth more or less eloquently.

Some of the men and the women present undoubtedly knew that Conductor Monteux severs his connection with the orchestra at the end of this season, returns to Paris and probably will not revisit America. In the hearty greeting given him on his first entrance and in the applause and recalls after the several performances, there seemed to be a personal tribute to a musical director who has won the esteem of many audiences since he made his American debut about seven years ago.

In the variety and quality of its contents, the program promised enjoyment, and that promise was realized in the interpretation of it. Between the familiar overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz," with which the concert opened, and the novel Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," which brought it to an end, there were heard Dvorak's symphony in D minor, the second of his creations in that form; the Prelude and the "Death of Love" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and two of Debussy's three nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Festivals." These Russian, French and German works provided such contrasts in style, sentiments and moods that each one seemed to gain in effect by its difference in form, substance and significance from the others.

Conductor Monteux is no specialist. He is catholic in his musical taste and, like the Italian, Arturo Toscanini, is at home in all schools and periods of musical production. He may prefer some composers to others, but he appears to be in sympathy with whatever work engages him in its performance. His long experience in the operatic and the concert fields has taugth him much and given him a confidence in his readings of scores and in the command of his interpretative forces that imparts authority to his conducting.

Having this season a more perfect instrument on which to play than was the Boston Symphony four years ago when he joined it, he was able on this occasion to secure performances comparable in technical finish, refinement of style and beauty of tone to those given by the organization when it was in its best estate before wartime changes and internal dissensions affected it. Certainly in the "Freischuetz" overture there were an executive smoothness and a tonal purity that reinforced the charm in the melodies freighting the score. If there are no passages in this work to quicken the pulse of the hearer, there are no dissonances in it to irritate him. Weber was a melodist as well as a romanticist, and the serenity, chasteness and tunefulness of his overture are as pleasing now as they were to the generation that witnessed its birth.

More exacting of the orchestra's resources and of the conductor's skill were the richer orchestration, the shifting tonalities and the greater subtleties in rhythmical developments in the Dvorak symphony, which, notwithstanding its colorful character and exuberant spirit, contains nothing so alluring as is the Largo in his "From the New World." The Bohemian's originality and individuality are so evident, however, in every one of the four movements and have obtained such sonority, richness and variety in instrumentation that the work glowed under Mr. Monteux's treatment of it.

There are no greater pages in lyric drama than the "Liebestod" in "Tristan und Isolde." In them Wagner's genius for expressing emotion in musical phrases of dramatic coloring mounts to a lofty peak. In voicing the tragedy inspiring them, Mr. Monteux did not succeed in imbuing the performance with such intensity of feeling as some other conductors, notably Anton Seidl, have charged this climax of woe. It was an intelligently planned and moving, but not a thrilling performance. Moreover, the string section of the band, lost in the stress and surge of the emotional current some of the silken quality that helped to distinguish its work earlier in the evening.

In the Debussy nocturnes Mr. Monteux was on such familiar ground, so defined every contour in the music, and imparted such Gallic grace to his recreations of the tonal paintings that more finely articulated, shaded and revealing performances of these works are not given by any other symphony body in this country. The Debussyites in the audience must have revelled in them, and others, who prefer the composer's "Afternoon of a Faun" to anything in his operatic setting of "Pelleas and Melisande," appeared to delight in them.

It would be interesting to know just how much of the instrumentation of the Polovtsian dances Borodin did. Rimsky-Korsakoff says that the score of the dances was not ready for the concert at which they were to be performed for the first time in public, and, at the eleventh hour, [illegible] doff helped the composer with orchestral parts. Unlike Tschaikowsky, Borodin never obtruded the morbid [illegible] his music, and in these dances, [illegible] their exhilarating rhythm, he is [illegible] and boisterous barbarian. The [illegible] played with a virtuosity and rousing in effect that the [illegible] applause recalled Mr. Monteux thrice and [illegible] to its feet.

[151]

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH

NEW HAVEN
CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 2 3 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY THRILLS AUDIENCE AT WOOLSEY HALL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Bruce Simonds, of the Yale School of Music as solo pianist, gave a magnificent concert at Woolsey hall last evening.

The prestige of this organization, international in its scope, is enviable. Its concert last evening is the first of a week's tour which will include appearances in Montclair, N. J., Brooklyn and two in New York city.

M. Monteux, who is now completing his fifth and last season as its conductor, presented a remarkable program. It opened with the overture to "The Sold Bride" (Smetana), a work demanding much of the players, especially of the strings. The control over the violin section was marvelous—playing as one man. This is a comic opera, but its grandeur and massiveness hardly portrays the fact.

Jan Sibelius, the Finnish composer, now nearly 60 years old, has written several symphonies, the one in E minor, presented last evening, surpassing in creative genius all the others, although his orchestral legends on Kalevala subjects, the suite "Carelia" and "King Christian IV, another suite, are marvelous in their instrumentation and dynamic effects. In this symphony, one becomes bewildered with the many crashing effects, the wierd screaming motives carried so sonorously by the strings and the curious effects wrought by bassoons and flutes combined. The work teems with the wildest of imagination, a conglomeration of savage instrumentation but nevertheless all ingeniously knit together and superbly portrayed under the skillful leadership of M. Monteux.

The height of achievement of every instrumentalist, is some day to appear as soloist with one of the great orchestras, and especially the Boston Symphony. This honor was conferred upon Bruce Simonds last evening. He played the pianoforte score of the Cesar Frank Symphonic Variations with masterly skill and artistic phrasing. His is a facile technic well adapted to the work chosen. He is asympathetic and gifted artist with a warm tone and musical conception. An important part of the work was the beautiful orchestral accompaniment. The pianist was in the hands and heart of his friends who recalled him a half dozen times, with the hope of an encore.

Richard Strauss in his "Salome" music adopted an unprecedented sort of musical realism, amply suggested by the text which is almost a literal translation of Oscar Wildie's drama. There are in this work passages of great beauty, but the love music of "Salome" is frankly passionate and sensual, and the brutality of her blood-orgy was pictured forth with all the resources of modern orchestral tone painting of which Strauss is master and Monteux a vivid interpreter.

To have the Boston Symphony in this unusually arranged program, is a musical treat long to be remembered.

E. A. LEOPOLD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

N Y Tribune

NOV 30 1923

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Some Thanksgiving Day Offerings: "Parsifal" at the Metropolitan; and the Season's First Boston Symphony

Kundry, that "hysterical hussy," as Nietzsche called her, is with us once more, and yesterday she tempted Parsifal in vain to the loveliest music that ever an enchantress wasted upon male frigidity.

The Kundry of yesterday afternoon's performance was a familiar apparition: Mme. Matzenauer; but the Parsifal was a stranger in this region. The rôle was assumed by Mr. Laubenthal, the Metropolitan's new German tenor, who is proceeding sturdily on his pilgrimage through the lyric-dramas of Wagner. He has now been observed here as Walther von Stolzing in "Die Meistersinger"; as Tannhäuser, and as the last and least interesting of Wagner's heroes. For the more one lives in the same imaginative world with this strange creation of the old wizard of Bayreuth, the more one inclines toward a sneaking sympathy with Ulick Dean's brusque dismissal of Parsifal as a hero whose activities may be summed up as "the killing of a swan and the refusal of a kiss."

That is, of course, too vivacious to be wholly just. Parsifal went further than that—he did succor the distressful Amfortas, and he did put Monsalvat in running order again. Yet it is hard to feel that these achievements add much to his saliency as a dramatic figure.

* * *

Is it possible, one wonders, to make Parsifal a sympathetic or engrossing figure? We doubt it. We have seen many a singing-actor in this rôle, some of them accomplished and magnetic artists, but we have never yet seen a Parsifal who was not a bore.

This is, indeed, an opera overpopulated with bores. Gurnemanz—even when he is so nobly and affectingly impersonated as he is by Mr. Bender in the Metropolitan production—is a bore for 90 per cent of the time that he is on the stage, though he has a wonderful ten minutes in the Good Friday scene. The Monsalvat celibates, with their protracted marching and choiring, are not easy to endure. Nor is the deciduous Titurel—who, fortunately, dies before the third act is reached.

The only persons in the drama whom one does not dread to meet again are (as is so often, unhappily, the case) the considerable assortment of sinners whom Wagner included among his characters. Kundry is an enigmatic but alluring and touching figure; Amfortas is deeply affecting; the shameless Flower Girls are among Wagner's most winsome inventions; even the maleficent Klingsor, a bad citizen if ever there was one, holds the eye and the ear.

* * *

The blunt truth is that one does not always find it easy to be patient with Wagner's glorification of the monastic ideal or with the longueurs in which its exposition involves him. One abides it only because of the marvellous impressiveness of the musical and spectacular setting that Wagner has contrived for it. We have never been able to understand how any one can listen quite calmly to such scenes as the unveiling and illumination of the Grail, the exquisite Herzeleide song of Kundry, the poignantly tender music of the Good Friday episode—a page as wonderful as any that Wagner ever wrote: music which at the hundredth hearing turns the heart to water. And what is there to say of the ineffable last scene—the scene of the Glorification, with its blue and silver lights, its radiant, hovering dove, the ecstatic Parsifal and the refulgent Grail, the worshiping Knights and Wagner's wondrous music, for whose serene, transfiguring beauty there are no words that will not seem impertinent?

So "Parsifal," despite its slowness of pulse and its trying dramatis personæ, endures from year to year because a colossal and necromantic genius wove his spells about it. We listen, bored and resentful, but enchanted, and at the end we are one with the worshiping company of knights prostrate before this conquering revelation of immortal loveliness.

* * *

Yesterday's performance at the Metropolitan gained greatly over those of recent years through the presence of Mr. Laubenthal, whose Parsifal is not only his best impersonation so far but the best that we have seen here for a long time. It is simply, sincerely and at times quite movingly conceived, and Mr. Laubenthal keeps himself well within the skin of the character. He is not greatly equipped, either as actor or as singer, but he has feeling and intelligence, and he is an illusive figure in his boyishness and his slimness—but we deplore his taste in wigs.

Mme. Matzenauer, as we remember was the case last year, succeeded better with the wild and disheveled Kundry of the first act and the static penitent of the third than with the seductress of Klingsor's magic garden. Possibly her infelicitous costuming of the part in the second act had something to do with this. Certainly Mme. Matzenauer's mind seemed to be rather on the network of pearls that encompassed her than upon "Parsifal" and her assignment, for she was kept busy disentangling herself from her festoons of [illegible] and other adornments during a [illegible] Wagner.

was on hand, with an infrequently heard symphony of Sibelius—his first, in E minor—and with Mme. Onegin, the contralto of the sumptuous voice and the grand manner, as soloist in an aria from "Rienzi" ("Gerechter Gott") and two Schubert songs: "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig." The rest of the bill promised the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Salome's Dance from the opera of Richard Strauss.

It is delightful to welcome the great organization again to New York—for its concerts have been unjustly neglected in recent years. The orchestra played well last season; it plays better this: with beauty and nobility of tone, with splendid virility and élan, with plasticity and responsiveness. It is now an instrument of wide range and flexibility and finesse; and there is no doubt of its indebtedness to Mr. Monteux for this notable achievement.

They played the symphony of Sibelius—which is seldom heard hereabouts—with superb eloquence; and the work was worthy of that eloquence. This First Symphony of the Finnish master is characteristic, though it is almost a quarter of a century old, and is far from representing the Sibelius of today.

* * *

Every one is familiar with the forbidding Sibelius of critical and popular tradition. His "legend" (and what composer has not his too complacently accepted "legend," usually a misrepresentative one?) paints him as bleak, gray, severe, forbidding.

But that legend, it seems to us, takes too little account of the evident intensity of emotion which is imprisoned within this seemingly reserved and dour tone-poetry. This music is full of feeling, full of a poetry that has been generated by moods and intuitions darkly and somberly passionate—the emotions of a poet who feels the mystery and terror and inexplicable cruelty of existence too piercingly to sing of it with uncontracted throat. "The rhetorician would deceive his neighbor, the sentimentalist himself," wrote a shrewd contemporary sage. Sibelius is not deceived nor deceiving, for he is neither rhetorician nor sentimentalist.

* * *

The greater music of Sibelius, for all its outward austerity and acridness, is at bottom the utterance of a tragic poet who returns again and again to the realization that human life is at best but "a dream that lingers a moment . . . a breath, a flame in the doorway, a feather in the wind." He remembers the sorrowing echoes of beauty and delight, the shadow of the darkening Wings; and he is moved by these things, not to the pitifully abandoned lamentations of Tchaikovsky, the twilight brooding of Schumann, the noble gravity of Brahms, but to a constrained and somber melancholy that turns inward upon itself, that is unable to find release in what Rossetti called "the legitimate exercise of anguish." It may ultimately be said of him, as Arnold said of the poet Gray, that "he never spoke out."

Sibelius spoke of himself to Ivan Narodny as "a dreamer and poet of Nature." A dreamer and poet, indisputably. But there are dreamers and dreamers, poets and poets. It is sufficiently obvious that Sibelius is no poet of the sentimental tradition, no voluptuously enchanted dreamer in a world where—as Mr. Santayana once ironically observed—"there should be none but gentle tears, and fluttering, tip-toe loves . . . lights and shadows . . . roses and vices." And Sibelius, in his truly typical works, is equally remote from the emotional exuberance of the Romantics and the iridescent subtleties of the Impressionists.

* * *

In this early work he had not quite shaken himself free from the lure of the obvious. There is a melody in the Finale—the second theme, for the violins—that sounds like Saint-Saëns at his most sentimentally depraved. But along with this, there are frequent touches of originality in harmonic expression, in instrumentation (how striking and unconventional is the close of the first movement, for example), and in the balancing and contrasting of moods. The symphony will bear rehearing. It might well replace the ten-thousandth repetition of the "Pathétique" or Beethoven's Seventh or Schubert's "Unfinished" on the programs of other orchestras.

* * *

Mme. Onegin's gorgeous voice was worthy of better material than the claptrap "Rienzi" music that she sang; but she delivered it most dramatically, and the audience rewarded her liberally and with ardor. For who, after all, cares what a singer sings or a violinist plays? What is a composer, anyway, but a stalking-horse? The Schubert songs were a wholly needless sop to the more exigent; for these are few and hardly count.

FREAKS OF NATURE
WATER SCORPION

TO-DAY'S HOROSCOPE

2—I believe that the Grail passages and the Magdalene episode of the washing of the feet, prove Wagner's intention to operatize Jesus Christ under the name of Parsifal.

3—Wagner was an avowed atheist all his life until he discovered that the Passion Play at Oberammergau had become highly profitable, and that it was possible to commercialize religion in the same way in opera by writing his "Parsifal," monopolizing it for Bayreuth, and making its hearing a pilgrimage to a musical shrine.

4—"Parsifal" is a mockery of the Christian religion, for the libretto is a mixture of old Hindu beliefs and rituals with Scriptural dogmas and ceremonies.

5—Wagner dumped into "Parsifal" also other cults, like vegetarianism, misogynism, homeopathism, not to speak of homo-sexualism, and the bisexualism of the second act, with the shameless temptation of Parsifal by Kundry and her young lady boarders.

6—The second act was devised by Wagner solely with a view to affording contrast and am Gustafson did that -the-box, Titurel, who pops out on several unneces- occasions. The magician, or, had Gustav Schuetzen- as his interpreter. Mar- Roeseler headed the very rilled and tuneful flower ls, Grace Anthony, Ray- Delaunois, Laura Robertson, Phradie Wells, Henriette Wakefield. Knights and Esquires of the Grail were Merle Alcock, Angelo Bada, Louis D'Angelo, Ellen Dalossy, Louise Hunter, George Meader and Pietro Audisio.

---

It was good to note that at least one silly myth had been exploded in connection with the supposedly religious atmosphere of "Parsifal"—those who liked the show, applauded.

* * *

Lovers of song agreeable in tone and refined in delivery, were well satisfied with Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, last evening. Other qualities she displayed were warm temperament and musical assurance. Her performance of an aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" ("My Life Fades in Its Blossom") and two Schubert songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig," was productive of a deserved success with the listeners.

The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, gave a lucid and subtly shaded reading of Sibelius' somewhat mournful E minor symphony, and an animated rendering of Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme. The symphonic dance from Strauss' "Salome" closed the programme colorfully.

From NOV 30 192
Evening News
Newark, N. J.

Boston Symphony Giv Concert in Montc

In Fine Form, the Orchestra Un Monteux Compels Plaudits by Its Performances.

Variety Adds Spice to the Progr am

Returning to the Montclair High School Saturday night after an absence of a year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reappearing under the auspices of the Unity Course, was welcomed by an audience so large as to leave no vacant seats in the hall. B its performances it stirred the enth siasm expected when the letter and t spirit in symphonic and other compos tions by the elect among creative m sicians are set forth more or less elo quently.

Some of the men and the wome present undoubtedly knew that Con ductor Monteux severs his connectio with the orchestra at the end of thi season, returns to Paris and probabl will not revisit America. In the heart greeting given him on his first en trance and in the applause and recall after the several performances, ther seemed to be a personal tribute to a musical director who has won the esteem of many audiences since he made his American debut about seven years ago.

In the variety and quality of its contents, the program promised enjoyment, and that promise was realized in the interpretation of it. Between the familiar overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz," with which the concert opened, and the novel Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," which brought it to an end, there were heard Dvorak's symphony in D minor, the second of his creations in that form; the Prelude and the "Death of Love" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and two of Debussy's three nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Festivals." These Russian, French and German works provided such contrasts in style, sentiments and moods that each one seemed to gain in effect by its difference in form, substance and significance from the others.

Conductor Monteux is no specialist. He is catholic in his musical taste and, like the Italian, Arturo Toscanini, is at home in all schools and periods of musical production. He may prefer some composers to others, but he appears to be in sympathy with whatever work engages him in its performance. His long experience in the operatic and the concert fields has taugth him much and given him a confidence in his readings of scores and in the command of his interpretative forces that imparts authority to his conducting.

Having this season a more perfect instrument on which to play than was the Boston Symphony four years ago, when he joined it, he was able on this occasion to secure performances comparable in technical finish, refinement of style and beauty of tone to those given by the organization when it was in its best estate before wartime changes and internal dissensions affected it. Certainly in the "Freischuetz" overture there were an executive smoothness and a tonal purity that reinforced the charm in the melodies freighting the score. If there are no passages in this work to quicken the pulse of the hearer, there are no dissonances in it to irritate him. Weber was a melodist as well as a romanticist, and the serenity, chasteness and tunefulness of his overture are as pleasing now as they were to the generation that witnessed its birth.

More exacting of the orchestra's resources and of the conductor's skill were the richer orchestration, the shifting tonalities and the greater subtleties in rhythmical developments in the Dvorak symphony, which, notwithstanding its colorful character and exuberant spirit, contains nothing so alluring as is the Largo in his "From the New World." The Bohemian's originality and individuality are so evident, however, in every one of the four movements and have obtained such sonority, richness and variety in instrumentation that the work glowed under Mr. Monteux's treatment of it.

There are no greater pages in lyric drama than the "Liebestod" in "Tristan und Isolde." In them Wagner's genius for expressing emotion in musical phrases of dramatic coloring mounts to a lofty peak. In voicing the tragedy inspiring them, Mr. Monteux did not succeed in imbuing the performance with such intensity of feeling as some other conductors, notably Anton Seidl, have charged this climax of woe. It was an intelligently planned and moving, but not a thrilling performance. Moreover, the string section of the band, lost in the stress and surge of the emotional current some of the silken quality that helped to distinguish its work earlier in the evening.

In the Debussy nocturnes Mr. Monteux was on such familiar ground, so defined every contour in the music, and imparted such Gallic grace to his recreations of the tonal paintings that more finely articulated, shaded and revealing performances of these works are not given by any other symphonic body in this country. The Debussyites in the audience must have reveled in them, and others, who prefer the composer's "Afternoon of a Faun" to anything in his operatic setting of "Pelleas and Melisande," appeared to delight in them.

It would be interesting to know just how much of the instrumentation of the Polovtsian dances Borodin did. Rimsky-Korsakoff says that the score of the dances was not ready for the concert at which they were to be performed for the first time in public, and, at the eleventh hour, doff helped the composer with orchestral parts. Unlike Tschaikowsky Borodin never obtruded the morbid his music, and in these dances, their exhilarating rhythm, he is and boisterous barbarian. The played with a virtuosity and rousing in effect that th applause following them Mr. Monteux thrice an to its feet.

EV

E

B

Pier
Hall
York season
Symph chestra the cre the olde creation
Though presided with dist
Nikisch in Muck in which Mr. lead in Oc essentially t Gericke had then trained orchestras o
There ca wreck, ave courage an Monteux an old member present orc of all that phony have years, is a telligent a
Pierre Mon
In losing ton will lo ed music a spectac indulge in does not ers after donna of
He has ist in ultr the most among th printemps his direct at home i attitude t without it traditional Altogeth land are of various Pierre Mo human, he even his ever, does certs dete
He is a pathies, a artistic other of conductor consistent of such such ad
Serge double-ceed M quite a tral con sensatio the hyp over au been to he "fe his vag limitatio pressed dynamic Doubt will re hind t steppes.
able th another stamp o Monteux gather Boston b gether a
The pr gan with the E mi a compos appeal s
The othe
Brahms's
St. Anton of Salom opera "S
In th tonal b virtuosit large sc tearing more t
of the page set f surpa ton s
The Sigri
from her with
"Die out s
The both tive
T Bo

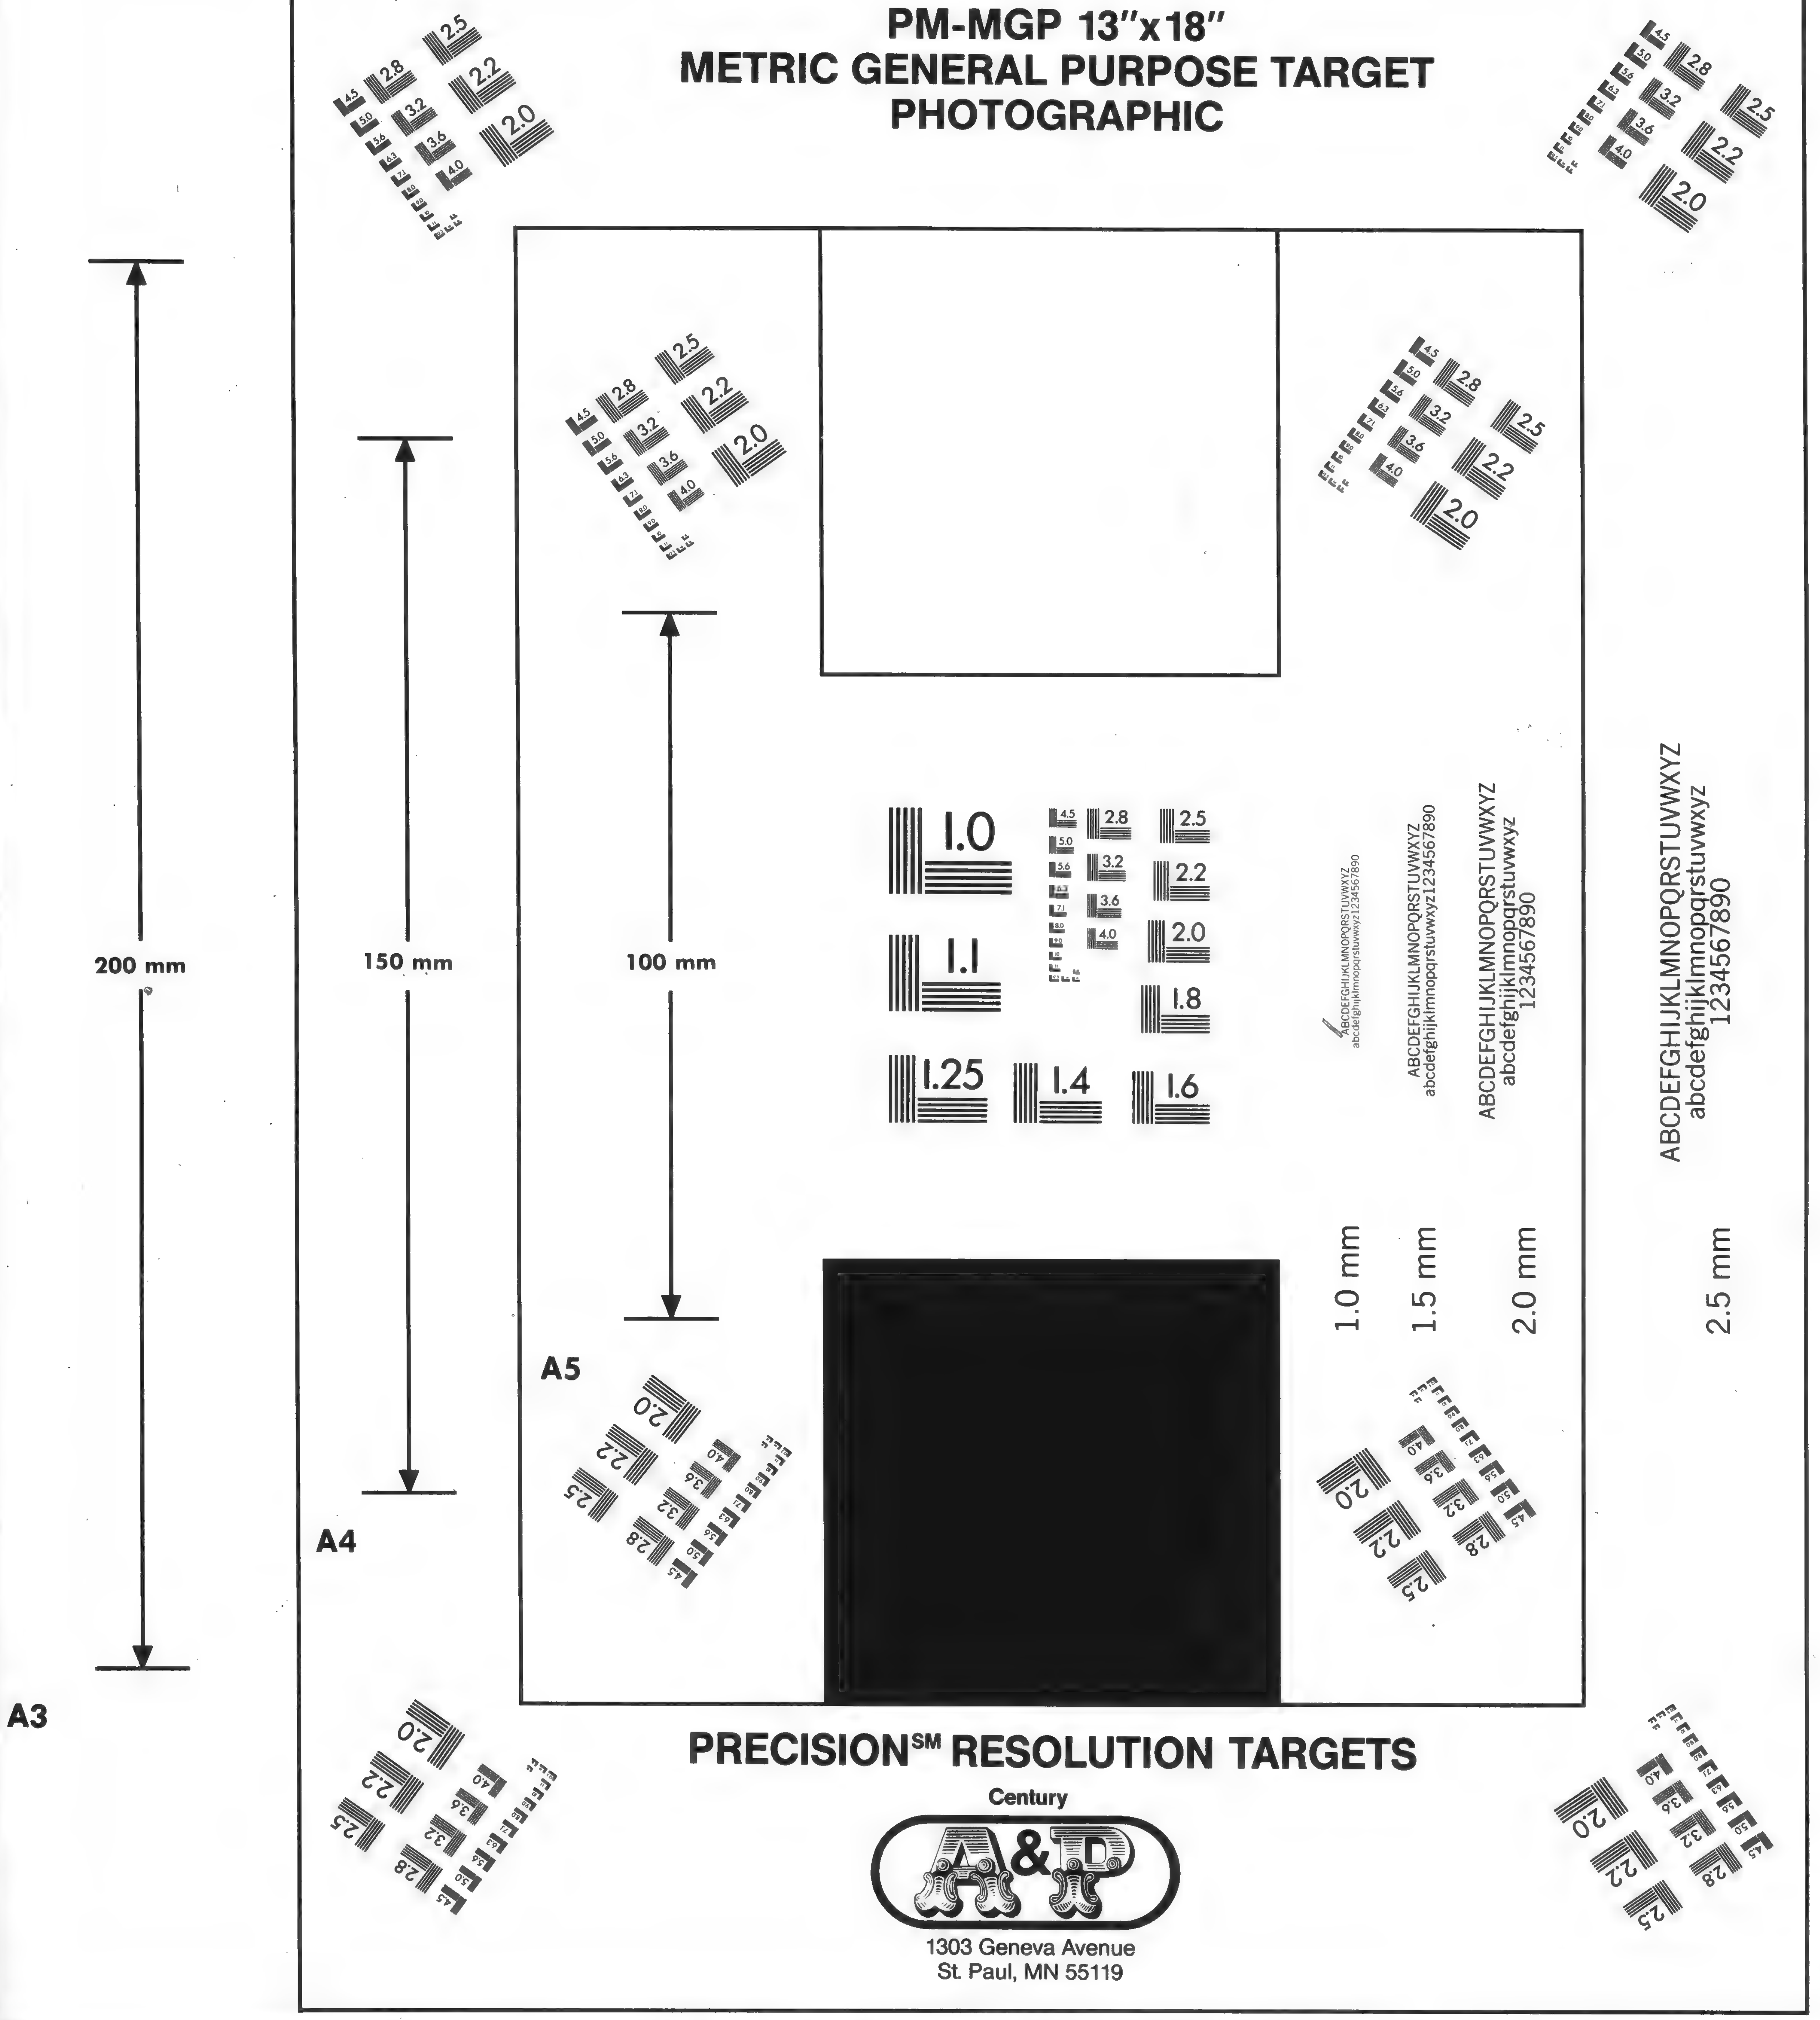
151

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

NEW YORK
EVENING MAIL

NOV 30 1923

EVENTS IN MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux led in Carnegie Hall last evening the first New York concert of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That orchestra as it exists today is as much the creation of Mr. Monteux as the older Boston Symphony was the creation of Wilhelm Gericke.

Though other conductors have presided over the Boston Symphony with distinction, notably Arthur Nikisch in its earlier days and Karl Muck in its later, the orchestra which Mr. Monteux was called to lead in October, 1919, was still essentially the orchestra that Herr Gericke had astutely assembled and then trained to primacy among the orchestras of the world.

There came the peril of shipwreck, averted mainly through courage and firmness of Mr. Monteux and the loyal devotion of old members of the orchestra. The present orchestra, which is worthy of all that the words Boston Symphony have meant during so many years, is a monument to the intelligent and untiring labor of Pierre Monteux.

In losing him as conductor Boston will lose a sincere and unaffected musician. Mr. Monteux is not a spectacular leader; he does not indulge in posing and posturing; he does not sacrifice to the idle hunters after sensation; he is no prima donna of the baton.

He has been known as a specialist in ultramodern music; some of the most important modern scores, among them Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," were played first under his direction. But he is thoroughly at home in the classics. Indeed, his attitude to the older classics is not without its touch of the "purism" traditional with French musicians.

Altogether, few conductors in any land are so satisfactory in music of various periods and schools as Pierre Monteux. Doubtless, being human, he has his preferences and even his prejudices, but rarely, if ever, does the listener at his concerts detect them disagreeably.

He is a conductor of board sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programme of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian double-bass player, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences; and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he "feels" it, without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics, or expression.

Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joy-ride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew.

The programme last evening began with persuasive exposition of the E minor symphony of Sibelius, a composer who always seems to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms's variations on the "Chorale St. Antoni" of Haydn and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera "Salome."

In the former work the sheer tonal beauty and the technical virtuosity of the orchestra found large scope. As for Salome's dance, tearing it from its context was more than justified by the splendor of the result. Never can that Asiatic page have been more gorgeously set forth, in part because of the surpassing sensuousness of the Boston strings.

The soloist of this concert was Sigrid Onegin. If Adriano's scena from "Rienzi" lies a trifle high for her noble contralto, she was heard with keen pleasure in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" (sung simply, without shrieking) and "Der Erlkoenig." The orchestral accompaniment to both songs was discreet and effective.

The large audience was one of the most enthusiastic of the present season.

A symphony concert in the high Boston tradition. P. S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 30 1923

The Boston Symphony.

Pierre Monteux's last season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had its New York inauguration last evening at Carnegie Hall. There are few conductors familiar to metropolitan audiences who are more consummate masters of the difficult art of program making than Monteux—one may be sure that what novelties he presents, and they are many, will be worth hearing. Nor is there any conductor more at home with the music of modern France. To hear Debussy's or Ravel's music under Monteux's baton is an experience, for nowhere is he more attuned to the spirit and mood of the music.

For the first appearance of his orchestra this season Monteux elected to present Sibelius' First Symphony. Paul Rosenfeld, in Musical Portraits, has offered a poetic description of Sibelius' music in which very nearly hits the mark. It is a harsh and discordant language that the Finnish composer speaks, a barren and icy beauty of great individuality. Mr. Rosenfeld's paper has been quoted in the program notes of the Boston Orchestra, though it is not entirely applicable to the First Symphony. The E minor Symphony, with its Brahmsian Andante, is only a promise. The development came later. Sibelius had not yet mastered his idiom. Not until we reach the Fourth Symphony does the composer speak wholly in his own tongue.

The performance of the Symphony was not as satisfactory as it might have been. Monteux sought for power, which he got at the expense of tonal beauty and finish. It was often labored and uneven, particularly noticeable in the string sections of the orchestra.

Sigrid Onegin was soloist, singing an air from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs. Onegin's voice is truly magnificent contralto of great range and power and her delivery intensely dramatic. Particularly fine was the familiar "Erlkonig," sung with orchestral accompaniment.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

30 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is paying its first visit of the season to New York, and gave a concert under Mr. Pierre Monteux's direction at Carnegie Hall last night which will be followed by a second on Saturday afternoon.

They deserve the thanks of music lovers for having placed in the forefront of their program a symphony which is not to be heard every day and which is well worth a hearing—in fact several hearings. This was the first by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius (Opus 39 in E minor). His symphonies now number five (unless he has added another quite lately) and the fifth was heard in London two years or so ago on the occasion of his last visit there.

Sibelius's style as a composer has developed much since the production of this first symphony, but he is not one of those modern composers who so outgrows his early habits of thought that when you return to his early work after hearing the latter you wonder that it could have been written by the same man. One recognizes the same rather austere mind, the love of definite rhythms and clear-cut lines of melody, the refusal of orchestral luxuries and lavishness of tone. There is, however, in this symphony a tendency to carry on the design by the repetition of patterns in a strict sequence which he has outgrown. He now draws with a freer hand, though he does not use a fuller brush in coloring.

The Boston Orchestra gave a finely studied performance in which everything was precise and clear. Mr. Monteux is a conductor who seems to place himself and his orchestra in the hands of a composer rather than to take the composer and his work into his own hands. Both here and in Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn we were given what the composer said without comment. Both Sibelius and Brahms can stand this treatment, we might say they deserve it. The Brahms Variations indeed are so exquisite a piece of workmanship that one asks nothing better than to wonder afresh at their perfection every time they are heard.

The hymn of St. Anthony, attributed to Haydn, seems at first a dry root of melody. Under Brahms's magic it is made to put forth shoots and tendrils which burst into blossom. One or two of the variations were taken a trifle fast, but not too fast for beauty, and the finale on a ground bass had just the inevitable swing in its progress which it needs. As we listened to this movement it seemed more than ever surprising that Brahms's mastery of the orchestra should have been matter for dispute.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin added songs with orchestra to this program. Her beautiful quality of voice was well suited to the scena "Gerichte Gott," from Wagner's "Rienzi" and was enjoyable also in Schubert's "Die Allmacht." "Der Erl König." But she should beware of the portamento, especially of that variant of it which consists of beginning below the note in quiet passages and rising up to it. It falsifies the expression it is meant to create, and is particularly distressing in a voice so naturally pure as hers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 30 1923

MONTEUX AND BOSTONIANS PLAY HERE

If Mr. Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were as arresting an interpreter of music as he is a programme builder, this probably wouldn't be his last season at the head of the band. In the years since he reorganized the orchestra after what now seems like the faintly historical incident of the departure of Dr. Karl Muck (himself as poor a programme maker as he was an excellently sensitive revealer of music), Mr. Monteux has devised more interesting, not to say exciting, orchestral menus than any other conductor this town listens to. It is quite too bad that the gods didn't make him some combination of himself and Dr. Muck.

However, they didn't, and next year the Boston Orchestra is to be directed by the Russian, Sergyei Kussevitsky, who is reported to be, orchestrally speaking, a combination of Chaliapin and Mengelberg, but without the Dutch trimmings—all of which is neither here nor there, or rather much more there than here.

Mr. Monteux brought the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall last night for the first of their ten pairs of concerts during the Winter, and once more it was quite evident that he is not one of the conductors who engage in the indoor sport of chasing one another round the smallest circle of the repertoire. He played a symphony of Jan Sibelius, the commanding Finn, whose existence all the other orchestral directors seem suddenly to have forgotten—early Sibelius, symphonically, but still Sibelius, for he was himself even when he wrote this, his First Symphony.

The Last of the Symphonists.

We feel peculiarly grateful to Mr. Monteux for giving the piece a hearing again. Undoubtedly it has been played here before, but we didn't seem to remember it at all last night. At any rate, there is some glorious music in it, and it aditionally served to revivify and confirm our notion that Sibelius is the biggest figure among the last of the symphonists. The ordinary orchestral addict will of course have recognized the very substantial ghost of Tchaikovsky stalking through this symphony, and even the wraith of Hunding might have been seen flashing by on the Flight motif of the "Ring," but these were little things quite subsidiary to the splendid energy and beauty of what Sibelius himself had to say.

A good deal of nonsense has unfortunately been written about the music of this Finn, and this may partly account for the little headway that most of it has made. The commentators have bundled it all within the cliche that it is an expression of the Finnish land and seascape. Even Mr. Philip Hale, who ought to know better, gave this First Symphony only one page of his programme notes last night and filled two thirds of that with a quotation from Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, manneredly stamping Sibelius's output once more as "blood brother to the wind and the silence, the lowering cliffs and the spray," the "vasty open," the "breath of the fog," and the whatnot of the land under "the Finnish heaven."

This First Symphony, as a fact—and the Third and the Fourth and the Fifth, as well—are as subjective, even introspective, music as was ever written. They have about as much to do with the Finnish fogscape as Beethoven's Seventh with the topography of Vienna.

Misguided Rosenfeldiana.

We don't happen to be concerned with more than the First Symphony at the moment, but Mr. Hale's Rosenfeldiana were certainly curiously misguided in relation to that. For here is music that is the offspring of mood if ever there was any—so much so that this becomes its prime fault. The mood picture is keleidoscopic, with the composer turning the wheel in frenzied jerks, as though he couldn't pour out his tumult of shifting feeling fast enough. But the tumult and the intensity of his emotion flame through his musical fabric, through his memories of Tchaikovsky, through his sometimes confused orchestration—although the last, we strongly suspect, was more a matter of Mr. Monteux's crude hand than anything of the sort on the part of Sibelius. Mr. Monteux, indeed, gave the symphony a pretty rough-and-ready performance, generally mistaking vigor for enesgy; generally, in fact, letting most of its imaginative quality slip through his fingers.

The second half of Mr. Monteux's programme consisted of the Brahms variations on a theme of Haydn and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's "Salome." Sigrid Onegin, as soloist punctuated these with Adriano's scena and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Der Erlkoenig," the last two having been part of her recent recital here. The "Rienzi" scena is recognizable Wagner, but the aria is merely recognizable Weber and Meyerbeer. Mme Onegin sang the thing with mighty tone but rather hazy enunciation. Even her undoubtedly impressive heroics didn't make one hanker much for a full evening of "Rienzi."

ESTABLISHED
From
NOV 30 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Boston Symphony in First Concert Here This Season

Sigrid Onegin as Soloist; 'Parsifal' in Holiday Return to Opera Repertory.

Thanksgiving Day and the Boston Symphony were both invented in New England. A synonymity is to be implied. There is cause enough for gratitude in the return to Carnegie Hall yesterday evening of the last of the orchestras which furnish New York with concerts at regular intervals. It was under holiday conditions then that that admirable program maker, Conductor Pierre Monteux, began his final season here in charge of the historic band.

Sibelius's first symphony, an early work in E-minor, started the night off. It is scarcely to be compared, of course, to the Finnish master's subsequent symphonies,—the second, notably,—of a so much darker and more individual strength. Now and then there was more than hint in this First of what he would arrive at in after years, and the third movement, allegro, was immediately arresting. Yet it is mostly indecisive romance, the groping of a young but chilled Tschaikowsky.

At a later hour the orchestra was playing Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, fast becoming a familiar classicism hereabouts, and ended with Salome's Dance from the Strauss opera. All these works the orchestra played with that lust for tonal aggrandizement, bluntly occasionally, roughly won, which has come to be one of its recent characteristics. Mr. Monteux, for all his personal calmness, specializes on power, on solidity, on a masculinity of interpretation which has conferred new personality, for better or worse, upon his orchestra.

The evening had a vocal soloist in Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the Metropolitan mezzo, who sang the scena and aria of Adriano from Wagner's "Rienzi." We shall have the opera in its entirety soon, and it will be time enough then to judge of its interest for modern listeners. Again Mme. Onegin gave the two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig," with orchestral accompaniment. Her gloriously open voice is a robe of velvet over all she sings, no matter how prodigally and carelessly she flings it. She may wear it cruelly out in the process, but

---

FROM THE

NOV 30

Boston Orchestra Opens Local Series

Anticipating the Wagnerian Opera Company, which has announced that it will give Wagner's "Rienzi" at its forthcoming season here, Mme. Sigrid Onegin sang a long aria from this old opera last night at the first concert of the local series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It was brilliantly sung, but it does not presage new or particularly interesting things for the promised revival. It was not Wagner at his best. However, it is unwise to judge an opera by a single aria The overture of "Rienzi" is one of the most popular of Wagnerian orchestral selections. Under the guidance of Pierre Monteux the Boston musicians gave an excellent performance of the first Sibelius symphony. There are delightful melodies in this work, and there are some finely worked up climaxes of tone, but it is far inferior to the same composer's second symphony. The performance was more interesting than the work itself.

Also under Mr. Monteux's baton were presented Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Salome's Dance m Richard Strauss' "Salome." This be Mr. Monteux's last season as ductor of the Boston Orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

30 1923

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last evening in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, was received with genuine and well-warranted enthusiasm. There were several reasons for the prolonged applause. One of them was the appearance of Sigrid Onegin, who sang "Just God" and "My Life Fades in the Blossom" from Rienzi, and returned to give Schubert's "Die Allmacht," and "Erlkönig." It was the Erlking that aroused the audience to a high pitch; Mme. Onegin makes it thrillingly and beautifully moving, dramatic, and terrible.

Another reason for the enthusiasm was the programme. Pierre Monteux may be depended upon every season for new and interesting music. His symphony was the E minor of Sibelius, No. 1, opus 39, which was given a crisp, clean performance, and which is entitled to a place on more programmes. There was also the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," played beautifully, and Strauss's "Salome's Dance." The orchestra plays again Saturday afternoon, giving Mahler, Respighi, Dukas, and Smetana.

H. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 30 1

At Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave a program last evening which included the Symphony in E minor of Sibelius, and works by Brahms, Wagner, Schumann and Strauss. Mme. Siegrid Onegin appeared [illegible] delier in this scen

* * *

Mr. Whitehill's Amfortas was, as before, a figure of piercing woefulness; surely there is nothing finer in his repertoire than this deeply felt portrayal. But was not Mr. Whitehill at less than his best yesterday? Apparently the orchestra was; and so, much more evidently, was the new contralto of the company, Mme. Merle Alcock, who sang the brief but important alto solo at the close of the first act. Some jinx must have had it in for this excellent singer, for not only was she stationed much too near the audience (the directions call for "Eine Altstimme, aus der Höhe," ("from above"), but Mme. Alcock apparently forgot which notes the score requires her to sing. The record of the chorus (both of the pure and the impure—the knights and the daisies) was not wholly without blemish; but the ladies are charming to look upon. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

* * *

The setting of the sanctuary in the first and third acts—the vast Byzantine hall with its lofty, vaulted dome and its soaring columns—was as impressive as ever. The pictorial beauty of this interior, especially in the last scene, with its imaginative and skillful lighting, is a thing to remember and to praise. Indeed, the production as a whole, despite whatever lapses one must note, is extremely impressive. It is difficult to witness it and not feel moved to agree, after all, with Ernest Newman's conviction that "Parsifal" is "in many ways the most wonderful and extraordinary thing that has ever been done in music."

The First Boston Symphony Concert

There was a joyous sight for the faithful at Carnegie Hall last night: the sight of a Boston Symphony audience that almost filled the visible portion of Carnegie Hall. It was the famous orchestra's first New York concert of the season. Mr. Monteux, its devoted and efficient conductor, [152]

NEW YORK
EVENING MAIL

NOV 3 0 1923

EVENTS IN MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux led in Carnegie Hall last evening the first New York concert of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That orchestra as it exists today is as much the creation of Mr. Monteux as the older Boston Symphony was the creation of Wilhelm Gericke.

Though other conductors have presided over the Boston Symphony with distinction, notably Arthur Nikisch in its earlier days and Karl Muck in its later, the orchestra which Mr. Monteux was called to lead in October, 1919, was still essentially the orchestra that Herr Gericke had astutely assembled and then trained to primacy among the orchestras of the world.

There came the peril of shipwreck, averted mainly through courage and firmness of Mr. Monteux and the loyal devotion of old members of the orchestra. The present orchestra, which is worthy of all that the words Boston Symphony have meant during so many years, is a monument to the intelligent and untiring labor of Pierre Monteux.

In losing him as conductor Boston will lose a sincere and unaffected musician. Mr. Monteux is not a spectacular leader; he does not indulge in posing and posturing; he does not sacrifice to the idle hunters after sensation; he is no prima donna of the baton.

He has been known as a specialist in ultramodern music; some of the most important modern scores, among them Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," were played first under his direction. But he is thoroughly at home in the classics. Indeed, his attitude to the older classics is not without its touch of the "purism" traditional with French musicians.

Altogether, few conductors in any land are so satisfactory in music of various periods and schools as Pierre Monteux. Doubtless, being human, he has his preferences and even his prejudices, but rarely, if ever, does the listener at his concerts detect them disagreeably.

He is a conductor of board sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programmes of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian double-bass player, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences; and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he "feels" it, without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics, or expression.

Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joy-ride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew.

The programme last evening began with persuasive exposition of the E minor symphony of Sibelius, a composer who always seems to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms's variations on the "Chorale St. Antoni" of Haydn and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera "Salome."

In the former work the sheer tonal beauty and the technical virtuosity of the orchestra found large scope. As for Salome's dance, tearing it from its context was more than justified by the splendor of the result. Never can that Asiatic page have been more gorgeously set forth, in part because of the surpassing sensuousness of the Boston strings.

The soloist of this concert was Sigrid Onegin. If Adriano's scena from "Rienzi" lies a trifle high for her noble contralto, she was heard with keen pleasure in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" (sung simply, without shrieking) and "Der Erlkoenig." The orchestral accompaniment to both songs was discreet and effective.

The large audience was one of the most enthusiastic of the present season.

A symphony concert in the high Boston tradition.

P. S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 3 0 1923

The Boston Symphony.

Pierre Monteux's last season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra had its New York inauguration last evening at Carnegie Hall. There are few conductors familiar to metropolitan audiences who are more consummate masters of the difficult art of program making than Monteux—one may be sure that what novelties he presents, and they are many, will be worth hearing. Nor is there any conductor more at home with the music of modern France. To hear Debussy's or Ravel's music under Monteux's baton is an experience, for nowhere is he more attuned to the spirit and mood of the music.

For the first appearance of his orchestra this season Monteux elected to present Sibelius' First Symphony. Paul Rosenfeld, in Musical Portraits, has offered a poetic description of Sibelius' music in which very nearly hits the mark. It is a harsh and discordant language that the Finnish composer speaks, a barren and icy beauty of great individuality. Mr. Rosenfeld's paper has been quoted in the program notes of the Boston Orchestra, though it is not entirely applicable to the First Symphony. The E minor Symphony, with its Brahmsian Andante, is only a promise. The development came later. Sibelius had not yet mastered his idiom. Not until we reach the Fourth Symphony does the composer speak wholly in his own tongue.

The performance of the Symphony was not as satisfactory as it might have been. Monteux sought for power, which he got at the expense of tonal beauty and finish. It was often labored and uneven, particularly noticeable in the string sections of the orchestra.

Sigrid Onegin was soloist, singing an air from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs. Onegin's voice is truly magnificent contralto of great range and power and her delivery intensely dramatic. Particularly fine was the familiar "Erlkonig," sung with orchestral accompaniment.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

3 0 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is paying its first visit of the season to New York, and gave a concert under Mr. Pierre Monteux's direction at Carnegie Hall last night which will be followed by a second on Saturday afternoon.

They deserve the thanks of music lovers for having placed in the forefront of their program a symphony which is not to be heard every day and which is well worth a hearing—in fact several hearings. This was the first by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius (Opus 39 in E minor). His symphonies now number five (unless he has added another quite lately) and the fifth was heard in London two years or so ago on the occasion of his last visit there.

Sibelius's style as a composer has developed much since the production of this first symphony, but he is not one of those modern composers who so outgrows his early habits of thought that when you return to his early work after hearing the latter you wonder that it could have been written by the same man. One recognizes the same rather austere mind, the love of defined rhythms and clear-cut lines of melody, the refusal of orchestral luxuries and lavishness of tone. There is, however, in this symphony a tendency to carry on the design by the repetition of patterns in a strict sequence which he has outgrown. He now draws with a freer hand, though he does not use a fuller brush in coloring.

The Boston Orchestra gave a finely studied performance in which everything was precise and clear. Mr. Monteux is a conductor who seems to place himself and his orchestra in the hands of a composer rather than to take the composer and his work into his own hands. Both here and in Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn we were given what the composer said without comment. Both Sibelius and Brahms can stand this treatment, we might say they deserve it. The Brahms Variations indeed are so exquisite a piece of workmanship that one asks nothing better than to wonder afresh at their perfection every time they are heard.

The hymn of St. Anthony, attributed to Haydn, seems at first a dry root of melody. Under Brahms's magic it is made to put forth shoots and tendrils which burst into blossom. One or two of the variations were taken a trifle fast, but not too fast for beauty, and the finale on a ground bass had just the inevitable swing in its progress which it needs. As we listened to this movement it seemed more than ever surprising that Brahms's mastery of the orchestra should have been matter for dispute.

Mme. Sigrid Onegin added songs with orchestra to this program. Her beautiful quality of voice was well suited to the scena "Gerichte Gott," from Wagner's "Rienzi" and was enjoyable also in Schubert's "Die Allmacht." "Der Erl König." But she should beware of the portamento, especially of that variant of it which consists of beginning below the note in quiet passages and rising up to it. It falsifies the expression it is meant to create, and is particularly distressing in a voice so naturally pure as hers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 3 0 1923

MONTEUX AND BOSTONIANS PLAY HERE

If Mr. Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were as arresting an interpreter of music as he is a programme builder, this probably wouldn't be his last season at the head of the band. In the years since he reorganized the orchestra after what now seems like the faintly historical incident of the departure of Dr. Karl Muck (himself as poor a programme maker as he was an excellently sensitive revealer of music), Mr. Monteux has devised more interesting, not to say exciting, orchestral menus than any other conductor this town listens to. It is quite too bad that the gods didn't make him some combination of himself and Dr. Muck.

However, they didn't, and next year the Boston Orchestra is to be directed by the Russian, Sergyei Kussevitsky, who is reported to be, orchestrally speaking, a combination of Chaliapin and Mengelberg, but without the Dutch trimmings—all of which is neither here nor there, or rather much more there than here.

Mr. Monteux brought the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall last night for the first of their ten pairs of concerts during the Winter, and once more it was quite evident that he is not one of the conductors who engage in the indoor sport of chasing one another round the smallest circle of the repertoire. He played a symphony of Jan Sibelius, the commanding Finn, whose existence all the other orchestral directors seem suddenly to have forgotten—early Sibelius, symphonically, but still Sibelius, for he was himself even when he wrote this, his First Symphony.

The Last of the Symphonists.

We feel peculiarly grateful to Mr. Monteux for giving the piece a hearing again. Undoubtedly it has been played here before, but we didn't seem to remember it at all last night. At any rate, there is some glorious music in it, and it aditionally served to revivify and confirm our notion that Sibelius is the biggest figure among the last of the symphonists. The ordinary orchestral addict will of course have recognized the very substantial ghost of Tchaikovsky stalking through this symphony, and even the wraith of Hunding might have been seen flashing by on the Flight motif of the "Ring," but these were little things quite subsidiary to the splendid energy and beauty of what Sibelius himself had to say.

A good deal of nonsense has unfortunately been written about the music of this Finn, and this may partly account for the little headway that most of it has made. The commentators have bundled it all within the cliche that it is an expression of the Finnish land and seascape. Even Mr. Philip Hale, who ought to know better, gave this First Symphony only one page of his programme notes last night and filled two thirds of that with a quotation from Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, manneredly stamping Sibelius's output once more as "blood brother to the wind and the silence, the lowering cliffs and the spray," the "vasty open," the "breath of the fog," and the whatnot of the land under "the Finnish heaven."

This First Symphony, as a fact—and the Third and the Fourth and the Fifth, as well—are as subjective, even introspective, music as was ever written. They have about as much to do with the Finnish fogscape as Beethoven's Seventh with the topography of Vienna.

Misguided Rosenfeldiana.

We don't happen to be concerned with more than the First Symphony at the moment, but Mr. Hale's Rosenfeldiana were certainly curiously misguided in relation to that. For here is music that is the offspring of mood if ever there was any—so much so that this becomes its prime fault. The mood picture is keleidoscopic, with the composer turning the wheel in frenzied jerks, as though he couldn't pour out his tumult of shifting feeling fast enough. But the tumult and the intensity of his emotion flame through his musical fabric, through his memories of Tchaikovsky, through his sometimes confused orchestration—although the last, we strongly suspect, was more a matter of Mr. Monteux's crude hand than anything of the sort on the part of Sibelius. Mr. Monteux, indeed, gave the symphony a pretty rough-and-ready performance, generally mistaking vigor for enesgy; generally, in fact, letting most of its imaginative quality slip through his fingers.

The second half of Mr. Monteux's programme consisted of the Brahms variations on a theme of Haydn and the Dance of the Seven Veils from Richard Strauss's "Salome." Sigrid Onegin, as soloist punctuated these with Adriano's scena and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi" and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Der Erlkoenig," the last two having been part of her recent recital here. The "Rienzi" scena is recognizable Wagner, but the aria is merely recognizable Weber and Meyerbeer. Mme Onegin sang the thing with mighty tone but rather hazy enunciation. Even her undoubtedly impressive heroics didn't make one hanker much for a full evening of "Rienzi."

ESTABLISHED 1833
From
NOV 3 0 1923
Evening Sun
New York City

Boston Symphony in First Concert Here This Season

Sigrid Onegin as Soloist; 'Parsifal' in Holiday Return to Opera Repertory.

Thanksgiving Day and the Boston Symphony were both invented in New England. A synonymity is to be implied. There is cause enough for gratitude in the return to Carnegie Hall yesterday evening of the last of the orchestras which furnish New York with concerts at regular intervals. It was under holiday conditions then that that admirable program maker, Conductor Pierre Monteux, began his final season here in charge of the historic band.

Sibelius's first symphony, an early work in E-minor, started the night off. It is scarcely to be compared, of course, to the Finnish master's subsequent symphonies,—the second, notably,—of a so much darker and more individual strength. Now and then there was more than hint in this First of what he would arrive at in after years, and the third movement, allegro, was immediately arresting. Yet it is mostly indecisive romance, the groping of a young but chilled Tschaikowsky.

At a later hour the orchestra was playing Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, fast becoming a familiar classicism hereabouts, and ended with Salome's Dance from the Strauss opera. All these works the orchestra played with that lust for tonal aggrandizement, bluntly occasionally, roughly won, which has come to be one of its recent characteristics. Mr. Monteux, for all his personal calmness, specializes on power, on solidity, on a masculinity of interpretation which has conferred new personality, for better or worse, upon his orchestra.

The evening had a vocal soloist in Mme. Sigrid Onegin, the Metropolitan mezzo, who sang the scena and aria of Adriano from Wagner's "Rienzi." We shall have the opera in its entirety soon, and it will be time enough then to judge of its interest for modern listeners. Again Mme. Onegin gave the two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig," with orchestral accompaniment. Her gloriously open voice is a robe of velvet over all she sings, no matter how prodigally and carelessly she flings it. She may wear it cruelly out in the process, but that's her [illegible]—and last [illegible] sure.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NOV 3 0

Boston Orchestra Opens Local Series

Anticipating the Wagnerian Opera Company, which has announced that it will give Wagner's "Rienzi" at its forthcoming season here, Mme. Sigrid Onegin sang a long aria from this old opera last night at the first concert of the local series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. It was brilliantly sung, but it does not presage new or particularly interesting things for the promised revival. It was not Wagner at his best. However, it is unwise to judge an opera by a single aria. The overture of "Rienzi" is one of the most popular of Wagnerian orchestral selections. Under the guidance of Pierre Monteux the Boston musicians gave an excellent performance of the first Sibelius symphony. There are delightful melodies in this work, and there are some finely worked up climaxes of tone, but it is far inferior to the same composer's second symphony. The performance was more interesting than the work itself.

Also under Mr. Monteux's baton were presented Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Salome's Dance from Richard Strauss' "Salome." This will be Mr. Monteux's last season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

3 0 1923

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last evening in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, was received with genuine and well-warranted enthusiasm. There were several reasons for the prolonged applause. One of them was the appearance of Sigrid Onegin, who sang "Just God" and "My Life Fades in the Blossom" from Rienzi, and returned to give Schubert's "Die Allmacht," and "Erlkönig." It was the Erlking that aroused the audience to a high pitch; Mme. Onegin makes it thrillingly and beautifully moving, dramatic, and terrible.

Another reason for the enthusiasm was the programme. Pierre Monteux may be depended upon every season for new and interesting music. His symphony was the E minor of Sibelius, No. 1, opus 39, which was given a crisp, clean performance, and which is entitled to a place on more programmes. There was also the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," played beautifully, and Strauss's "Salome's Dance." The orchestra plays again Saturday afternoon, giving Mahler, Respighi, Dukas, and Smetana.

H. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

NOV 3 0

At Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave a program last evening which included the Symphony in E minor of Sibelius, and works by Brahms, Wagner, Schumann and Strauss. Mme. Siegrid Onegin appeared [illegible] dolier in this scene.

* * *

Mr. Whitehill's Amfortas was, as before, a figure of piercing woefulness; surely there is nothing finer in his repertoire than this deeply felt portrayal. But was not Mr. Whitehill at less than his best yesterday? Apparently the orchestra was; and so, much more evidently, was the new contralto of the company, Mme. Merle Alcock, who sang the brief but important alto solo at the close of the first act. Some jinx must have had it in for this excellent singer, for not only was she stationed much too near the audience (the directions call for "Eine Altstimme, aus der Höhe," ("from above"), but Mme. Alcock apparently forgot which notes the score requires her to sing. The record of the chorus (both of the pure and the impure—the knights and the daisies) was not wholly without blemish; but the ladies are charming to look upon. Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

* * *

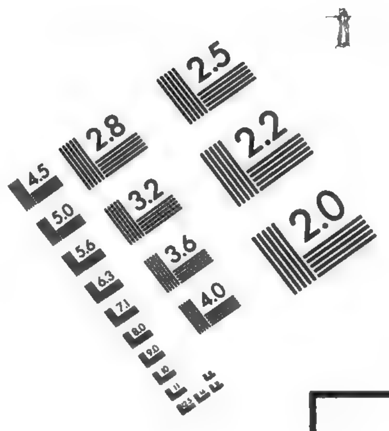
The setting of the sanctuary in the first and third acts—the vast Byzantine hall with its lofty, vaulted dome and its soaring columns—was as impressive as ever. The pictorial beauty of this interior, especially in the last scene, with its imaginative and skillful lighting, is a thing to remember and to praise. Indeed, the production as a whole, despite whatever lapses one must note, is extremely impressive. It is difficult to witness it and not feel moved to agree, after all, with Ernest Newman's conviction that "Parsifal" is "in many ways the most wonderful and extraordinary thing that has ever been done in music."

The First Boston Symphony Concert

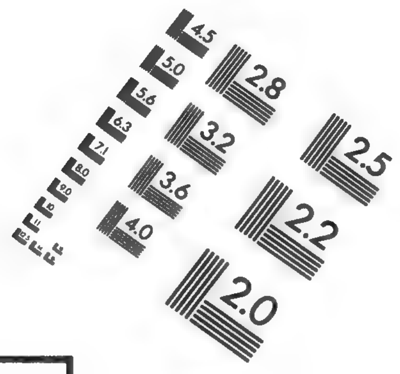
There was a joyous sight for the faithful at Carnegie Hall last night; the sight of a Boston Symphony audience that almost filled the visible portion of Carnegie Hall. It was the famous orchestra's first New York concert of the season. Mr. Monteux, its devoted and efficient conductor,

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

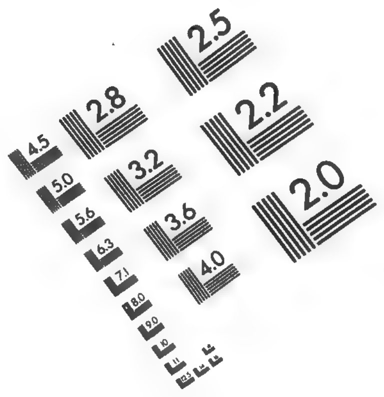
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



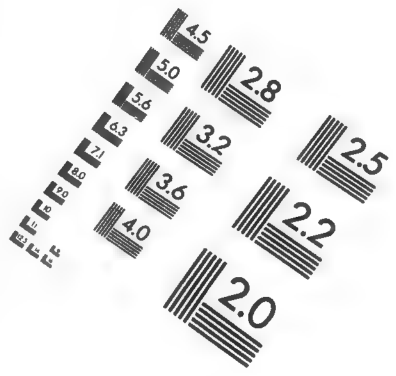
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0

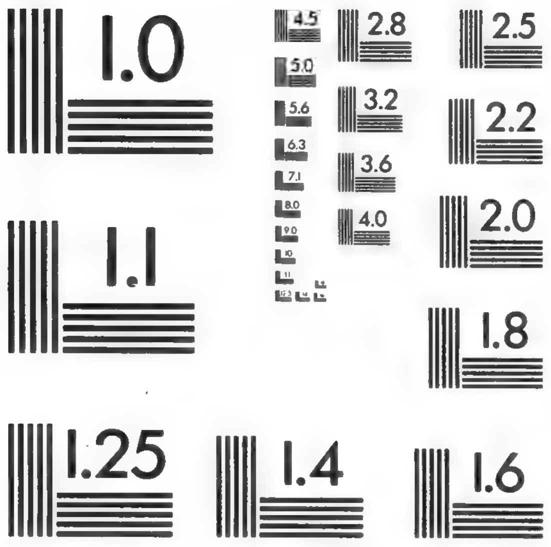


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
2.2
5.6
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
2.0
9.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

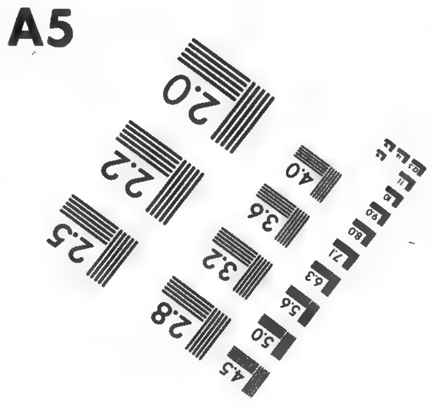
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

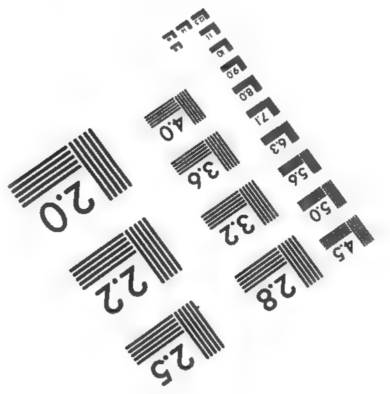
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5



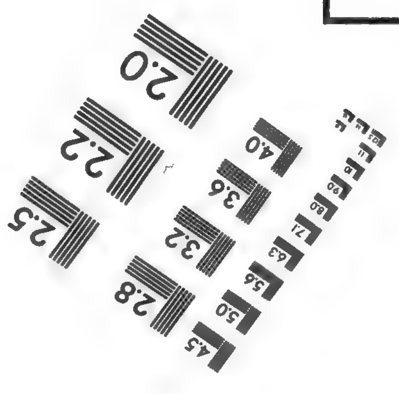
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



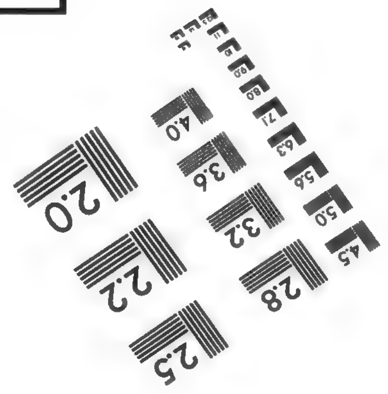
4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
5.0
2.8
4.5
2.5

A4

A3



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
5.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
4.5
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THE

OV 3 0 1923

The Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in this city took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Jan Sibelius's first symphony, the Brahms variations on the "Choral St. Anthony" theme of Haydn and the dance from Richard Strauss's "Salome," with "Gerichter Gott," from "Rienzi," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" as the vocal solo contributions. The singer was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

There was nothing in this list demanding anxious scrutiny or rhapsodic praise. In the program notes the dythyrambic prose of Paul Rosenfeld evoked by the symphonic creations of Sibelius was quoted most aptly. Sibelius deserves every word of it. If one has crossed the narrow sea between Sweden and Finland and landed in the cheerless port of Abo and thence journeyed by train to Petrograd, he suspects that Sibelius well knew how to translate the darkling moods of his country into grandiose and gloomy music.

But the symphony is well known to local music lovers. Casual concertgoers do not like it, for it breathes tragedy. Brahms's Haydn variations are more cheerful, albeit they parade something too much of musical cunning to please the indolent listener. And the dance of Salome pales in the brilliance of the latest achievements in ballet music.

The performance of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang last evening with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be awarded much glory. The audience apparently was well satisfied with Mme. Onegin's offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOS ANGELES
CAL. Times
~~EXPRESS~~

NOV 2 9 1923

Schertzinger Renders Own Compositi

Jackie Coogan, beloved little of the silver screen, officiated night as studio director at He greeted his many thousan friends and told them some funny incidents which occ during the filming of "Long the King," the Metro pictu which he is now appearin Loew's State Theater.

Jackie's gentle little voice duced Victor Schertzinger to dioland, the famous compose director. Mr. Schertzinger i a noted violinist, and his off last night, including his famous "Marcheta," were a treat for the great appreciati dience which nightly tunes in KHJ. Mr. Schertzinger directed the production of "Long Live the King."

Another momentous feature of the program was the presentation of Arthur Kay's orchestra from Loew's State Theater. This aggregation of artists was broadcast for the first time. A program of popular and classic selections were given, both en semble and by several soloists.

Arthur Kay is a noted conductor, and also a very able musician. He was formerly assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in his personal appearance with his splendid Loew's State orchestra at KHJ last night, he established himself with the radi audience as a master conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 1 1923

Boston Symphony at the Academy

Orchestral devotees of Brooklyn at the Academy last night made their appreciation of the first Boston Symphony concert of the season noisily evident. Brooklyn, on the whole, is more appreciative, and rigthly so, of Monteux and his orchestra than is Manhattan. For some seasons a strange coldness has been maifested by the Island boro toward this once most famous of orchestras, though in the years of Monteux's leadership it has gradually been regaining its old-time perfection.

Surely, last evening's performance could hardly be quarreled with, unless one might wish that a bit more care had been taken with the Sibelius Symphony. Monteux' performance of this rugged, often brutal, work was one of power and massive outlines. But there are moments in this symphony, porticularly in the second movement, with its main theme so reminiscent of Brahms, when a softer and more transparent loveliness would not be amiss. Sibelius, Strauss, Ravel and Strawinsky are undoubtedly the most original of living composers whose work shows positive signs of longevity. Sibelius' music is like that of no other composer; it is a language if incredible harshness, a music of artic regions, of ice, wind and frosty stars, impresive and unforgetable.

The E Minor Symphony gives us a Sibelius still young in growth, not yet wholly articulate. The cold, repellant beauty of the Fourth Symphony is, to be sure, not entirely lacking in this earlier work, but it is mixed with a trite sentimentalism that Sibelius discarded as he progressed. How characteristic, though are the opening bars! The clarinet solo, accompanied only by tympani, at once gives us the mood. There are other expressive passages in the work, and the entire Scherzo is a prophecy of the future.

M. Monteux also gave Dukas' dance peom, "Le Peri," more or less familiar to New York audiences. This is the music of modern France—not too modern, but the France ebussy, Ravel and, to a lesser , D'Indy—irridescent, veiled in med mists. And what a per- ance was Monteux's! Every nuance, the most subtle chance of light and feeling, was discerned and made the most of. Monteux is undoubtedly the best conductor we have for this impressionistic music. Perhaps he may see fit to present before his retirement from the Boston band the Griffes poem, "Kubla Kahn," that had its first performance some years ago under his baton.

The soloist of the evening was Sigrid Onegin, that contralto of opulent voice. Her numbers were those sung Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall; a tawdry and uninteresting aria from one of Wagner's wild oats, "Rienzi," and two Schubert songs, "Allmighty" and "The Erlking." Onegin's is one of the most glorious and ample contralto voices heard here in years. And coupled with this splendid organ is her dramatic delivery, so admirable and thrilling t its best.

A large audience filled every seat in the Academy and welcomed both orchestra, conductor and soloist most cordially.

Chaliapin a New Mephistopheles in "Faust."

For some years Chaliapin has bee familiar to New York in but three roles: the remorse-tortured Tsar Boris, the malevolent Philip of Spain and Mefistofele, in the opera of that name. Now a new devil has made his appearance, no less admirable than Boito's fiend, though less austere, less noble in presence and bearing. All this is as it should be, for Gounod's Mephistopheles is a devil with horns and a spiked tail, a devil to frighten and delight the children. The cackling laugh, the bravado before the populace of Nuremberg, the mocking of the unfortunate but rather foolish Marguerite; these are the familiar elements of demoniac caricature. To such a role quite a different impersonation must be brought than to the satanic splendors of Boito's Mefisto. And Chaliapin, artist that he is, manages to achieve a characte quite individual, an ironic and rathe supercilious devil. In appearance he is quite terrifying—one wonders i Mephistopheles was related to the Last of the Mohicans. But the effect is picturesque and often vivid ly dramatic. There has never bee seen such a devil in the annals o Gounod's opera.

Chaliapin, overpowering as h was, shared honors with a youn Californian, Lawrence Tibbett, wh made his debut as Valentin. Tibbett, too, is a dramatic artist, an his finely restrained death scen marked him as one to be watched His voice, a light baritone of agree able naturalness, is well fitted t the music allotted to Valentin.

Frances Alda was Marguerite, an Martinelli, Faust. Quite an innova tion in the production was made the third act. The scene betwee Marguerite and the invisible Meph istopheles, always sung in the interi of a church, took place in the pu lic square, thu making but o scene to the act, and Mephistophel was at no time invisible. Entire in black, a lowering and aweso figure, Chaliapin rendered the sce in a spirit of true diabolism, disa pearing at the end through a co venient trap door, leaving Ma guerite to be carried off by two sy pathetic supers. With any oth artist than Chaliapin in the ro such a change would have litt meaning. As it is, the opportuni is provided him for a scene of gre power. In Chaliapin's art it is t marvellously simple things th count—the careless gesture, the su den and natural stride across t stage where another singer wou remain silent and inexpressive. T finality and correctness of his eve move must indeed give one paus What an actor he might be! An what a singing actor he is!

EDWARD CUSHING.

R. LOVE TO SPEAK.

Senator William L. Love will spea at the Central Y. M. C. A. tomorro afternoon on the subject of Pena Institutions in New York State. D Love, chairman of the Committee o Penal Institutions, has just com pleted a tour of the prisons and i preparing a report to be submitte to the next Legislature.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1 1923

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, last night opened its thirty-sixth season in Brooklyn, as heretofore under joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. A very large audience in attendance, almost filling the academy's opera house, effectively refuted the rumors in circulation for some time past that the Boston concerts were losing public favor and patronage in the borough. Such indeed is not the case.

Mr. Monteux, now entering upon his farewell season with the Bostonians, for last night's opening number brought forward Jan Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor, an opus 39, composed in 1899 and predecessor of the Finnish composer's five later symphonies. This first symphony was last heard in Brooklyn under Dr. Muck some eighteen years ago, played by the same orchestra as last night, in the Baptist Temple, following the burning of the old Academy. That it has not been heard more frequently is no fault of the striking characteristics of the score itself, but rather a reflection upon orchestral conductors for their neglect of Sibelius, beyond doubt the most important of living symphonists.

The E minor symphony, despite reminiscences of which the composer himself was perhaps not conscious, has very much to say on its own account, both as absolute music, or, if the commentators insist, as programme music, picturing the "ruggedness and hardiness" of Finnish landscapes in winter. It unquestionably is nature music, that nature of the Far North, where the big uninhabited lands and snows lie, where coldness is, and burning sunlights. The themes, of remarkable power and haunting penetrativeness, are based upon folk-melodies, melodies of a sombre and almost tragic mood, and the individual note of the composer looms large, both in their harmonization and instrumental treatment. Although the development is fragmentary at times, the spirit of the music never becomes separated from that type of real eloquence which Sibelius (so strangely trite in smaller forms of composition) reaches in his symphonies. And what musician could otherwise than but enthuse over those several sections of sheerly contrapuntal writing, wherein polyphonic complexities are worked out with an amazing freedom of expression?

Last night's audience is indebted to Mr. Monteux for the hearing of this first symphony of Sibelius, as well as for an interpretation in performance truly revealing the rugged qualities dominant in its instrumental makeup. The tonal finesse of his ensemble of players was more conspicuously evidenced in Paul Dukas' "La Peri," a danced poem, a style of music in which Mr. Monteux excels, albeit this particular Dukas ballet loses (not so with Stravinsky's "Petroushka") when separated from its stage setting and mimed action. Liszt's "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," second of the grandiloquent symphonic poems, was played as closing number.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto, whose work upon the concert stage has won for her as much praise as her appearances in grand opera, was soloist in a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and the famous "Erlkonig." The intrusion of the human voice, however fine (and Mme. Onegin's is that), into a programme of symphonic music, never was nor never will be a correct proceeding. The Boston Orchestra, by the bye, does not engage soloists of any kind for its ten annual concerts in Manhattan.

A profusion of palms embowered last night about footlights and stage served to emphasize the dinky interior setting that the Academy's stage management rigs up, season in and season out, as background for eminent musical, dramatic, literary and political attractions.

Just why Brooklyn's temple of art, otherwise refinedly decorated, should be disgraced by this dance hall type of stage setting is a question that well might be taken up by one of the many boards of trade or chambers of commerce hereabouts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 1 1923

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first in the series of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux conducted, and Sigrid Onegin, contralto from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist.

A distinguished and capacity audience greeted the visiting musicians and accorded them a warm welcome for the attractive program. The first number by the orchestra was the Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius, and it was played particularly fine. The last movement, generally known as "Quasi una fantasia," seemed to please most.

Miss Onegin sang an aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" and "Just God," from "Rienzi," by Wagner. Her other selections were from Schubert, "Die Allmacht" and "Der Erlkonig," two lovely things and thoroughly suitable to her voice.

The most delightful number on the program was the orchestra's rendition of "La Peri," a poeme danse by Dukas. It is a plaintive little piece and was beautifully given by Mr. Monteux's orchestra. "Tasso, Lamentoe Trionfo," a symphonic poem by Lizst, completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BRIDGEPORT
CONN.

NOV 1923

Boston Symphony.

Many from this city attended the concert at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, on Tuesday night, when Bruce Simonds assisted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following splendid program:

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bo Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his musical drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, played with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme included Sibelius' first symphony, Brahms' Haydn theme variations, the from Strauss' "Salome," and an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs sung by Sigrid Oregin.

Paul Shirley, viola d'amore virtuoso, gave an afternoon recital yesterday afternoon at the Plaza Hotel, Manhattan, under auspices of the Washington Heights Musical Club.

Abraham Sopkin, violinist, a pupil

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 1 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-1924.

FROM THE
NEW HAVEN

THE

7

V 30 192

The Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in this city took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Jan Sibelius's first symphony, the Brahms variations on the "Choral St. Anthony" theme of Haydn and the dance from Richard Strauss's "Salome," with "Gerichter Gott," from "Rienzi," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" as the vocal solo contributions. The singer was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

There was nothing in this list demanding anxious scrutiny or rhapsodic praise. In the program notes the dythyrambic prose of Paul Rosenfeld evoked by the symphonic creations of Sibelius was quoted most aptly. Sibelius deserves every word of it. If one has crossed the narrow sea between Sweden and Finland and landed in the cheerless port of Abo and thence journeyed by train to Petrograd, he suspects that Sibelius well knew how to translate the darkling moods of his country into grandiose and gloomy music.

But the symphony is well known to local music lovers. Casual concertgoers do not like it, for it breathes tragedy. Brahms's Haydn variations are more cheerful, albeit they parade something too much of musical cunning to please the indolent listener. And the dance of Salome pales in the brilliance of the latest achievements in ballet music.

The performance of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang last evening with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be awarded much glory. The audience apparently was well satisfied with Mme. Onegin's offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 1 1923

Boston Symphony at the Academy

Orchestral devotees of Brooklyn at the Academy last night made their appreciation of the first Boston Symphony concert of the season noisily evident. Brooklyn, on the whole, is more appreciative, and rigthly so, of Monteux and his orchestra than is Manhattan. For some seasons a strange coldness has been maifested by the Island boro toward this once most famous of orchestras, though in the years of Monteux's leadership it has gradually been regaining its old-time perfection.

Surely, last evening's performance could hardly be quarreled with, unless one might wish that a bit more care had been taken with the Sibelius Symphony. Monteux' performance of this rugged, often brutal, work was one of power and massive outlines. But there are moments in this symphony, porticularly in the second movement, with its main theme so reminiscent of Brahms, when a softer and more transparent loveliness would not be amiss. Sibelius, Strauss, Ravel and Strawinsky are undoubtedly the most original of living composers whose work shows positive signs of longevity. Sibelius' music is like that of no other composer; it is a language if incredible harshness, a music of artic regions, of ice, wind and frosty stars, impressive and unforgetable.

The E Minor Symphony gives us a Sibelius still young in growth, not yet wholly articulate. The cold, repellant beauty of the Fourth Symphony is, to be sure, not entirely lacking in this earlier work, but it is mixed with a trite sentimentalism that Sibelius discarded as he progressed. How characteristic, though are the opening bars! The clarinet solo, accompanied only by tympani, at once gives us the mood. There are other expressive passages in the work, and the entire Scherzo is a prophecy of the future.

M. Monteux also gave Dukas' dance peom, "Le Peri," more or less familiar to New York audiences. This is the music of modern France —not too modern, but the France ebussy, Ravel and, to a lesser t, D'Indy—irridescent, veiled in med mists. And what a per- ance was Monteux's! Every nuance, the most subtle chance of light and feeling, was discerned and made the most of. Monteux is undoubtedly the best conductor we have for this impressionistic music. Perhaps he may see fit to present before his retirement from the Boston band the Griffes poem, "Kubla Kahn," that had its first performance some years ago under his baton.

The soloist of the evening was Sigrid Onegin, that contralto of opulent voice. Her numbers were those sung Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall; a tawdry and uninteresting aria from one of Wagner's wild oats, "Rienzi," and two Schubert songs, 'Allmighty" and "The Erlking." Onegin's is one of the most glorious and ample contralto voices heard ere in years. And coupled with his splendid organ is her dramatic delivery, so admirable and thrilling t its best.

A large audience filled every seat n the Academy and welcomed both orchestra, conductor and soloist most cordially.

Chaliapin a New Mephistopheles in "Faust."

For some years Chaliapin has been familiar to New York in but three roles: the remorse-tortured Tsar Boris, the malevolent Philip of Spain and Mefistofele, in the opera of that name. Now a new devil has made his appearance, no less admirable than Boito's fiend, though less austere, less noble in presence and bearing. All this is as it should be, for Gounod's Mephistopheles is a devil with horns and a spiked tail, a devil to frighten and delight the children. The cackling laugh, the bravado before the populace of Nuremberg, the mocking of the unfortunate but rather foolish Marguerite; these are the familiar elements of demoniac caricature. To such a role quite a different impersonation must be brought than to the satanic splendors of Boito's Mefisto. And Chaliapin, artist that he is, manages to achieve a character quite individual, an ironic and rather supercilious devil. In appearance he is quite terrifying—one wonders i Mephistopheles was related to th Last of the Mohicans. But th effect is picturesque and often vividly dramatic. There has never been seen such a devil in the annals o Gounod's opera.

Chaliapin, overpowering as h was, shared honors with a youn Californian, Lawrence Tibbett, wh made his debut as Valentin. Tibbett, too, is a dramatic artist, an his finely restrained death scen marked him as one to be watched His voice, a light baritone of agree able naturalness, is well fitted t the music allotted to Valentin.

Frances Alda was Marguerite, an Martinelli, Faust. Quite an innova tion in the production was made i the third act. The scene betwee Marguerite and the invisible Meph istopheles, always sung in the interio of a church, took place in the pub lic square, thus making but o scene to the act and Mephistophel was at no time invisible. Entire in black, a lowering and awesom figure, Chaliapin rendered the scen in a spirit of true diabolism, disap pearing at the end through a co venient trap door, leaving Ma guerite to be carried off by two sym pathetic supers. With any othe artist than Chaliapin in the ro such a change would have litt meaning. As it is, the opportunit is provided him for a scene of grea power. In Chaliapin's art it is th marvellously simple things th count—the careless gesture, the su den and natural stride across th stage where another singer wou remain silent and inexpressive. Th finality and correctness of his ever move must indeed give one pause What an actor he might be! An what a singing actor he is!

EDWARD CUSHING.

R. LOVE TO SPEAK.

Senator William L. Love will speak at the Central Y. M. C. A. tomorrow afternoon on the subject of Pena Institutions, in New York State. D Love, chairman of the Committee o Penal Institutions, has just com pleted a tour of the prisons and i preparing a report to be submitte to the next Legislature.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1923

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, last night opened its thirty-sixth season in Brooklyn, as heretofore under joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. A very large audience in attendance, almost filling the academy's opera house, effectively refuted the rumors in circulation for some time past that the Boston concerts were losing public favor and patronage in the borough. Such indeed is not the case.

Mr. Monteux, now entering upon his farewell season with the Bostonians, for last night's opening number brought forward Jan Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor, an opus 39, composed in 1899 and predecessor of the Finnish composer's five later symphonies. This first symphony was last heard in Brooklyn under Dr. Muck some eighteen years ago, played by the same orchestra as last night, in the Baptist Temple, following the burning of the old Academy. That it has not been heard more frequently is no fault of the striking characteristics of the score itself, but rather a reflection upon orchestral conductors for their neglect of Sibelius, beyond doubt the most important of living symphonists.

The E minor symphony, despite reminiscences of which the composer himself was perhaps not conscious, has very much to say on its own account, both as absolute music, or, if the commentators insist, as programme music, picturing the "ruggedness and hardiness" of Finnish landscapes in winter. It unquestionably is nature music, that nature of the Far North, where the big uninhabited lands and snows lie, where coldness is, and burning sunlights. The themes, of remarkable power and haunting penetrativeness, are based upon folk-melodies, melodies of a sombre and almost tragic mood, and the individual note of the composer looms large, both in their harmonization and instrumental treatment. Although the development is fragmentary at times, the spirit of the music never becomes separated from that type of real eloquence which Sibelius (so strangely trite in smaller forms of composition) reaches in his symphonies. And what musician could otherwise than but enthuse over those several sections of sheerly contrapuntal writing, wherein polyphonic complexities are worked out with an amazing freedom of expression?

Last night's audience is indebted to Mr. Monteux for the hearing of this first symphony of Sibelius, as well as for an interpretation in performance truly revealing the rugged qualities dominant in its instrumental makeup. The tonal finesse of his ensemble of players was more conspicuously evidenced in Paul Dukas' "La Peri," a danced poem, a style of music in which Mr. Monteux excels, albeit this particular Dukas ballet loses (not so with Stravinsky's "Petroushka") when separated from its stage setting and mimed action. Liszt's "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," second of the grandiloquent symphonic poems, was played as closing number.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto, whose work upon the concert stage has won for her as much praise as her appearances in grand opera, was soloist in a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and the famous "Erlkonig." The intrusion of the human voice, however fine (and Mme. Onegin's is that), into a programme of symphonic music, never was nor never will be a correct proceeding. The Boston Orchestra, by the bye, does not engage soloists of any kind for its ten annual concerts in Manhattan.

A profusion of palms embowered last night about footlights and stage served to emphasize the dinky interior setting that the Academy's stage management rigs up, season in and season out, as background for eminent musical, dramatic, literary and political attractions.

Just why Brooklyn's temple of art, otherwise refinedly decorated, should be disgraced by this dance hall type of stage setting is a question that well might be taken up by one of the many boards of trade or chambers of [illegible]mmerce hereabouts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 1

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first in the series of five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux conducted, and Sigrid Onegin, contralto from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist.

A distinguished and capacity audience greeted the visiting musicians and accorded them a warm welcome for the attractive program. The first number by the orchestra was the Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius, and it was played particularly fine. The last movement, generally known as "Quasi una fantasia," seemed to please most.

Miss Onegin sang an aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" and "Just God," from "Rienzi," by Wagner. Her other selections were from Schubert, "Die Allmacht" and "Der Erlkonig," two lovely things and thoroughly suitable to her voice.

The most delightful number on the program was the orchestra's rendition of "La Peri," a poeme danse by Dukas. It is a plaintive little piece and was beautifully given by Mr. Monteux's orchestra. "Tasso, Lamentoe Trionfo," a symphonic poem by Lizst, completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOS ANGELES
CAL.
EXPRESS

NOV 29 1923

Schertzinger Renders Own Compositi

Jackie Coogan, beloved little of the silver screen, officiated night as studio director at He greeted his many thousan friends and told them some o funny incidents which occ during the filming of "Long the King," the Metro pictu which he is now appearin Loew's State Theater.

Jackie's gentle little voice duced Victor Schertzinger t dioland, the famous compose director. Mr. Schertzinger i a noted violinist, and his off last night, including his famous "Marcheta," were a treat for the great appreciati dience which nightly tunes in KHJ. Mr. Schertzinger directed the production of "Long Live the King."

Another momentous feature of the program was the presentation of Arthur Kay's orchestra from Loew's State Theater. This aggregation of artists was broadcast for the first time. A program of popular and classic selections were given, both en semble and by several soloists.

Arthur Kay is a noted conductor, and also a very able musician. He was formerly assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in his personal appearance with his splendid Loew's State orchestra at KHJ last night, he established himself with the radi audience as a master conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BRIDGEPORT
CONN.

V 1923

Boston Symphony.

Many from this city attended the concert at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, on Tuesday night, when Bruce Simonds assisted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following splendid program:

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his musical drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, played with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme included Sibelius' first symphony, Brahms' Haydn theme variations, the [illegible] from Strauss' "Salome," and an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs sung by Sigrid Oregin.

Paul Shirley, viola d'amore virtuoso, gave an afternoon recital yesterday afternoon at the Plaza Hotel, Manhattan, under auspices of the Washington Heights Musical Club.

Abraham Sopkin, violinist, a pupil

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 1 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-1924.

NEW HAVEN

THE

V 30 192

The Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in this city took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Jan Sibelius's first symphony, the Brahms variations on the "Choral St. Anthony" theme of Haydn and the dance from Richard Strauss's "Salome," with "Gerichter Gott," from "Rienzi," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" as the vocal solo contributions. The singer was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

There was nothing in this list demanding anxious scrutiny or rhapsodic praise. In the program notes the dythyrambic prose of Paul Rosenfeld evoked by the symphonic creations of Sibelius was quoted most aptly. Sibelius deserves every word of it. If one has crossed the narrow sea between Sweden and Finland and landed in the cheerless port of Abo and thence journeyed by train to Petrograd, he suspects that Sibelius well knew how to translate the darkling moods of his country into grandiose and gloomy music.

But the symphony is well known to local music lovers. Casual concertgoers do not like it, for it breathes tragedy. Brahms's Haydn variations are more cheerful, albeit they parade something too much of musical cunning to please the indolent listener. And the dance of Salome pales in the brilliance of the latest achievements in ballet music.

The performance of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang last evening with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be awarded much glory. The audience apparently was well satisfied with Mme. Onegin's offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 1 1923

Boston Symphony at the Academy

Orchestral devotees of Brooklyn at the Academy last night made their appreciation of the first Boston Symphony concert of the season noisily evident. Brooklyn, on the whole, is more appreciative, and rigthly so, of Monteux and his orchestra than is Manhattan. For some seasons a strange coldness has been maifested by the Island boro toward this once most famous of orchestras, though in the years of Monteux's leadership it has gradually been regaining its old-time perfection.

Surely, last evening's performance could hardly be quarreled with, unless one might wish that a bit more care had been taken with the Sibelius Symphony. Monteux' performance of this rugged, often brutal, work was one of power and massive outlines. But there are moments in this symphony, porticularly in the second movement, with its main theme so reminiscent of Brahms, when a softer and more transparent loveliness would not be amiss. Sibelius, Strauss, Ravel and Strawinsky are undoubtedly the most original of living composers whose work shows positive signs of longevity. Sibelius' music is like that of no other composer; it is a language if incredible harshness, a music of artic regions, of ice, wind and frosty stars, impressive and unforgetable.

The E Minor Symphony gives us a Sibelius still young in growth, not yet wholly articulate. The cold, repellant beauty of the Fourth Symphony is, to be sure, not entirely lacking in this earlier work, but it is mixed with a trite sentimentalism that Sibelius discarded as he progressed. How characteristic, though are the opening bars! The clarinet solo, accompanied only by tympani, at once gives us the mood. There are other expressive passages in the work, and the entire Scherzo is a prophecy of the future.

M. Monteux also gave Dukas' dance peom, "Le Peri," more or less familiar to New York audiences. This is the music of modern France —not too modern, but the France ebussy, Ravel and, to a lesser t, D'Indy—irridescent, veiled in med mists. And what a perance was Monteux's! Every the most subtle chance of d feeling, was discerned and he most of. Monteux is undly the best conductor we this impressionistic music. he may see fit to present retirement from the Bos- the Griffes poem, "Kubla at had its first performears ago under his baton. t of the evening was that contralto of opu- numbers were those evening at Carnegie and uninteresting Wagner's wild oats, Schubert songs. "The Erlking." e most glorious voices heard coupled with her dramatic nd thrilling very seat med both orchestra, conductor and soloist most cordially.

Chaliapin a New Mephistopheles in "Faust."

For some years Chaliapin has been familiar to New York in but three roles: the remorse-tortured Tsar Boris, the malevolent Philip of Spain and Mefistofele, in the opera of that name. Now a new devil has made his appearance, no less admirable than Boito's fiend, though less austere, less noble in presence and bearing. All this is as it should be, for Gounod's Mephistopheles is a devil with horns and a spiked tail, a devil to frighten and delight the children. The cackling laugh, the bravado before the populace of Nuremberg, the mocking of the unfortunate but rather foolish Marguerite; these are the familiar elements of demoniac caricature. To such a role quite a different impersonation must be brought than to the satanic splendors of Boito's Mefisto. And Chaliapin, artist that he is, manages to achieve a character quite individual, an ironic and rather supercilious devil. In appearance he is quite terrifying—one wonders if Mephistopheles was related to the Last of the Mohicans. But the effect is picturesque and often vividly dramatic. There has never been seen such a devil in the annals of Gounod's opera.

Chaliapin, overpowering as he was, shared honors with a young Californian, Lawrence Tibbett, who made his debut as Valentin. Tibbett, too, is a dramatic artist, and his finely restrained death scene marked him as one to be watched. His voice, a light baritone of agreeable naturalness, is well fitted to the music allotted to Valentin.

Frances Alda was Marguerite, and Martinelli, Faust. Quite an innovation in the production was made in the third act. The scene between Marguerite and the invisible Mephistopheles, always sung in the interior of a church, took place in the public square, thus making but one scene to the act, and Mephistopheles was at no time invisible. Entirely in black, a lowering and awesome figure, Chaliapin rendered the scene in a spirit of true diabolism, disappearing at the end through a convenient trap door, leaving Marguerite to be carried off by two sympathetic supers. With any other artist than Chaliapin in the role such a change would have little meaning. As it is, the opportunity is provided him for a scene of great power. In Chaliapin's art it is the marvellously simple things that count—the careless gesture, the sudden and natural stride across the stage where another singer would remain silent and inexpressive. This finality and correctness of his every move must indeed give one pause. What an actor he might be! And what a singing actor he is!

EDWARD CUSHING.

DR. LOVE TO SPEAK.

Senator William L. Love will speak at the Central Y. M. C. A. tomorrow afternoon on the subject of Penal Institutions in New York State. Dr. Love, chairman of the Committee on Penal Institutions, has just completed a tour of the prisons and is preparing a report to be submitted to the next Legislature.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1923

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, last night opened its thirty-sixth season in Brooklyn, as heretofore under joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute of Arts and Sciences. A very large audience in attendance, almost filling the academy's opera house, effectively refuted the rumors in circulation for some time past that the Boston concerts were losing public favor and patronage in the borough. Such indeed is not the case.

Mr. Monteux, now entering upon his farewell season with the Bostonians, for last night's opening number brought forward Jan Sibelius' first symphony, in E minor, an opus 39, composed in 1899 and predecessor of the Finnish composer's five later symphonies. This first symphony was last heard in Brooklyn under Dr. Muck some eighteen years ago, played by the same orchestra as last night, in the Baptist Temple, following the burning of the old Academy. That it has not been heard more frequently is no fault of the striking characteristics of the score itself, but rather a reflection upon orchestral conductors for their neglect of Sibelius, beyond doubt the most important of living symphonists.

The E minor symphony, despite reminiscences of which the composer himself was perhaps not conscious, has very much to say on its own account, both as absolute music, or, if the commentators insist, as programme music, picturing the "ruggedness and hardiness" of Finnish landscapes in winter. It unquestionably is nature music, that nature of the Far North, where the big uninhabited lands and snows lie, where coldness is, and burning sunlights. The themes, of remarkable power and haunting penetrativeness, are based upon folk-melodies, melodies of a sombre and almost tragic mood, and the individual note of the composer looms large, both in their harmonization and instrumental treatment. Although the development is fragmentary at times, the spirit of the music never becomes separated from that type of real eloquence which Sibelius (so strangely trite in smaller forms of composition) reaches in his symphonies. And what musician could otherwise than but enthuse over those several sections of sheerly contrapuntal writing, wherein polyphonic complexities are worked out with an amazing freedom of expression?

Last night's audience is indebted to Mr. Monteux for the hearing of this first symphony of Sibelius, as well as for an interpretation in performance truly revealing the rugged qualities dominant in its instrumental makeup. The tonal finesse of his ensemble of players was more conspicuously evidenced in Paul Dukas' "La Peri," a danced poem, a style of music in which Mr. Monteux excels, albeit this particular Dukas ballet loses (not so with Stravinsky's "Petroushka") when separated from its stage setting and mimed action. Liszt's "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo," second of the grandiloquent symphonic poems, was played as closing number.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto, whose work upon the concert stage has won for her as much praise as her appearances in grand opera, was soloist in a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," and two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and the famous "Erlkonig." The intrusion of the human voice, however fine (and Mme. Onegin's is that), into a programme of symphonic music, never was nor never will be a correct proceeding. The Boston Orchestra, by the bye, does not engage soloists of any kind for its ten annual concerts in Manhattan.

A profusion of palms embowered last night about footlights and stage served to emphasize the dinky interior setting that the Academy's stage management rigs up, season in and season out, as background for eminent musical, dramatic, literary and political attractions.

Just why Brooklyn's temple of art, otherwise refinedly decorated, should be disgraced by this dance hall type of stage setting is a question that well might be taken up by one of the many boards of trade or chambers of commerce hereabouts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 1

Music Events

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first in the series of five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in the Academy of Music. Pierre Monteux conducted, and Sigrid Onegin, contralto from the Metropolitan Opera House, was the soloist.

A distinguished and capacity audience greeted the visiting musicians and accorded them a warm welcome for the attractive program. The first number by the orchestra was the Symphony in E minor, by Sibelius, and it was played particularly fine. The last movement, generally known as "Quasi una fantasia," seemed to please most.

Miss Onegin sang an aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" and "Just God," from "Rienzi," by Wagner. Her other selections were from Schubert, "Die Allmacht" and "Der Erlkonig," two lovely things and thoroughly suitable to her voice.

The most delightful number on the program was the orchestra's rendition of "La Peri," a poeme danse by Dukas. It is a plaintive little piece and was beautifully given by Mr. Monteux's orchestra. "Tasso, Lamentoe Trionfo," a symphonic poem by Lizst, completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOS ANGELES
CAL.
EXPRESS

NOV 29 1923

Schertzinger Renders Own Composition

Jackie Coogan, beloved little star of the silver screen, officiated last night as studio director at KHJ. He greeted his many thousands of friends and told them some of the funny incidents which occurred during the filming of "Long Live the King," the Metro picture in which he is now appearing at Loew's State Theater.

Jackie's gentle little voice introduced Victor Schertzinger to Radioland, the famous composer and director. Mr. Schertzinger is also a noted violinist, and his offerings last night, including his world-famous "Marcheta," were a rare treat for the great appreciative audience which nightly tunes in KHJ. Mr. Schertzinger directed the production of "Long Live the King."

Another momentous feature of the program was the presentation of Arthur Kay's orchestra from Loew's State Theater. This aggregation of artists was broadcast for the first time. A program of popular and classic selections were given, both en semble and by several soloists.

Arthur Kay is a noted conductor, and also a very able musician. He was formerly assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in his personal appearance with his splendid Loew's State orchestra at KHJ last night, he established himself with the radio audience as a master conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BRIDGEPORT
CONN.

V 1923

Boston Symphony.

Many from this city attended the concert at Woolsey Hall, New Haven, on Tuesday night, when Bruce Simonds assisted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following splendid program:

Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, the overture to "Prodana Nevesta" ("The Bold Bride") by Smetana, and Strauss' Dance of the Seven Veils from his musical drama "Salome." Bruce Simonds, as the soloist of the evening, played with the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

1 1923

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its New York season at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme included Sibelius' first symphony, Brahms' Haydn theme variations, the [illegible] from Strauss' "Salome," and an aria from "Rienzi" and two Schubert songs sung by Sigrid Oregin.

Paul Shirley, viola d'amore virtuoso, gave an afternoon recital yesterday afternoon at the Plaza Hotel, Manhattan, under auspices of the Washington Heights Musical Club.

Abraham Sopkin, violinist, a pupil

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 1 1923

The fifth number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program book contains a two-page announcement saying: "The average annual expenses of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exceed its average income by about $95,000. This operating deficit is met by subscriptions. The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra." There is a list of something over 300 people who have subscribed for the season of 1923-1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

DEC 2 1923

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By H. C. COLLES.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was more calculated to show the qualities of the orchestra than was that of Thursday night. There is not much to be said of Mahler's first symphony, which began the concert, except that Respighi's delightful arrangements of old Italian dances and airs, Dukas's "La Peri-Poème Dansé" and Smetana's overture to "Peodana Nevesta" did all possible to make amends for the tedious three-quarters of an hour which the symphony imposed. Mahler affecting the beauty of simplicity is more wearisome than Mahler adopting the heavily intellectual pose, and this symphony is like an elaborate landscape painted by an artist who never leaves his studio.

Respighi, however, brought an altogether fresher atmosphere. He approaches the work of the past with understanding and sympathy, not with patronage. He does not dress up Vincenzo Galilei and the other sixteenth century composers to tickle modern ears with their quaintness, but he gives them just as much of new orchestral coloring as they need to show the freshness of their melodies and rhythms.

The glowing tone of the strings was specially remarkable in the gagliarda and, altogether, the performance was an admirable piece of work. With Dukas Pierre Monteaux seemed to be on his own ground. Its dance rhythms were played with perfect finish and the wayward charm of its French style was treated with the fullest sympathy. Smetana's overture, the title of which the program translated as "The Sold Bride," belongs to the first and most famous of Smetana's eight Czech operas. It is perhaps the most brilliant of comedy overtures since Mozart's "Figaro," with which it has something in common.

Like the overture to "Figaro" its brilliance depends mainly on the strings, and the playing of the strings, both in those electrifying sforzandos and in the rapid pianissimo passages, was magnificent. One must not forget to mention also the tone of the brass, which throughout the concert was splendidly resonant and never coarse. Indeed the playing of this group of works gave a very strong impression of the musical ensemble which the Boston Orchestra can achieve.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

DEC 2

Monteux Conducts Orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall Mr. Pierre Monteux conducted the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program opened with Mahler's First Symphony and included old dances and airs for the lute (freely arranged) by Respighi, "La Peri"; Poeme Danse" by Dukas, and the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

DEC 2 1923

Either as a pastime or in the spirit of homage, and perhaps also because of guilty artistic consciences (which is not at all unlikely) the "modernists" of France and Italy, composers who in their real work are most flagrant violators of all that has been held sacred in the practice of musical theory, spent much time in exhuming the old dead classics, in taking the small pieces of their fifteenth and sixteenth century ancestors, re-editing them, touching them up with the colorings of present-day instrumentation and exhibiting them in symphonic form. Maurice Ravel of France and Alfredo Casella of Italy are specialists at this sort of thing (not to mention the Britishers who delight in bringing up to date the music of Purcell and his contemporaries), and Ottorino Respighi, of the Young Italy group, has likewise spent considerable labor along the same lines. He has edited Monteverdi's "Lamento d'Arianna" (1608), arranged Vitale's famous violin Ciaconna for string orchestra and organ, and also, as heard played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, some old dances and airs for the lute, a "Gagliarda" (by Galilei, a skillful lutenist of the middle fifteenth century), and a "Villenella" and "Mascherada" by unknown composers of the latter sixteenth century. These pieces, freely arranged for modern orchestra by Respighi, feature Grecian simplicity in contrast with contrapuntal complexity. Of historical interest, though not very appealing to the appetite of twentieth century ears, they were listened to with close attention and drew warm applause.

Less applause, in fact rather frigid applause, followed the closing measure of Mahler's first symphony, which preceded the Respighi revivifications, a work last heard here under Mr. Mengelberg (Philharmonic) in January, 1921. It is an hour long in performance, and perhaps sixty minutes too long insofar as having anything of importance to declare. Mahlerites, by the way, are now driven to the extremity of declaring that Mahler's symphonies are great because of their composer's inherent musical sterility, that this trait of impotency is itself the sublime thing—in Mahler's case. Perhaps, but very weakening in long stretches. Mr. Monteux performed a greater service on Friday evening (in Brooklyn) and Thanksgiving night (in Manhattan) by bringing to public attention the neglected first symphony of Sibelius, a virile and vivid masterpiece in comparison with the Mahler work.

Other numbers of the afternoon, the orchestra playing with elan and esprit, were Paul Dukas' "La Peri-Poeme Danse" and Smetana's "The Bartered Bride" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 2 1923

Second Boston Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the second visit to its Providence season to give a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 11, at 8:15.

The soloist of the evening will be Ethel Leginska, called the leading pianist of the younger generation. This virtuoso is of English birth but American by residence and affiliation. She is a Leschitizky pupil. Thrugh numerous tours of this country she has won a following as numerous as it is enthusiastic. Last year she made a notable tour of Europe which included appearances with the foremost orchestras and recitals of her own in the cities of England, Italy and central Europe. Leginska will appear with the orchestra in Providence in Liszt's brilliant and rousing Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes.

Pierre Monteux will conduct as the purely orchestral numbers on the program the First Symphony of Sibelius in E-minor in many ways the most popular and surely the most melodious work of the noted Finnish composer, the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," and of modern and older French music, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the episode of the Capulet's Ball from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juilet."

Violin Recital

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

DEC 2 192

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Resorts to Mahler at Its Saturday Matinee

They say Down East that M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has discovered and made known the fact that a good deal of Mahler's First Symphony is Schubertian. Apparently in order that we might share the delightful surprise of this discovery, M. Monteux and his players set the Mahler symphony in question upon the program of their first New York matinee of the present season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

M. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a college Petting Party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerians whom thing could daunt or deter. For the Iahler Question" is no nearer setment than it ever was. Discussion ncerning his qualities as a musicker persists with unabated fury, iding those who (like Mr. Mengelg and other European musicians of nence and experience) regard him one of the major prophets of mu from those who (like the majority American concertgoers) regard as the abomination of desolation. know a great Continental conduc who unblushingly ranks Mahler the high gods of symphonic mu and seats him on the right hand Beethoven. But there are many sicians of indubitable insight and sibility who would run screaming the subway if they read Mahler's ne on a Carnegie Hall billboard.

* * *

Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed s disputatious name on his program yesterday's concert he was either ifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerobia in these parts, or his friends d neglected to enlighten him.

He might, to be sure, have chosen a re exacerbating work than Mahler's rst Symphony, which dates from 3-'84, and is thus almost conporaneous with "Parsifal." It is Mahler at his worst, though has some of his least tolerable lts.

Mahler was famous for his virnt hatred of program-notes, and he tested the ascription of illustrative rposes to his music. Yet, with the verting inconsistency of the artistnd, he seems to have based most of symphonies upon "programs" of most detailed and elaborate sort.

Dr. Rudolf Mengelberg, in his pronm-notes for the Mahler festival held Amsterdam in May, 1920, quoted at he described as "a short synop," prepared by Mahler for the perrmances of his First Symphony at dapest in 1889, at Hamburg in 1892 d at Weimar in 1894. In this "synsis," says Dr. Mengelberg, Mahler rote somewhat extensively" concern the programmatic significance of his mphony. Apparently he was not en so passionately eager to leave e public to "its own thoughts" in e presence of his music.

This "program" is a curiosity. It deribes the work as "a symphonic poem two parts." At Weimar it was led the "Titan" (after Jean Paul chter), and a motto, "From the Days Youth," was given to the first part, ile the second part bore the tag: ommedia Umana." According to ahler's "synopsis," his music was inded to portray, successively, Spring; awakening of Nature; something ot specified—presumably a ship) nder full sail"; a funeral march "in manner of Callot," accompanying burial of a hunter, and based on old French canon, "Frère Jacques"; d, finally, a transition "from Hell to radise."

* * *

What it all means, heaven only knows. It is scarcely to be wondered at that Ernest Nodnagel (quoted by Mr. Hale in his program notes) threw up his hands over this program, and begged some one to tell him "what in the world Frère Jacques has to do with the burial of the hunter, and what have both to do with the 'Commedia Umana,' or with 'Titan.'" Some have conjectured that Mahler was having fun with the wearisome and fantastic ways of progam annotators, but that seems hardly likely. Mahler was too earnest a soul to conceive and work out a jest of that sort.

It is simpler and far more profitable to think of the symphony as music unadorned, "absolute" music, and to throw the preposterous "program" into the scrapbasket. For as music, some of the symphony is charming—the first movement especially. Here, in the naïveté and freshness and unpretentiousness of the score, there is perhaps some warrant for Mr. Monteux's Schubertian analogy.

* * *

Mahler in this movement of the Symphony basks and revels in that atmosphere of elaborately contrived ingenuousness which he loved so dearly. For Mahler was only a little less content when he was approximating the style of a folksong than when he was trying to parallel one of the Brobdingnagian musical "jubilees" of the late Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, with their choruses of 20,000 and their 2,000 instruments reinforced by cannon shots and anvils. Mahler's imagination aspired to the grandiose and the apocalyptic with an unterrified audacity. He believed that he could speak at will with the artlessness of the Bohemian countryside or in accents weighty with mystical revelation. One can imagine his fancying himself at his ease among those illuminated beings described by Plato in the "Phædo": "They hear the voices and oracles of the gods, and see them in visions, and have intercourse with them face to face; and they see the moon and stars as they really are."

You perceive him in one of his comfortable strolls across the evening landscape, noting the familiar processes of the sky and the moon and the "wind on the heath," and telling himself, with Jasper Petulengro, that "life is very sweet, brother; who would wish to die?"—and then, suddenly remembering that he is a Symphonist with a Revelation—as in the last movement of this symphony—calling out, as one divinely chosen:

> Bring me my bow of burning gold,
> Bring me my arrows of desire—like an inconceivably solemn Blake.

* * *

"The solemn is safe," said Browning; but he was not thinking of the solemn in art. It is unnecessary to attempt an appraisal of the æsthetic worth of Mahler's dallyings with the apocryphal, or to guess at the real value of his immense portentousness. It is enough to note that it constitutes one extreme of his astonishing imaginative gamut—this quality which his spokesmen call his "heroic sublimity, the pure exaltation of the gods themselves." The other extreme is seen in his passion for the naïve, the intimately candid and heart-easing; in his peasant humor and simplicity (whether spontaneous or skillfully simulated), the homely ingenuousness of the folk-spirit that he evokes, "rich and human, smelling of sun-baked fields and smoky kitchens, yet tender and many-colored." Mahler in this vein is undeniably engaging and persuasive, even touching, when he does not sustain it too inexorably; and it is the vein of the first movement of the D major Symphony. In the Finale, when he sets out to paint the progress of his soul from Hell to Paradise, he is merely empty and futile and bombastic.

* * *

Mr. Monteux filled out his program with Respighi's familiar arrangement of old Italian airs and dances, Dukas's "Le Peri" (which had been heard here before), and Smetana's perennial "Bartered Bride" Overture. The orchestra played all of this music very well indeed and a house of comfortable size applauded it warmly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

DEC 2 1923

Monteux's Farewell Season With Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (which will include five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 29, Dec. 1, Jan. 3 and 5, Jan. 31, Feb. 2, March 13 and 15, April 3 and 5), will complete Pierre Monteux's five-year period as conductor. The following soloists are engaged: For the Thursday series, Mme Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and Moriz Rosenthal, the European pianist; for the Saturday series, Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Jean Bedetti, leading cellist of the orchestra, and Jacques Thibaud, the violinist.

Pierre Monteux is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of his concert. It was in France that this celebrity first made his reputation. He was first known as conductor when he became a familar figure presiding over the Colonne nd the other orchestras of Paris. He instituted the "Concerts Monteux" there. He toured Europe over Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and with this organization first came to America. For two years previous to his present post he conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 2 1923

Madame Onegin Here With Boston Orchestra

The seasons first concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Acedemy of Music Friday night. Pierre Monteux offered a program unusual, but not extraordinary. The E Minor Symphony by Sibelius, in four movements, was well presented, but lacked strength.

"La Peri", a dance poem by Paul Dukas, although it evoked little enthusiasm from the audience, was the best number on the program, and it was conducted with rare skill by Monteux. The Dukas number is a nervous study in the most modern manner. The other orchestral number was the well known Liszt symphonic poem "Tasso".

Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto, sang two arias from "Rienzi" and two songs from Schubert, including the "Erlkonig". She was not an excellent voice and although her notes were beautiful, they lacked flexibility.

Stingy people are neighbors who are trying to keep out of debt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~EVE.~~ PUBLIC LEDGER

DEC 2 1923

A Diversity of Opinion on the Subject of Strawinsky—The Service to Musical Art of E. G. McCollin

By FULLERTON WALDO

STRAWINSKY? The "symphies" for wind instruments, brought forward by Dr. Stokowski at the week-end concerts, have elicited variant opinions.

Said one entitled to be considered a representative of the intelligentsia: "At any rate, Dr. Stokowski rightly construes his responsibility to our audiences. We ought to hear the new works now and then, whether we like them or not. They may not represent the ultimate trend of musical composition away from the classic pattern. But if they are fair samples from the workshops of contemporary toil in music, we are bound to give ear to them, even if they go against the grain at a first hearing.

"For myself, I do not feel qualified to judge of the merits of the 'symphonies' from this first presentation. I want to hear it several times. It did not impress me as did the 'Song of the Nightingale,' by the same composer, several weeks before. But perhaps the failure was mine, not Strawinsky's.'"

It was a generous verdict.

WHEN Koussewitzky (who is to lead the Boston Symphony next year) brought out the new work in London there were hisses and derisive laughter, as Lawrence Gilman noted in the program-book of the current occasion. Stravinsky made a speech in which he ascribed the hostile reception to Koussewitzky's mistake in trying to play the music with expression—whereas, according to its maker, it must be played in an expressionless manner.

Whereupon Koussewitzky, in his own defence, asserted that he had no chance to give the score his individual interpretation—since the orchestra he commanded had but time to run through the stressful measures hastily.

It is interesting to note that a nephew of Koussewitzky—a very thoroughly-trained musician—is now a member of our orchestra. As he plays the double bass, he had no opportunity to be heard in the composition for other wind instruments which, in the hands of his uncle, created such an extraordinary dissension abroad.

There seems to be little doubt that the "Symphonies" (as apparently the music should be styled) is of little consequence when weighed in the balance against the "Song of the Nightingale," which had in it a good deal that is entitled to respectful consideration.

EDWARD G. McCOLLIN deserves the remembering gratitude of musical Philadelphia for his very real services to the cause of musical art in this city. His friendships were tenacious and his contacts various, so that his influence was potent and far-reaching.

A founder of the University Glee Club, he was an active member of the Musical Club, founded a year ago to raise the standard of musical activities at Old Penn, of whose Alumni Society he was at one time president.

With Dr. Edward I. Keffer, John Ingham, Oscar Knipe and others he went in a committee to hear Fritz Scheel at Woodside Park, with the result that this first leader of our great orchestra was engaged and the orchestra was organized.

He was president of the Orpheus Club, in which he was a leading soloist, and president of the Musical Fund Society which maintained the ancient hall on Locust street, in which so much musical history has been made in the last century. Moreover, he was founder of the Manuscript Musical Society, which has been of conspicuous service in giving a hearing to some of the worthiest efforts of leading local composers.

HE WROTE delightful music, and was regarded as among the most successful of the Philadelphia song writers. But beyond the product of his fertile fancy and his dextrous contrivance in this field, his many friends will think of him as a patriot for his city and for its musical culture, whose essential good nature and generosity and rare unselfishness inspired the admiration and affection of those who knew him.

His daughter, Frances McCollin, worthily carries on the tradition, for her compositions for the chorus and for the solo voice betray a signal ability which has been widely recognized. Her music has taken many prizes, in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and it has been performed on innumerable occasions in all parts of the country.

OLD ENGLISH music at last has a dictionary to itself—and a good one it is. It is by Jeffrey Pulver, and it is published by E. P. Dutton & Co. It includes—in a single volume of clear type—not merely the definition of terms but the description of instruments.

The pages are embellished with clarifying illustrations. Such a book is of particular value to those who would read with full understanding the texts of Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer and other authors who make frequent reference to matters musical.

PLAYERS of stringed instruments will be attracted to the description of clavichord and harpsichord, or the crowd and the crwth, or the inclusive family of the viols. Wind instrument performers will find valuable data concerning the recorder, the serpent and other obsolete apparatus that rejoiced the harmonious lives of our forebears.

"The plan that I have followed," observes the author in his preface, "was that of omitting such articles as have been adequately treated in the existing dictionaries." But, on the other hand, in small compass he has assembled a large amount of information not readily accessible in any other form and entailing much careful research on the part of the compiler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

DEC 2 1923

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By H. C. COLLES.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was more calculated to show the qualities of the orchestra than was that of Thursday night. There is not much to be said of Mahler's first symphony, which began the concert, except that Respighi's delightful arrangements of old Italian dances and airs, Dukas's "La Peri-Poème Dansé" and Smetana's overture to "Peodana Nevesta" did all possible to make amends for the tedious three-quarters of an hour which the symphony imposed. Mahler affecting the beauty of simplicity is more wearisome than Mahler adopting the heavily intellectual pose, and this symphony is like an elaborate landscape painted by an artist who never leaves his studio.

Respighi, however, brought an altogether fresher atmosphere. He approaches the work of the past with understanding and sympathy, not with patronage. He does not dress up Vincenzo Galilei and the other sixteenth century composers to tickle modern ears with their quaintness, but he gives them just as much of new orchestral coloring as they need to show the freshness of their melodies and rhythms.

The glowing tone of the strings was specially remarkable in the gagliarda and, altogether, the performance was an admirable piece of work. With Dukas Pierre Monteaux seemed to be on his own ground. Its dance rhythms were played with perfect finish and the wayward charm of its French style was treated with the fullest sympathy. Smetana's overture, the title of which the program translated as "The Sold Bride," belongs to the first and most famous of Smetana's eight Czech operas. It is perhaps the most brilliant of comedy overtures since Mozart's "Figaro," with which it has something in common.

Like the overture to "Figaro" its brilliance depends mainly on the strings, and the playing of the strings, both in those electrifying sforzandos and in the rapid pianissimo passages, was magnificent. One must not forget to mention also the tone of the brass, which throughout the concert was splendidly resonant and never coarse. Indeed the playing of this group of works gave a very strong impression of the musical ensemble which the Boston Orchestra can achieve.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 2 1923

Second Boston Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the second visit to its Providence season to give a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 11, at 8:15.

The soloist of the evening will be Ethel Leginska, called the leading pianist of the younger generation. This virtuoso is of English birth but American by residence and affiliation. She is a Leschitizky pupil. Thriugh numerous tours of this country she has won a following as numerous as it is enthusiastic. Last year she made a notable tour of Europe which included appearances with the foremost orchestras and recitals of her own in the cities of England, Italy and central Europe. Leginska will appear with the orchestra in Providence in Liszt's brilliant and rousing Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes.

Pierre Monteux will conduct as the purely orchestral numbers on the program the First Symphony of Sibelius in E-minor in many ways the most popular and surely the most melodious work of the noted Finnish composer, the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," and of modern and older French music, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the episode of the Capulet's Ball from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juilet."

Violin Recital

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

DEC 2 1923

Monteux's Farewell Season With Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (which will include five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 29, Dec. 1, Jan. 3 and 5, Jan. 31, Feb. 2, March 13 and 15, April 3 and 5), will complete Pierre Monteux's five-year period as conductor. The following soloists are engaged: For the Thursday series, Mme. Sigrid Onegin, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and Moriz Rosenthal, the European pianist; for the Saturday series, Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Jean Bedetti, leading cellist of the orchestra, and Jacques Thibaud, the violinist.

Pierre Monteux is expected to return to his own country at the conclusion of his concert. It was in France that this celebrity first made his reputation. He was first known as conductor when he became a familiar figure presiding over the Colonne and the other orchestras of Paris. He instituted the "Concerts Monteux" there. He toured Europe over Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and with this organization first came to America. For two years previous to his present post he conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 2 1923

Madame Onegin Here With Boston Orchestra

The seasons first concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Acedemy of Music Friday night. Pierre Monteux offered a program unusual, but not extraordinary. The E Minor Symphony by Sibelius, in four movements, was well presented, but lacked strength.

"La Peri" a dance poem by Paul Dukas, although it evoked little enthusiasm from the audience, was the best number on the program, and it was conducted with rare skill by Monteux. The Dukas number is a nervous study in the most modern manner. The other orchestral number was the well known Liszt symphonic poem "Tasso"

Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto, sang two arias from "Rienzi" and two songs from Schubert, including the "Erlkonig". She was not in excellent voice and although her notes were beautiful, they lacked flexibility.

Stingy people are neighbors who are trying to keep out of debt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

DEC 2 192

Monteux Conducts Orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall Mr. Pierre Monteux conducted the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program opened with Mahler's First Symphony and included old dances and airs for the lute (freely arranged) by Respighi, "La Peri"; Poeme Danse" by Dukas, and the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

THIS CLIPPING FROM T
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

DEC 2 1923

Either as a pastime or spirit of homage, and perha because of guilty artistic con (which is not at all unlike "modernists" of France an composers who in their re are most flagrant violator that has been held sacred practice of musical theor much time in exhuming dead classics, in taking th pieces of their fifteenth and century ancestors, re-editin touching them up with the of present-day instruments exhibiting them in sympho Maurice Ravel of France a do Casella of Italy are spec this sort of thing (not to the Britishers who delight ing up to date the music c and his contemporaries), a ino Respighi, of the You group, has likewise spent c ble labor along the same l has edited Monteverdi's d'Arianna" (1608), arranged famous violin Ciaconna f orchestra and organ, and heard played by the Bost phony Orchestra under Pier teux at Carnegie Hall yester ernoon, some old dances and the lute, a "Gagliarda" (by a skillful lutenist of the mi teenth century), and a "Vil and "Mascherada" by unknov posers of the latter sixteen tury. These pieces, freely a for modern orchestra by R feature Grecian simplicity in with contrapuntal complexi historical interest, though n appealing to the appetite o tieth century ears, they were to with close attention an warm applause.

Less applause, in fact frigid applause, followed the measure of Mahler's first sy which preceded the Respigh fications, a work last hea under Mr. Mengelberg (Phi monic) in January, 1921. It hour long in performance, and perhaps sixty minutes too long insofar as having anything of importance to declare. Mahlerites, by the way, are now driven to the extremity of declaring that Mahler's symphonies are great because of their composer's inherent musical sterility, that this trait of impotency is itself the sublime thing—in Mahler's case. Perhaps, but very weakening in long stretches. Mr. Monteux performed a greater service on Friday evening (in Brooklyn) and Thanksgiving night (in Manhattan) by bringing to public attention the neglected first symphony of Sibelius, a virile and vivid masterpiece in comparison with the Mahler work.

Other numbers of the afternoon, the orchestra playing with elan and esprit, were Paul Dukas' "La Peri-Poeme Danse" and Smetana's "The Bartered Bride" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

DEC 2 192

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

The Boston Symphony Resorts to Mahler at Its Saturday Matinee

They say Down East that M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has discovered and made known the fact that a good deal of Mahler's First Symphony is Schubertian. Apparently in order that we might share the delightful surprise of this discovery, M. Monteux and his players set the Mahler symphony in question upon the program of their first New York matinee of the present season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

M. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a college Petting Party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerians whom nothing could daunt or deter. For the "Mahler Question" is no nearer settlement than it ever was. Discussion concerning his qualities as a music-maker persists with unabated fury, dividing those who (like Mr. Mengelberg and other European musicians of eminence and experience) regard him as one of the major prophets of music, from those who (like the majority of American concertgoers) regard him as the abomination of desolation. We know a great Continental conductor who unblushingly ranks Mahler with the high gods of symphonic music, and seats him on the right hand of Beethoven. But there are many musicians of indubitable insight and sensibility who would run screaming into the subway if they read Mahler's name on a Carnegie Hall billboard.

* * *

Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed this disputatious name on his program for yesterday's concert he was either indifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerphobia in these parts, or his friends had neglected to enlighten him.

He might, to be sure, have chosen a more exacerbating work than Mahler's First Symphony, which dates from 1883-'84, and is thus almost contemporaneous with "Parsifal." It is not Mahler at his worst, though it has some of his least tolerable faults.

Mahler was famous for his virulent hatred of program-notes, and he detested the ascription of illustrative purposes to his music. Yet, with the diverting inconsistency of the artist-mind, he seems to have based most of his symphonies upon "programs" of the most detailed and elaborate sort.

Dr. Rudolf Mengelberg, in his program-notes for the Mahler festival held at Amsterdam in May, 1920, quoted what he described as "a short synopsis" prepared by Mahler for the performances of his First Symphony at Budapest in 1889, at Hamburg in 1892 and at Weimar in 1894. In this "synopsis," says Dr. Mengelberg, Mahler "wrote somewhat extensively" concerning the programmatic significance of his symphony. Apparently he was not then so passionately eager to leave the public to "its own thoughts" in the presence of his music.

This "program" is a curiosity. It describes the work as "a symphonic poem in two parts." At Weimar it was called the "Titan" (after Jean Paul Richter), and a motto, "From the Days of Youth," was given to the first part, while the second part bore the tag: "Commedia Umana." According to Mahler's "synopsis," his music was intended to portray, successively, Spring; the awakening of Nature; something (not specified—presumably a ship) "under full sail"; a funeral march "in the manner of Callot," accompanying the burial of a hunter, and based on the old French canon, "Frère Jacques"; and, finally, a transition "from Hell to Paradise."

* * *

What it all means, heaven only knows. It is scarcely to be wondered at that Ernest Nodnagel (quoted by Mr. Hale in his program-notes) threw up his hands over this program, and begged some one to tell him "what in the world Frère Jacques has to do with the burial of the hunter, and what have both to do with the 'Commedia Umana,' or with 'Titan.'" Some have conjectured that Mahler was having fun with the wearisome and fantastic ways of progam annotators, but that seems hardly likely. Mahler was too earnest a soul to conceive and work out a jest of that sort.

It is simpler and far more profitable to think of the symphony as music unadorned, "absolute" music, and to throw the preposterous "program" into the scrapbasket. For as music, some of the symphony is charming—the first movement especially. Here, in the naïveté and freshness and unpretentiousness of the score, there is perhaps some warrant for Mr. Monteux's Schubertian analogy.

* * *

Mahler in this movement of the Symphony basks and revels in that atmosphere of elaborately contrived ingenuousness which he loved so dearly. For Mahler was only a little less content when he was approximating the style of a folksong than when he was trying to parallel one of the Brobdingnagian musical "jubilees" of the late Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, with their choruses of 20,000 and their 2,000 instruments reinforced by cannon shots and anvils. Mahler's imagination aspired to the grandiose and the apocalyptic with an unterrified audacity. He believed that he could speak at will with the artlessness of the Bohemian countryside or in accents weighty with mystical revelation. One can imagine his fancying himself at his ease among those illuminated beings described by Plato in the "Phædo": "They hear the voices and oracles of the gods, and see them in visions, and have intercourse with them face to face; and they see the moon and stars as they really are."

You perceive him in one of his comfortable strolls across the evening landscape, noting the familiar processes of the sky and the moon and the "wind on the heath," and telling himself, with Jasper Petulengro, that "life is very sweet, brother; who would wish to die?"—and then, suddenly remembering that he is a Symphonist with a Revelation—as in the last movement of this symphony—calling out, as one divinely chosen:

Bring me my bow of burning gold,
Bring me my arrows of desire—

like an inconceivably solemn Blake.

* * *

"The solemn is safe," said Browning; but he was not thinking of the solemn in art. It is unnecessary to attempt an appraisal of the æsthetic worth of Mahler's dallyings with the apocryphal, or to guess at the real value of his immense portentousness. It is enough to note that it constitutes one extreme of his astonishing imaginative gamut—this quality which his spokesmen call his "heroic sublimity, the pure exaltation of the gods themselves." The other extreme is seen in his passion for the naïve, the intimately candid and heart-easing; in his peasant humor and simplicity (whether spontaneous or skillfully simulated), the homely ingenuousness of the folk-spirit that he evokes, "rich and human, smelling of sun-baked fields and smoky kitchens, yet tender and many-colored." Mahler in this vein is undeniably engaging and persuasive, even touching, when he does not sustain it too inexorably; and it is the vein of the first movement of the D major Symphony. In the Finale, when he sets out to paint the progress of his soul from Hell to Paradise, he is merely empty and futile and bombastic.

* * *

Mr. Monteux filled out his program with Respighi's familiar arrangement of old Italian airs and dances, Dukas's "Le Peri" (which had been heard here before), and Smetana's perennial "Bartered Bride" Overture. The orchestra played all of this music very well indeed, and a house of comfortable size applauded it warmly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PHILADELPHIA
PA.
~~EVE.~~ PUBLIC LEDGER

DEC 2 1923

A Diversity of Opinion on the Subject of Strawinsky—The Service to Musical Art of E. G. McCollin

By FULLERTON WALDO

STRAWINSKY? The "symphies" for wind instruments, brought forward by Dr. Stokowski at the week-end concerts, have elicited variant opinions.

Said one entitled to be considered a representative of the intelligentsia: "At any rate, Dr. Stokowski rightly construes his responsibility to our audiences. We ought to hear the new works now and then, whether we like them or not. They may not represent the ultimate trend of musical composition away from the classic pattern. But if they are fair samples from the workshops of contemporary toil in music, we are bound to give ear to them, even if they go against the grain at a first hearing.

"For myself, I do not feel qualified to judge of the merits of the 'symphonies' from this first presentation. I want to hear it several times. It did not impress me as did the 'Song of the Nightingale,' by the same composer, several weeks before. But perhaps the failure was mine, not Strawinsky's."

It was a generous verdict.

WHEN Koussewitzky (who is to lead the Boston Symphony next year) brought out the new work in London there were hisses and derisive laughter, as Lawrence Gilman noted in the program-book of the current occasion. Stravinsky made a speech in which he ascribed the hostile reception to Koussewitzky's mistake in trying to play the music with expression—whereas, according to its maker, it must be played in an expressionless manner.

Whereupon Koussewitzky, in his own defence, asserted that he had no chance to give the score his individual interpretation—since the orchestra he commanded had but time to run through the stressful measures hastily.

It is interesting to note that a nephew of Koussewitzky—a very thoroughly-trained musician—is now a member of our orchestra. As he plays the double bass, he had no opportunity to be heard in the composition for other wind instruments which, in the hands of his uncle, created such an extraordinary dissension abroad.

There seems to be little doubt that the "Symphonies" (as apparently the music should be styled) is of little consequence when weighed in the balance against the "Song of the Nightingale," which had in it a good deal that is entitled to respectful consideration.

EDWARD G. McCOLLIN deserves the remembering gratitude of musical Philadelphia for his very real services to the cause of musical art in this city. His friendships were tenacious and his contacts various, so that his influence was potent and far-reaching.

A founder of the University Glee Club, he was an active member of the Musical Club, founded a year ago to raise the standard of musical activities at Old Penn, of whose Alumni Society he was at one time president.

With Dr. Edward I. Keffer, John Ingham, Oscar Knipe and others he went in a committee to hear Fritz Scheel at Woodside Park, with the result that this first leader of our great orchestra was engaged and the orchestra was organized.

He was president of the Orpheus Club, in which he was a leading soloist, and president of the Musical Fund Society which maintained the ancient hall on Locust street, in which so much musical history has been made in the last century. Moreover, he was a founder of the Manuscript Musical Society, which has been of conspicuous service in giving a hearing to some of the worthiest efforts of leading local composers.

HE WROTE delightful music, and was regarded as among the most successful of the Philadelphia song writers. But beyond the product of his fertile fancy and his dextrous contrivance in this field, his many friends will think of him as a patriot for his city and for its musical culture, whose essential good nature and generosity and rare unselfishness inspired the admiration and affection of those who knew him.

His daughter, Frances McCollin, worthily carries on the tradition, for her compositions for the chorus and for the solo voice betray a signal ability which has been widely recognized. Her music has taken many prizes, in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and it has been performed on innumerable occasions in all parts of the country.

OLD ENGLISH music at last has a dictionary to itself—and a good one it is. It is by Jeffrey Pulver, and it is published by E. P. Dutton & Co. It includes—in a single volume of clear type—not merely the definition of terms but the description of instruments.

The pages are embellished with clarifying illustrations. Such a book is of particular value to those who would read with full understanding the texts of Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer and other authors who make frequent reference to matters musical.

PLAYERS of stringed instruments will be attracted to the description of clavichord and harpsichord, or the crowd and the crwth, or the inclusive family of the viols. Wind instrument performers will find valuable data concerning the recorder, the serpent and other obsolete apparatus that rejoiced the harmonious lives of our forebears.

"The plan that I have followed," observes the author in his preface, "was that of omitting such articles as have been adequately treated in the existing dictionaries." But, on the other hand, in small compass he has assembled a large amount of information not readily accessible in any other form and entailing much [illegible] part of [illegible]

[illegible]NG FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

DEC 2 1923

Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert [illegible] Unity Concert Course on W[illegible] evening last week in the audi[illegible] of Montclair High School, before [illegible] audience that filled every seat [illegible] hall. There was no soloist.

Mr. Monteux bears the reputation of excelling in the making of programs, and the one offered was diversified enough to suit widely divergent tastes. There were the overture to Von Weber's "Der Freischuetz" and the "Polovtsian" dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin for those who are fond of melody. Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. [illegible] (opus 70), answered the craving for the variety of symphonic fare. For the moderns two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" ("Fetes" and "Nuages") vied with the immortal "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Monteux directs his forces with a minimum of apparent effort and much ease. His wood-winds and brasses last Wednesday were of a quality far superior to any ever heard in this community within the writer's recollection. Anything more exquisite than the opening measures of the adagio movement of the symphony would be difficult to find. It seemed to the writer, however, that the tonal quality of the first violins was hard. Whether this was due to the acoustics of the hall or to some other reason, the fact remains that in the first movement of the symphony and in the allegro finale the tones of the violins seemed hard and sometimes even shrill.

The Wagnerian excerpt was played magnificently, perhaps with less tumultous passion than that felt by other conductors, but withal rising to heights of eloquent expression. The players shared with the conductor in acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The delicate orchestration of the Debussy "Clouds" and the "Fetes" exercised its own particular appeal to those who understood the Debussy idiom. For those who do not the program book supplied part of an analysis made by Jean Marnold in a musical journal of Paris, in which he arrived at this conclusion regarding the nocturnes: "The natural predisposition of the human organism to perceive sonorous combinations according to the simplest relations would as a consequence have only the introduction into our music of the interval corresponding to the harmonics 7 and 11." Both the Freischuetz overture and the Polovtsian dances were received with many evidences of enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 2 - 1923

Madame Onegin Here With Boston Orchestra

The seasons first concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Acedemy of Music Friday night. Pierre Monteux offered a program unusual, but not extraordinary. The E Min[illegible] Symphony by Sibelius, in four movements, was well presented, but lacked strength.

"La Peri," a dance poem by Paul Dukas, although it evoked little enthusiasm from the audience, was the best number on the program, and it was conducted with rare skill by Monteux. The Dukas number is a nervous study in the most modern manner. The other orchestral number was the well known Liszt symphonie poem "Tasso".

Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto, sang two arias from "Rienzi" and two songs from Schubert, including the "Erlkonig". She was not in excellent voice, and although her notes were beautiful, they lacked flexibility.

Stingy people [illegible]

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Town Topics
New York City

DEC 6 - 1923

THE first Boston Symphony concert season, on Thanksgiving night, before capacity, at least left few empty space off agreeably with Sibelius' First Sym esting work by the Finnish composer. I [illegible] manages to avoid the convention eccentric or dull. The Sibelius Symphon of that composer's works, is a broad and and containing many passages characte Sibelius. Particularly interesting was scoring. Sigrid Onegin was soloist, singi Meyerbeerian opera "Rienzi," and two accompaniment. The appearance of soloi an innovation, since for some years the pr been purely orchestral.

[illegible] FROM THE

N Y HERALD

DEC 2 - 1923

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Opening Matinee Concert

Mahler's First Symphony on the Program Conducted by Monteux.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not advertised as a "grand matinee for the ladies and children." The ladies might resent the implication and Mr. Damrosch the insinuation that his symphony concerts for children were not his very own. But surely there was nothing in the entertainment to arouse dangerous passions or to tax homekeeping wits.

Gustave Mahler's first symphony, composed in Cassel in 1883-84, and in the cheerful key of D major, was the piece without resistance. After a brief intermission the audience listened to "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute," freely arranged by Signor Respighi. The other numbers were Paul Dukas's "La Peri, Poeme Danse," and Smetana's jubilant overture to "The Sold Bride."

Resphighi's arrangement of a galliard by Gallilei, father of the famous astronomer, a villanella and a "passo mezzo e macherada," both of unknown composers, were very pleasant pieces of music, in which the riches of the modern orchestra were employed with color and sonority, but without destroying the archaic charm of the dances. Mahler's symphony made the same impression as it had at previous hearings. It was very, very pretty.

Mahler is preeminently the conductors' composer. They dote upon him. Mahler in his bucolic mood and Mahler in his metaphysical abstraction are quite different incarnations of the same genius. The music of the former might rock one to sleep. That of the latter puts one there. In either case we should be grateful. The Bostonians performed the D major symphony and the Resphighi music admirably and Mr. Monteux conducted both with fine skill.

Negro Tenor Sings.

Roland Hayes, negro tenor, who has been singing in Europe with much success, gave a recital in Town Hall last evening. Mr. Hayes is in no need of consideration on account of his race beyond the indisputable assertion that he is an ornament to it. He is a genuine artist. His voice is not one of remarkable quality. On the contrary a less skillful and judicious singer might easily have difficulty in obtaining good results with it. Mr. Hayes manages it admirably.

He has a good breath control, tone generally well placed, unusual command of head tone and falsetto, intonation nearly perfect, ability to give color to his voice and excellent diction in several languages. His English enunciation is almost perfect and his German delightfully clear. His mastery of color was shown in the two quite different qualities which he sustained through "Die Forelle" and "Ich hab' im Traum Gewinet."

He sang very beautifully the air "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." He made the number profoundly touching and recalled what the old chroniclers have left to us about the eloquence of Handelian singers in tender and pathetic airs. In altogether another but equally admirable style was his delivery of "Der Nussbaum," which was marred only by a pianissimo a little exaggerated. But Mr. Hayes's art is so fine and so polished that its flaws must be noted only because they appear on such a surface. He had good support in the accompaniments of William Lawrence, a pianist of his own race.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

DEC 3 - 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The most delectable thing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday concert was a sixteenth century Gagliarda by Vincenzo Galilei, orchestrated by one of the Italian futurists, Respighi, who cleverly reproduced the ancient lute atmosphere. Dukas's "La Peri" seemed to indicate that the clever Frenchman has less to say than he used to have. Mahler's first symphony made little impression on the audience. The final "Sold Bride" over[illegible] orchestra's virtuosity.

H. T. F.

The Musical Digest
239 WEST 39TH STREET
NEW YORK

with regards [illegible]

The Attached item appeared in The Musical Digest, issue of December 4th. We take pleasure in sending you the clipping in case you may not already have seen it.

Boston Symphony Opens N. Y. Series

Monteux Presents Familiar Music at First Carnegie Concert; Onegin Soloist.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in New York took place last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Sibelius' first symphony, the Brahms variations on the Choral St. Anthony Theme of Haydn, the dance from Strauss' Salome, with Gerichter Gott from Rienzi, Schubert's Die Allmacht and Erlkonig as the vocal solo contributions. The soloist was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

Mr. Henderson writes in the Her- [illegible] of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang last evening with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be award[illegible] much glory."

Lawrence Gilman states in the Tribune: "It is delightful to welcome the great organization again in New York —for its concerts have been unjustly neglected in recent years. The orchestra played well last season; it plays better this; with beauty and nobility of tone, with splendid virility, elan, plasticity and responsiveness.

"Mme. Onegin's gorgeous voice was worthy of better material than the claptrap Rienzi music that she sang but she delivered it most dramatically, and the audience rewarded her liberally and with ardor."

Deems Taylor of the World says the orchestra played "expertly" and Mme. Onegin's voice was in "perfect condition."

Pitts Sanborn of the Mail eulogizes Mr. Monteux: "He is a conductor of broad sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programs of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

"Sergei Koussewitzky, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences, and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he 'feels' it without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics or expression.

"Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joyride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew."

IGEST, TU

Monte[illegible] [illegible]nphony

Roland [illegible]ff, Munz, [illegible]on.

Boston,
symphony
time here
Boston Sy
Monteux co
noon at Sy gram also liams' Fant orchestra o suite from Melisande, dances fron
Philip H
of the Mal
"This sym was writte pest when conductor
it was per festival, a hold, the tion of th that Mah of any s program
Richter's
symphon manner translati
ing the f attended and two moveme rather f know these
of the though needed full e
"In
ones, duce
bers dance meas an come signi fasci an u grot tain
by sym app with a tak

strumentation expert mais this Sym-
Monteux's dis-
we of Boston
n it. Despite es, it seems a place in the orchestra. And red how much e still lurks in y Hall."
vas the soloist
Pension Fund
on the after-
An all-Wagner
ed.
negro tenor, was ston Symphony's mber 16, singing
m Mozart's Cosi
ose of the Holy
z's Flight Into spirituals. Rous-
City (Evocations,
estral novelty of
e Roussel music
iding impression"
Herald who, how-
it is very seldom udience is permit-nirable singing as
from Mr. Hayes."
Transcript writes
The novelty was t Mr. Hayes he o'd story to praise
vocal virtue. Yes-
himself the musi-
whose means and

aninoff and Sigrid citalists of last Sun-its were warmly reblic and critics. On the London Strong rd and as usual, made on. Other recent mu-ere a concert by the ional Chorus on the
by Munz on the 17th,
tal by George Smith,
20th, and concerts by
Symphony Orchestra,
uer conductor, on the
John S. Codman, bari-
as sting artist at the e orchestral concerts.
te Szumowska, pianiste,
t at the second.

ist in Rochester

N. Y., Nov. 28.—Among citalists here were Myra sef Hofmann. The Den-ers also appeared here
nan Theatre. Frederick is conducting a course classes at the Eastman ving a series of Monday ecitals at Kilburn Hall,
h he explains the music
Vladimir Rosing, who di-pera department of the chool, gave a song recital
Hall.

[155]

…ING FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

DEC 2 1923

Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Unity Concert Course on Wednesday evening last week in the auditorium of Montclair High School, before an audience that filled every seat in the hall. There was no soloist.

Mr. Monteux bears the reputation of excelling in the making of programs, and the one offered was diversified enough to suit widely divergent tastes. There were the overture to Von Weber's "Der Freischuetz" and the "Polovtsian" dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin for those who are fond of melody. Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2 (opus 70), answered the craving for the variety of symphonic fare. For the moderns two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" ("Fetes" and "Nuages") vied with the immortal "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Monteux directs his forces with a minimum of apparent effort and much ease. His wood-winds and brasses last Wednesday were of a quality far superior to any ever heard in this community within the writer's recollection. Anything more exquisite than the opening measures of the adagio movement of the symphony would be difficult to find. It seemed to the writer, however, that the tonal quality of the first violins was hard. Whether this was due to the acoustics of the hall or to some other reason, the fact remains that in the first movement of the symphony and in the allegro finale the tones of the violins seemed hard and sometimes even shrill.

The Wagnerian excerpt was played magnificently, perhaps with less tumultous passion than that felt by other conductors, but withal rising to heights of eloquent expression. The players shared with the conductor in acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The delicate orchestration of the Debussy "Clouds" and the "Fetes" exercised its own particular appeal to those who understood the Debussy idiom. For those who do not the program book supplied part of an analysis made by Jean Marnold in a musical journal of Paris, in which he arrived at this conclusion regarding the nocturnes: "The natural predisposition of the human organism to perceive sonorous combinations according to the simplest relations would as a consequence have only the introduction into our music of the interval corresponding to the harmonics 7 and 11." Both the Freischuetz overture and the Polovtsian dances were received with many evidences of enjoyment.

…CLIPPING FROM THE

HERALD

DEC 2 - 1923

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Opening Matinee Concert

Mahler's First Symphony on the Program Conducted by Monteux.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not advertised as a "grand matinee for the ladies and children." The ladies might resent the implication and Mr. Damrosch the insinuation that his symphony concerts for children were not his very own. But surely there was nothing in the entertainment to arouse dangerous passions or to tax homekeeping wits.

Gustave Mahler's first symphony, composed in Cassel in 1883-84, and in the cheerful key of D major, was the piece without resistance. After a brief intermission the audience listened to "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute," freely arranged by Signor Respighi. The other numbers were Paul Dukas's "La Peri, Poeme Danse," and Smetana's jubilant overture to "The Sold Bride."

Resphighi's arrangement of a galliard by Gallilei, father of the famous astronomer, a villanella and a "passo mezzo e macherada," both of unknown composers, were very pleasant pieces of music, in which the riches of the modern orchestra were employed with color and sonority, but without destroying the archaic charm of the dances. Mahler's symphony made the same impression as it had at previous hearings. It was very, very pretty.

Mahler is preeminently the conductors' composer. They dote upon him. Mahler in his bucolic mood and Mahler in his metaphysical abstraction are quite different incarnations of the same genius. The music of the former might rock one to sleep. That of the latter puts one there. In either case we should be grateful. The Bostonians performed the D major symphony and the Resphighi music admirably and Mr. Monteux conducted both with fine skill.

Negro Tenor Sings.

Roland Hayes, negro tenor, who has been singing in Europe with much success, gave a recital in Town Hall last evening. Mr. Hayes is in no need of consideration on account of his race beyond the indisputable assertion that he is an ornament to it. He is a genuine artist. His voice is not one of remarkable quality. On the contrary a less skillful and judicious singer might easily have difficulty in obtaining good results with it. Mr. Hayes manages it admirably.

He has a good breath control, tone generally well placed, unusual command of head tone and falsetto, intonation nearly perfect, ability to give color to his voice and excellent diction in several languages. His English enunciation is almost perfect and his German delightfully clear. His mastery of color was shown in the two quite different qualities which he sustained through "Die Forelle" and "Ich hab' im Traum Gewinet."

He sang very beautifully the air "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." He made the number profoundly touching and recalled what the old chroniclers have left to us about the eloquence of Handelian singers in tender and pathetic airs. In altogether another but equally admirable style was his delivery of "Der Nussbaum," which was marred only by a pianissimo a little exaggerated. But Mr. Hayes's art is so fine and so polished that its flaws must be noted only because they appear on such a surface. He had good support in the accompaniments of William Lawrence, a pianist of his own race.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 2 - 1923

Madame Onegin Here With Boston Orchestra

The seasons first concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Acedemy of Music Friday night. Pierre Monteux offered a program unusual, but not extraordinary. The E Minor Symphony by Sibelius, in four movements, was well presented, but lacked strength.

"La Peri," a dance poem by Paul Dukas, although it evoked little enthusiasm from the audience, was the best number on the program, and it was conducted with rare skill by Monteux. The Dukas number is a nervous study in the most modern manner. The other orchestral number was the well known Liszt symphonic poem "Tasso."

Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto, sang two arias from "Rienzi" and two songs from Schubert, including the "Erlkonig". She was not in excellent voice, and although her notes were beautiful, they lacked flexibility.

Stingy people…

ESTABLISHED 1861

From Town Topics
New York City

DEC 6 - 1923

The first Boston Symphony concert o… season, on Thanksgiving night, before a… capacity, at least left few empty spaces i… off agreeably with Sibelius' First Symph… esting work by the Finnish composer. In th… usually manages to avoid the conventional… eccentric or dull. The Sibelius Symphony,… of that composer's works, is a broad and i… and containing many passages character… Sibelius. Particularly interesting was th… scoring. Sigrid Onegin was soloist, singi… Meyerbeerian opera "Rienzi," and two … accompaniment. The appearance of soloi… an innovation, since for some years the pr… been purely orchestral.

…S CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

DEC 3 - 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The most delectable thing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday concert was a sixteenth century gagliarda by Vincenzo Galilei, orchestrated by one of the Italian futurists, Respighi, who cleverly reproduced the ancient lute atmosphere. Dukas's "La Peri" seemed to indicate that the clever Frenchman has less to say than he used to have. Mahler's first symphony made little impression on the audience. The final "Sold Bride" overture displayed the orchestra's virtuosity.

H. T. F.

THE MUSICAL DIGEST, TU…

Monteux Presents First Mahler Symphony

Roland Hayes, Matzenauer, Onegin, Rachmaninoff, Munz, and London String Quartet Heard in Boston.

Boston, Nov. 28.—Mahler's first symphony was played for the first time here at the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting, last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program also contained Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for double stringed orchestra on a theme by Tallis, Faure's suite from stage music to Pelleas and Melisande, and Borodin's Polovetsian dances from Prince Igor.

Philip Hale writes in the Herald of the Mahler symphony as follows: "This symphony in D major, his first, was written and performed at Budapest when he sojourned there as a conductor at the Opera House. When it was performed at a Weimar music festival, a few years later, lo and behold, the program contained a description of the music. It was well known that Mahler abhorred program notes of any sort; but from this Weimar program one learned that Jean Paul Richter's romance, Titan, inspired the symphony; that the movement in the manner of a dead march was a tonal translation of a familiar picture showing the funeral procession of a hunter attended by all sorts of four-legged and two-legged animals, that the other movements had explanatory and rather fantastical titles. Does anyone know today whether Mahler wrote these program notes in mockery of the compilers of program books, or thought that the Weimar audience needed printed explanations for the full enjoyment of his music?

"In this symphony, as in his later ones, Mahler takes great pains to produce insignificant results. He remembers folk songs; he is enamored of dance rhythms. Now and then are measures that prepare the hearer for an overwhelming effect; when it comes, it is usually sound and fury, signifying nothing. Yet a strange fascination is exerted by measures of an unnecessary ugliness; by tricks of grotesque instrumentation; by a certain wildness in massed outbursts; by persistent rhythms. And in this symphony, as in later ones, suddenly appears, without apparent connection with that which precedes or follows, a long and sentimental, but unmistakably appealing, song for violins, which yesterday was played with rare beauty of tone and at the end with genuine passion."

The Transcript critic says: "Though the linking of the names of Mahler and Schubert has an odd sound in view of the Bohemian's reputation as a deviser of orchestral monstrosities, yet in the first movement and in the Scherzo of this symphony there are often a freshness, a frankness, a homely simplicity, a naivete if you will, that sends us straight to the music of Schubert for fitting analogy. Mahler's melodies are here unashamedly diatonic and unaffectedly tuneful, while his lucid, luminous scoring is surely the instrumentation of Schubert grown to expert maturity.

"Thirty-five years old is this Symphony, and but for Mr. Monteux's discernment and initiative we of Boston might never have known it. Despite its occasional weaknesses, it seems a piece fully entitled to place in the active repertory of the orchestra. And it may well be wondered how much more unknown treasure still lurks in the library of Symphony Hall."

Mme. Matzenauer was the soloist of the orchestra's first Pension Fund concert of the season on the afternoon of November 18. An all-Wagner program was presented.

Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, was the soloist of the Boston Symphony's fifth concert on November 16, singing Un Aura Amorosa from Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte, the Repose of the Holy Family from Berlioz's Flight Into Egypt, and two negro spirituals. Roussel's Rose Colored-City (Evocations, No. 2) was the orchestral novelty of the afternoon. The Roussel music left no "deep or abiding impression" on Mr. Hale of the Herald who, however, reports "that it is very seldom that a symphony audience is permitted to hear as admirable singing as that which came from Mr. Hayes." Mr. Parker of the Transcript writes in the same vein: The novelty was uninteresting but of Mr. Hayes he states: "It is an old story to praise him for voice and vocal virtue. Yesterday he proved himself the musician, the artist, whose means and medium is song."

Sergei Rachmaninoff and Sigrid Onegin were recitalists of last Sunday. Both artists were warmly received by the public and critics. On November 21 the London Strong Quartet was heard and as usual, made a good impression. Other recent musical events were a concert by the Ukrainian National Chorus on the 19th, a recital by Munz on the 17th, a Chopin recital by George Smith, pianist, on the 20th, and concerts by the People's Symphony Orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer conductor, on the 19th and 25th. John S. Codman, baritone, was the assisting artist at the first of these orchestral concerts. Mme. Antoinete Szumowska, pianiste, was the soloist at the second.

Recitalists in Rochester

Rochester, N. Y., Nov. 28.—Among the recent recitalists here were Myra Hess and Josef Hofmann. The Denishawn Dancers also appeared here in the Eastman Theatre. Frederick Lamond, who is conducting a course of master classes at the Eastman School, is giving a series of Monday afternoon recitals at Kilburn Hall, during which he explains the music he plays. Vladimir Rosing, who directs the opera department of the Eastman School, gave a song recital in Kilburn Hall.

…ht 1923, by
…L DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Campaign Against Toscanini Waged By Italian Papers

Protest Dictatorial Methods; Say Young Artists Are Not Given a Chance.

MUSSOLINI INTERVENES

Ever since the opening of the opera season at La Scala, when Toscanini substituted Salome and I Compagnacci for Aida at the last moment, because he was not satisfied with either of the tenors engaged for the role of Radames, two daily newspapers in Milan, Il Popolo d'Italia (of which Mussolini was editor before he became premier) and the Ambrosiano, have been waging a bitter campaign against the policy of the Scala.

Though both journals agree that Toscanini must remain in his present position since he is invaluable, they insist, nevertheless, that the celebrated maestro must not be allowed to interfere with the management in the matter of engaging artists and

---

…Digest,
in sendi…
already…

Musical pleasure may not

[155]

CLIPPING FROM THE

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEWARK,
N. J.
CALL

DEC 2 1923

Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Unity Concert Course on Wednesday evening last week in the auditorium of Montclair High School, before an audience that filled every seat in the hall. There was no soloist.

Mr. Monteux bears the reputation of excelling in the making of programs, and the one offered was diversified enough to suit widely divergent tastes. There were the overture to Von Weber's "Der Freischuetz" and the "Polovtsian" dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin for those who are fond of melody. Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2 (opus 70), answered the craving for the variety of symphonic fare. For the moderns two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" ("Fetes" and "Nuages") vied with the immortal "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. Monteux directs his forces with a minimum of apparent effort and much ease. His wood-winds and brasses last Wednesday were of a quality far superior to any ever heard in this community within the writer's recollection. Anything more exquisite than the opening measures of the adagio movement of the symphony would be difficult to find. It seemed to the writer, however, that the tonal quality of the first violins was hard. Whether this was due to the acoustics of the hall or to some other reason, the fact remains that in the first movement of the symphony and in the allegro finale the tones of the violins seemed hard and sometimes even shrill.

The Wagnerian excerpt was played magnificently, perhaps with less tumultous passion than that felt by other conductors, but withal rising to heights of eloquent expression. The players shared with the conductor in acknowledging the plaudits of the audience.

The delicate orchestration of the Debussy "Clouds" and the "Fetes" exercised its own particular appeal to those who understood the Debussy idiom. For those who do not the program book supplied part of an analysis made by Jean Marnold in a musical journal of Paris, in which he arrived at this conclusion regarding the nocturnes: "The natural predisposition of the human organism to perceive sonorous combinations according to the simplest relations would as a consequence have only the introduction into our music of the interval corresponding to the harmonics 7 and 11." Both the Freischuetz overture and the Polovtsian dances were received with many evidences of enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 2 1923

Madame Onegin Here With Boston Orchestra

The seasons first concert in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held at the Acedemy of Music Friday night. Pierre Monteux offered a program unusual, but not extraordinary. The E Minor Symphony by Sibelius, in four movements, was well presented, but lacked strength.

"La Peri," a dance poem by Paul Dukas, although it evoked little enthusiasm from the audience, was the best number on the program, and it was conducted with rare skill by Monteux. The Dukas number is a nervous study in the most modern manner. The other orchestral number was the well known Liszt symphonie poem "Tasso".

Madame Sigrid Onegin, contralto, sang two arias from "Rienzi" and two songs from Schubert, including the "Erlkonig". She was not an excellent voice and although her notes were beautiful, they lacked flexibility.

Stingy people are

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Town Topics
New York City

DEC 6 1923

The first Boston Symphony concert season, on Thanksgiving night, before capacity, at least left few empty spaces off agreeably with Sibelius' First Sympl esting work by the Finnish composer. In usually manages to avoid the conventiona eccentric or dull. The Sibelius Symphony of that composer's works, is a broad and and containing many passages characte Sibelius. Particularly interesting was scoring. Sigrid Onegin was soloist, singir Meyerbeerian opera "Rienzi," and two accompaniment. The appearance of soloi an innovation, since for some years the pr been purely orchestral.

CLIPPING FROM THE

N Y HERALD

DEC 2 1923

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Opening Matinee Concert

Mahler's First Symphony on the Program Conducted by Monteux.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not advertised as a "grand matinee for the ladies and children." The ladies might resent the implication and Mr. Damrosch the insinuation that his symphony concerts for children were not his very own. But surely there was nothing in the entertainment to arouse dangerous passions or to tax homekeeping wits.

Gustave Mahler's first symphony, composed in Cassel in 1883-84, and in the cheerful key of D major, was the piece without resistance. After a brief intermission the audience listened to "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute," freely arranged by Signor Resphighi. The other numbers were Paul Dukas's "La Peri, Poeme Danse," and Smetana's jubilant overture to "The Sold Bride."

Resphighi's arrangement of a galliard by Gallilei, father of the famous astronomer, a villanella and a "passo mezzo e macherada," both of unknown composers, were very pleasant pieces of music, in which the riches of the modern orchestra were employed with color and sonority, but without destroying the archaic charm of the dances. Mahler's symphony made the same impression as it had at previous hearings. It was very, very pretty.

Mahler is preeminently the conductors' composer. They dote upon him. Mahler in his bucolic mood and Mahler in his metaphysical abstraction are quite different incarnations of the same genius. The music of the former might rock one to sleep. That of the latter puts one there. In either case we should be grateful. The Bostonians performed the D major symphony and the Resphighi music admirably and Mr. Monteux conducted both with fine skill.

Negro Tenor Sings.

Roland Hayes, negro tenor, who has been singing in Europe with much success, gave a recital in Town Hall last evening. Mr. Hayes is in no need of consideration on account of his race beyond the indisputable assertion that he is an ornament to it. He is a genuine artist. His voice is not one of remarkable quality. On the contrary a less skillful and judicious singer might easily have difficulty in obtaining good results with it. Mr. Hayes manages it admirably.

He has a good breath control, tone generally well placed, unusual command of head tone and falsetto, intonation nearly perfect, ability to give color to his voice and excellent diction in several languages. His English enunciation is almost perfect and his German delightfully clear. His mastery of color was shown in the two quite different qualities which he sustained through "Die Forelle" and "Ich hab' im Traum Gewinet."

He sang very beautifully the air "When I Am Laid in Earth," from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." He made the number profoundly touching and recalled what the old chroniclers have left to us about the eloquence of Handelian singers in tender and pathetic airs. In altogether another but equally admirable style was his delivery of "Der Nussbaum," which was marred only by a pianissimo a little exaggerated. But Mr. Hayes's art is so fine and so polished that its flaws must be noted only because they appear on such a surface. He had good support in the accompaniments of William Lawrence, a pianist of his own race.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

DEC 3 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The most delectable thing at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday concert was a sixteenth century Gagliarda by Vincenzo Galilei, orchestrated by one of the Italian futurists, Respighi, who cleverly reproduced the ancient lute atmosphere. Dukas's "La Peri" seemed to indicate that the clever Frenchman has less to say than he used to have. Mahler's first symphony made little impression on the audience. The final "Sold Bride" overture showed the orchestra's virtuosity at its best. H. T. F.

The Musical Digest

239 WEST 39TH STREET
NEW YORK

The Attached item appeared in The Musical Digest, issue of December 4th. We take pleasure in sending you the clipping in case you may not already have seen it.

2

Boston Symphony Opens N. Y. Series

Monteux Presents Familiar Music at First Carnegie Concert; Onegin Soloist.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in New York took place last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Sibelius' first symphony, the Brahms variations on the Choral St. Anthony Theme of Haydn, the dance from Strauss' Salome, with Gerichter Gott from Rienzi, Schubert's Die Allmacht and Erlkonig as the vocal solo contributions. The soloist was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

Mr. Henderson writes in the Herpnony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang last evening with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be award much glory."

Lawrence Gilman states in the Tribune: "It is delightful to welcome the great organization again in New York —for its concerts have been unjustly neglected in recent years. The orchestra played well last season; it plays better this; with beauty and nobility of tone, with splendid virility, elan, plasticity and responsiveness.

"Mme. Onegin's gorgeous voice was worthy of better material than the claptrap Rienzi music that she sang but she delivered it most dramatically, and the audience rewarded her liberally and with ardor."

Deems Taylor of the World says the orchestra played "expertly" and Mme. Onegin's voice was in "perfect condition."

Pitts Sanborn of the Mail eulogizes Mr. Monteux: "He is a conductor of broad sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programs of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

"Sergei Koussewitzky, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences, and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he 'feels' it without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics or expression.

"Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joyride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew."

Monte

Roland

Boston,
symphony
time here a Boston Sy
Monteux co
noon at Sy gram also liams' Fant orchestra on suite from Melisande,
dances from Philip H
of the Mah
"This symp was writte pest when conductor
it was per festival, a hold, the p tion of the that Mahl
of any sc program
Richter's
symphony manner c translatic
ing the f attended and two-moveme rather fa know t these of the c thought needed full enj
"In t ones, M duce ir bers f dance measu an o comes signif fascin an un grote tain
by p symp appea with a lo taka whic bear gem
Th
the
and vie a d yet
the are ho wil sic
Mo as tu

IGEST, TU

nphony

ff, Munz, on.

strumentation expert ma
is this Sym
Monteux's dis
we of Boston
n it. Despite es, it seems a
place in the Orchestra. And
ed how much still lurks in y Hall."
was the soloist
Pension Fund
on the after
An all-Wagner
ed.
negro tenor, was ton Symphony's nber 16, singing
m Mozart's Cosi
ose of the Holy
z's Flight Into spirituals. Rou
city (Evocations,
estral novelty of Roussel music
iding impression"
Herald who, how
it is very seldom idience is permit
nirable singing as rom Mr. Hayes."
Transcript writes
The novelty was
of Mr. Hayes he old story to praise
vocal virtue. Yes
himself the musi
whose means and inoff and Sigr talists of last Sun

s were warmly re blic and critics. On
he London String
d and as usual, made
n. Other recent mu re a concert by the onal Chorus on the
by Munz on the 17th,
al by George Smith,
20th, and concerts by
Symphony Orchestra,
er conductor, on the
John S. Codman, bari
as sting artist at the orchestral concerts.
Szumowska, pianiste,
at the second.

st in Rochester

Y., Nov. 28.—Among talists here were Myra of Hofmann. The Den
rs also appeared here an Theatre. Frederick is conducting a course asses at the Eastman ing a series of Monday
citals at Kilburn Hall, he explains the music
adimir Rosing, who di era department of the ool, gave a song recital
all.

N. Y. Staats 12/4
Zeitung

Mahlers „Erſte“ bei den Boſtonern.

Guſtav Mahler war bekanntlich ein geſchworener Feind eines „Programmes“ bei ſeinen Symphonien, welche er ungeachtet ihrer Ausdrucksenergie als ein Stück abſoluter Muſik behandelt wiſſen wollte. Daher hat er auch den urſprünglichen Titel ſeiner Erſten Symphonie, der „Titan“ war, fallen laſſen, weil man dieſes Werk mit dem Jean Paul'ſchen „Titan“ in Verbindung ſetzen wollte, während der Tonſetzer einfach nur einen heldenhaft-kraftvollen Menſchen im Sinne hatte, offenbar ſich ſelbſt. Natürlich hat er auch das Programm, über welches Philip Hale, der geiſtvolle Schreiber der Programmnotizen der Boſtoner Symphoniekonzerte, anläßlich der erſten Aufführung von Mahlers Werk in Budapeſt ausführlich zu berichten weiß, zurückgewieſen. Das Werk war übrigens urſprünglich fünfſätzig, denn Natalie Bauer-Lechner, die Verfaſſerin eines intereſſanten Mahlerbuches, weiß zu melden, daß ſich an den zweiten Satz früher eine ſentimental-ſchwärmeriſche Epiſode, die Mahler auch die „Jugendeſelei“ ſeines Helden nannte, angeſchloſſen habe, die er ſpäter ausmerzte.

Die erwähnte Schriftſtellerin, eine hervorragende Geigerin — als ſolche Mitglied des ſeinerzeit ſehr erfolgreichen Soldat-Roeger-Damenquartetts — zitiert ferner folgende Worte nach Mahlers Mitteilungen: „Meine Erſte Symphonie iſt noch am unbekümmertſten und keckſten geſchrieben. Ich meinte naiv, die ſei kindleicht für Spieler und Hörer und werde gleich ſo gefallen, daß ich von den Tantiemen werde leben und komponieren können. Wie groß war meine Ueberraſchung und Enttäuſchung, als es ganz anders kam! In Peſt, wo ich ſie zuerſt aufführte, wichen mir darnach die Freunde ſcheu aus; keiner wagte, mit mir über die Aufführung und mein Werk zu ſprechen, und ich ging wie ein Kranker oder Geächteter umher. Wie aber erſt die Kritiken ausſahen, kannſt Du Dir unter ſolchen Umſtänden wohl denken.“ Nun denn: Mahler iſt über die Zeiten der Enttäuſchungen und Kränkungen hinweggekommen, und hat ſich an die Strafe, die jedes Genie zahlen muß, gewöhnt. Man kennt ja den humoriſtiſchen, norddeutſchen Erfahrungsſatz: „Mit der Zeit gewöhnen ſie ſich daran“, ſagte die Köchin — da zog ſie den Aalen die Haut ab!“

Der erſte Satz der Mahler'ſchen Erſten atmet Naturverſunkenheit, Naturgröße, Bewunderung für die Allmacht der Natur; ſie bringt die packendſten Schilderungen und hält den Charakter des Phantaſtiſchen, des Unwägbaren feſt. Mahler iſt, das gilt vom ganzen Werk, bereits kühner Impreſſioniſt, kein Taſtender und Zaghafter, denn ſeine Muſe zeigte ſchon damals jene feſtumriſſenen Züge, welche ihn ſpäter zu einer ſo markanten Perſönlichkeit ſtempelten, nur daß der ſpätere Mahler noch weniger zu Konzeſſionen geneigt ſchien, noch knorriger und eigenwilliger wurde.

Der zweite Satz bewegt ſich etwa in den äußerlichen Formen jener derben, hemdsärmeligen Scherzi eines Schuberts oder noch beſſer Bruckner; es handelt ſich um eine Zuſammenkunft öſterreichiſcher Bauern; der Satz ſtrotzt von gewürzter Thematik und kunſtvoller Kontrapunktik. An dieſen ſchließt ſich ſodann — ein echt Mahler'ſcher Kontraſt! — ein durch ſeine unheimliche Myſtik feſſelnder, dritter Satz, in dem der bekannte Studenten-Kanon „Bruder Martin, ſchläfſt Du noch?“ kunſtvoll abgewandelt wird. Ein wahrer Titanentrotz, ein Löcken gegen den unbarmherzigen Stachel, waltet im Finale vor, welche gelegentlich choleriſch ſich ausſpricht, aber auch des parodiſtiſchen Salzes genug enthält.

Herr Monteux hat uns an der Spitze der Boſtoner eine im Ganzen gedrungen-kraftvolle Ausarbeitung des Werkes geboten, welches allerdings noch nicht die maſſenhaften Orcheſterkräfte der ſpäteren Symphonien aufbietet; es werden zwar ſieben Hörner verlangt, doch iſt die Beſetzung ſonſt eine mäßige. Am beſten gelangen dem Dirigenten wohl die beiden, kräftig aufgebauten Eckſätze, der kernige Humor des dritten erſchien ein wenig abgeſchliffen, gelegentlich etwas verniedlicht, und dem letzten fehlte es an jener wirkſamen Meſſerſpitze parodiſtiſchen Humors, welcher dem Satz, ja, dem ganzen Werke ſo charakteriſtiſch iſt. Viele wollten in dem Mahler'ſchen Werke anfangs überhaupt nur eine Parodie, nichts als eine ſolche, erblicken. Der Orcheſterklang war wieder einmal prächtig, und der warme Beifall ein wohlverdienter. Kein Zweifel, daß Herr Monteux ſich durch die energiſche und liebevolle Durchführung dieſes Werkes, welches wohl aber kein „dankbares“ im landläufigen Sinne bezeichnet werden kann, auf ein höheres Niveau gehoben hat.

Ueber die ſonſtigen Gaben des Konzerts nur mehr einige kurze Bemerkungen. Die drei vorgeführten „Alten Tänze und Arien für Laute“ von Ottorino Reſpighi für Orcheſter bearbeitet, ſind einfache, melodiöſe und doch mit dem ganzen charakteriſtiſchen Reiz der Spät-Renaiſſance wirkende Tanzformen. Zwiſchen einer luſtigen „Gagliarda“ von Galilei und dem naiven „Paſſo mezzo e maſcherata“ machte eine „Vilanella“ durch ihre preziöſe Pathetik den beſten Eindruck. Allen dreien kam eine graziöſe und klangſchöne Durchführung ſehr zu Statten. „La Péri“ von Dukas erinnert an das „Tannhäuſer“-Bacchanale; nur iſt das Stück mit modernen Effekten herausſtaffiert und wirkt durch ſein glitzerndes Orcheſterkleid. Den Beſchluß bildete die reizvoll geſpielte Ouverture zu Smetanas „Verkaufter Braut“. Carnegie Hall war ſehr gut beſetzt; der Erfolg war ein ſehr freundlicher. H.

Record Nov 26

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philodelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

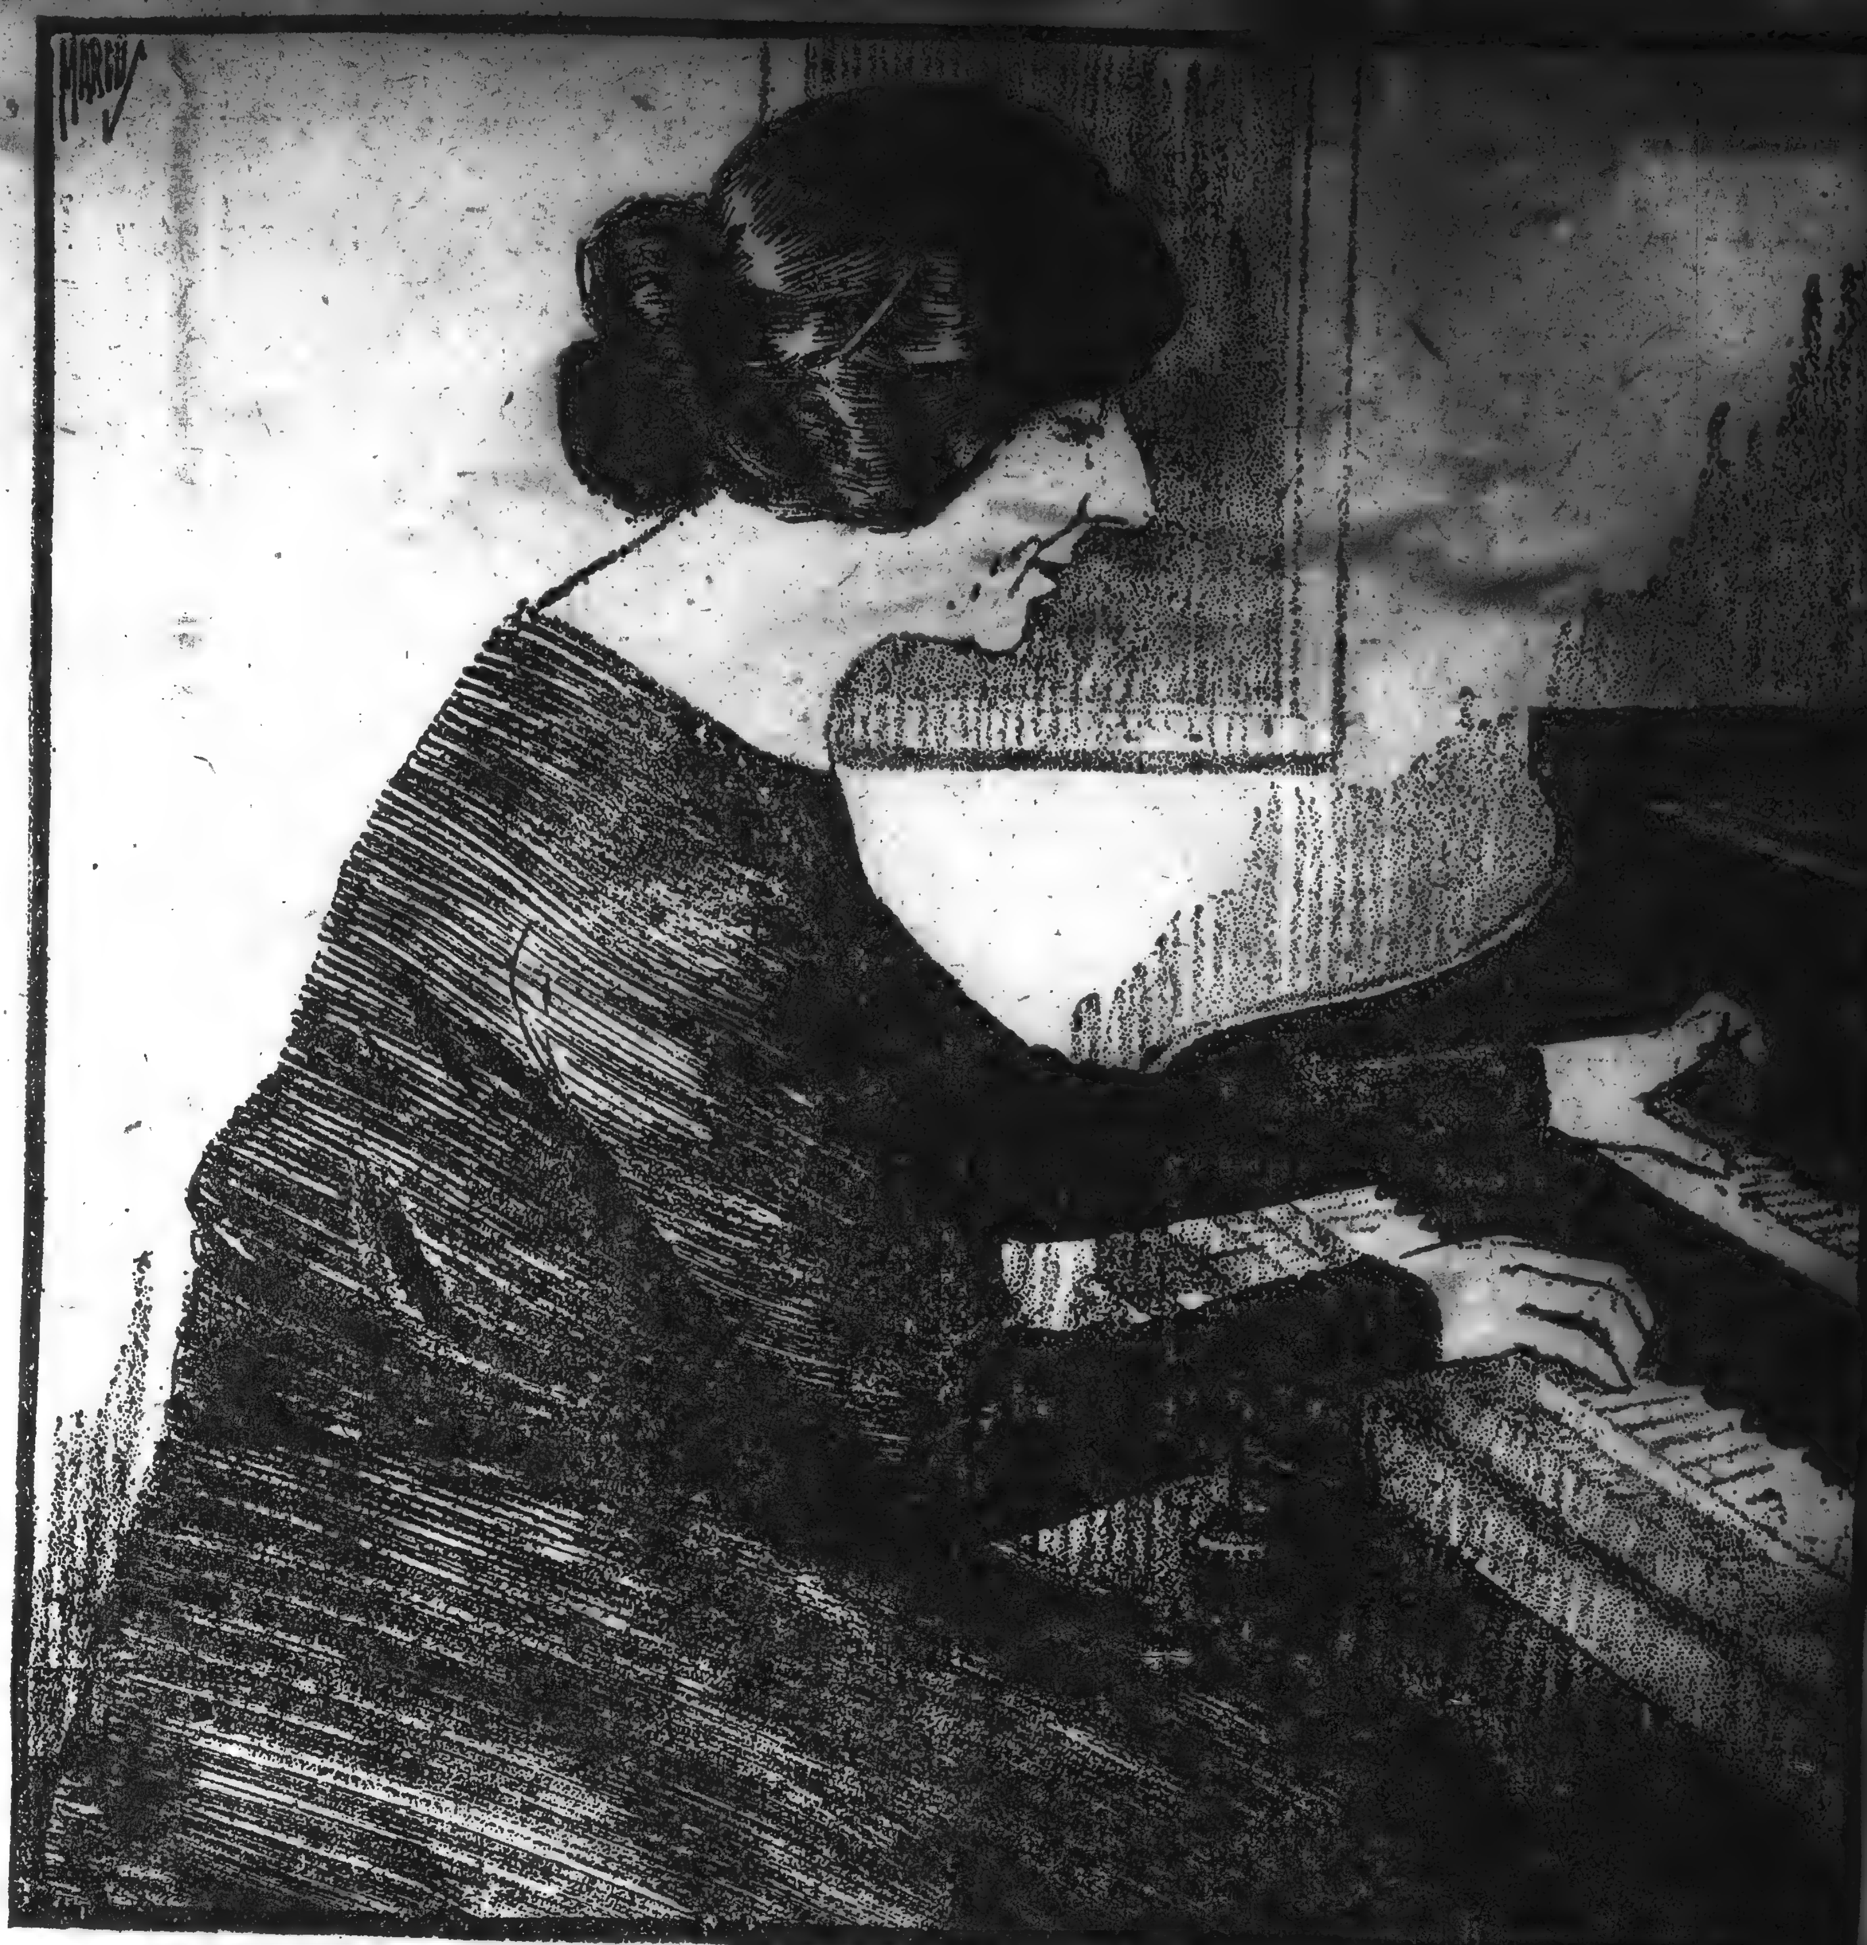
Adv Nov 24

OVATIONS FOR SYMPHONY MEN

This week's Symphony program is one of the best of the season. At the matinee concert yesterday Pierre Monteux and the orchestra won ovations for their admirable interpretation of Mahler's D major symphony, presented for the first time in this city, and of Vaughan Williams' delightful fantasia for stringed orchestra, built upon an old theme by Thomas Tallis.

Mahler's symphony proved entertaining; on the whole, good, straight, old-style music. Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite, a charming work, worthy of comparison in its way with the more famous Debussy score on the same subject, and Borodin's brilliant Polovtsian dances from the opera "Prince Igor," are the other features of the program, which will be given again tonight.

Modern Voi[illegible] ncien[illegible] t



(From the Drawing by Marcus in The New York Times)

Wanda Landowska

Mistress of the Harpsichord and of the Elder Music
Long Familiar Virtuosa in Europe, Now Newly Come to America

Adv Nov 25

Landowska First Star at Monday Symphony

WANDA LANDOWSKA, the famous harpsichordist, making her first tour of America, will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall on December 3, January 14, Ferbuary 4, March 10 and April 7. Madame Landowska will be heard in Handel's concerto for the harpsichord in B flat major.

Pierre Monteaux will open the first concert with Schubert's symphony in C major. Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," will also be played.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Harold Bauer will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts, Dec. 7 and 8. He will appear with the orchestra in the Brahms concerto in D flat. Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Paine's prelude to "Oedipus," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances are the other numbers.

HAYES CONCERT

Roland Hayes, the negro tenor who recently appeared as Symphony soloist, will give a concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday [illegible] with a program of German,

N.Y. Staats 12/4
Zeitung

Mahlers „Erſte“ bei den Boſtonern.

Guſtav Mahler war bekanntlich ein geſchworener Feind eines „Programmes“ bei ſeinen Symphonien, welche er ungeachtet ihrer Ausdrucksenergie als ein Stück abſoluter Muſik behandelt wiſſen wollte. Daher hat er auch den urſprünglichen Titel ſeiner Erſten Symphonie, der „Titan“ war, fallen laſſen, weil man dieſes Werk mit dem Jean Paul'ſchen „Titan“ in Verbindung ſetzen wollte, während der Tonſetzer einfach nur einen heldenhaft-kraftvollen Menſchen im Sinne hatte, offenbar ſich ſelbſt. Natürlich hat er auch das Programm, über welches Philip Hale, der geiſtvolle Schreiber der Programmnotizen der Boſtoner Symphoniekonzerte, anläßlich der erſten Aufführung von Mahlers Werk in Budapeſt ausführlich zu berichten weiß, zurückgewieſen. Das Werk war übrigens urſprünglich fünfſätzig, denn Natalie Bauer-Lechner, die Verfaſſerin eines intereſſanten Mahlerbuches, weiß zu melden, daß ſich an den zweiten Satz früher eine ſentimental-ſchwärmeriſche Epiſode, die Mahler auch die „Jugendeſelei“ ſeines Helden nannte, angeſchloſſen habe, die er ſpäter ausmerzte.

Die erwähnte Schriftſtellerin, eine hervorragende Geigerin — als ſolche Mitglied des ſeinerzeit ſehr erfolgreichen Soldat-Roeger-Damenquartetts — zitiert ferner folgende Worte nach Mahlers Mitteilungen: „Meine Erſte Symphonie iſt noch am unbekümmertſten und keckſten geſchrieben. Ich meinte naiv, die ſei kindleicht für Spieler und Hörer und werde gleich ſo gefallen, daß ich von den Tantiemen werde leben und komponieren können. Wie groß war meine Ueberraſchung und Enttäuſchung, als es ganz anders kam! In Peſt, wo ich ſie zuerſt aufführte, wichen mir darnach die Freunde ſcheu aus; keiner wagte, mit mir über die Aufführung und mein Werk zu ſprechen, und ich ging wie ein Kranker oder Geächteter umher. Wie aber erſt die Kritiken ausſahen, kannſt Du Dir unter ſolchen Umſtänden wohl denken.“ Nun denn: Mahler iſt über die Zeiten der Enttäuſchungen und Kränkungen hinweggekommen, und hat ſich an die Strafe, die jedes Genie zahlen muß, gewöhnt. Man kennt ja den humoriſtiſchen, norddeutſchen Erfahrungsſatz: „Mit der Zeit gewöhnen ſie ſich daran“, ſagte die Köchin — da zog ſie den Aalen die Haut ab!“

Der erſte Satz der Mahler'ſchen Erſten atmet Naturverſunkenheit, Naturgröße, Bewunderung für die Allmacht der Natur; ſie bringt die packendſten Schilderungen und hält den Charakter des Phantaſtiſchen, des Unwägbaren feſt. Mahler iſt, das gilt vom ganzen Werk, bereits kühner Impreſſioniſt, kein Taſtender und Zaghafter, denn ſeine Muſe zeigte ſchon damals jene feſtumriſſenen Züge, welche ihn ſpäter zu einer ſo markanten Perſönlichkeit ſtempelten, nur daß der ſpätere Mahler noch weniger zu Konzeſſionen geneigt ſchien, noch knorriger und eigenwilliger wurde.

Der zweite Satz bewegt ſich etwa in den äußerlichen Formen jener derben, hemdsärmeligen Scherzi eines Schuberts oder noch beſſer Bruckner; es handelt ſich um eine Zuſammenkunft öſterreichiſcher Bauern; der Satz ſtrotzt von gewürzter Thematik und kunſtvoller Kontrapunktik. An dieſen ſchließt ſich ſodann — ein echt Mahler'ſcher Kontraſt! — ein durch ſeine unheimliche Myſtik feſſelnder, dritter Satz, in dem der bekannte Studenten-Kanon „Bruder Martin, ſchläfſt Du noch?“ kunſtvoll abgewandelt wird. Ein wahrer Titanentrotz, ein Löcken gegen den unbarmherzigen Stachel, waltet im Finale vor, welche gelegentlich choleriſch ſich ausſpricht, aber auch des parodiſtiſchen Salzes genug enthält.

Herr Monteux hat uns an der Spitze der Boſtoner eine im Ganzen gedrungen-kraftvolle Ausarbeitung des Werkes geboten, welches allerdings noch nicht die maſſenhaften Orcheſterkräfte der ſpäteren Symphonien aufbietet; es werden zwar ſieben Hörner verlangt, doch iſt die Beſetzung ſonſt eine mäßige. Am beſten gelangen dem Dirigenten wohl die beiden, kräftig aufgebauten Eckſätze, der kernige Humor des dritten erſchien ein wenig abgeſchliffen, gelegentlich etwas verniedlicht, und dem letzten fehlte es an jener wirkſamen Meſſerſpitze parodiſtiſchen Humors, welcher dem Satz, ja, dem ganzen Werke ſo charakteriſtiſch iſt. Viele wollten in dem Mahler'ſchen Werke anfangs überhaupt nur eine Parodie, nichts als eine ſolche, erblicken. Der Orcheſterklang war wieder einmal prächtig, und der warme Beifall ein wohlverdienter. Kein Zweifel, daß Herr Monteux ſich durch die energiſche und liebevolle Durchführung dieſes Werkes, welches wohl aber kein „dankbares“ im landläufigen Sinne bezeichnet werden kann, auf ein höheres Niveau gehoben hat.

Ueber die ſonſtigen Gaben des Konzerts nur mehr einige kurze Bemerkungen. Die drei vorgeführten „Alten Tänze und Arien für Laute“, von Ottorino Reſpighi für Orcheſter bearbeitet, ſind einfache, melodiöſe und doch mit dem ganzen charakteriſtiſchen Reiz der Spät-Rennaiſſance wirkende Tanzformen. Zwiſchen einer luſtigen „Gagliarda“ von Galilei und dem naiven „Paſſo mezzo e maſcherata“ machte eine „Vilanella“ durch ihre preziöſe Pathetik den beſten Eindruck. Allen dreien kam eine graziöſe und klangſchöne Durchführung ſehr zu Statten. „La Peri“ von Dukas erinnert an das „Tannhäuſer“-Bacchanale; nur iſt das Stück mit modernen Effekten herausſtaffiert und wirkt durch ſein glitzerndes Orcheſterkleid. Den Beſchluß bildete die reizvoll geſpielte Ouverture zu Smetanas „Verkaufter Braut“. Carnegie Hall war ſehr gut beſetzt; der Erfolg war ein ſehr freundlicher.

H.

Record Nov 26

BRUCE SIMONDS TO PLAY WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruce Simonds, the young pianist of New Haven who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert in Woolsey hall New Haven Tuesday evening, Nov. 27, at 8:15, has had a career of high distinction. Born in Bridgeport, he showed a marvelous precocity and played the piano in public from the age of eight. He studied at the Yale School of Music under Stanley Knight and Horatio Parker, subsequently pursuing his training as a piano virtuoso for a year with Harold Bauer.

In 1919 he went to Paris where he took a course in composition under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy and studied piano with Mathay, the celebrated London teacher.

Mr. Simonds appeared in both Paris and London with great success before he returned to America. In London he was awarded the Chapel gold medal for piano playing; in Paris he was asked by d'Indy to tour with him in the American tour of this distiguished composer. Simonds has likewise appeared as a soloist with the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia and a number of other cities and has given recitals in New York and various cities of New England.

He will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming concert, Cecar Franck's Symphonic Variations. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the overture to "The Bartered Bride," of Semetana, the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, and Richard Strauss' dance of the seven veils from "Salome."

Great Musical Treat Boston Symphony Concert Woolsey Hall Tuesday

A great treat will be afforded music lovers tomorrow night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall, New Haven. This wonderful organization consists of 104 musicians and it will be led by Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French conductor, who is finishing his last season with the Boston Symphony, before returning to France. Bruce Simonds will be the piano soloist, in Franck's "Symphonie variations."

The orchestra selections will include Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Sibelius' "First Symphony," and Strauss' "Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils." The concert will begin at precisely 8:15. Seats at Loomis' Temple of Music, New Haven.—Adv.

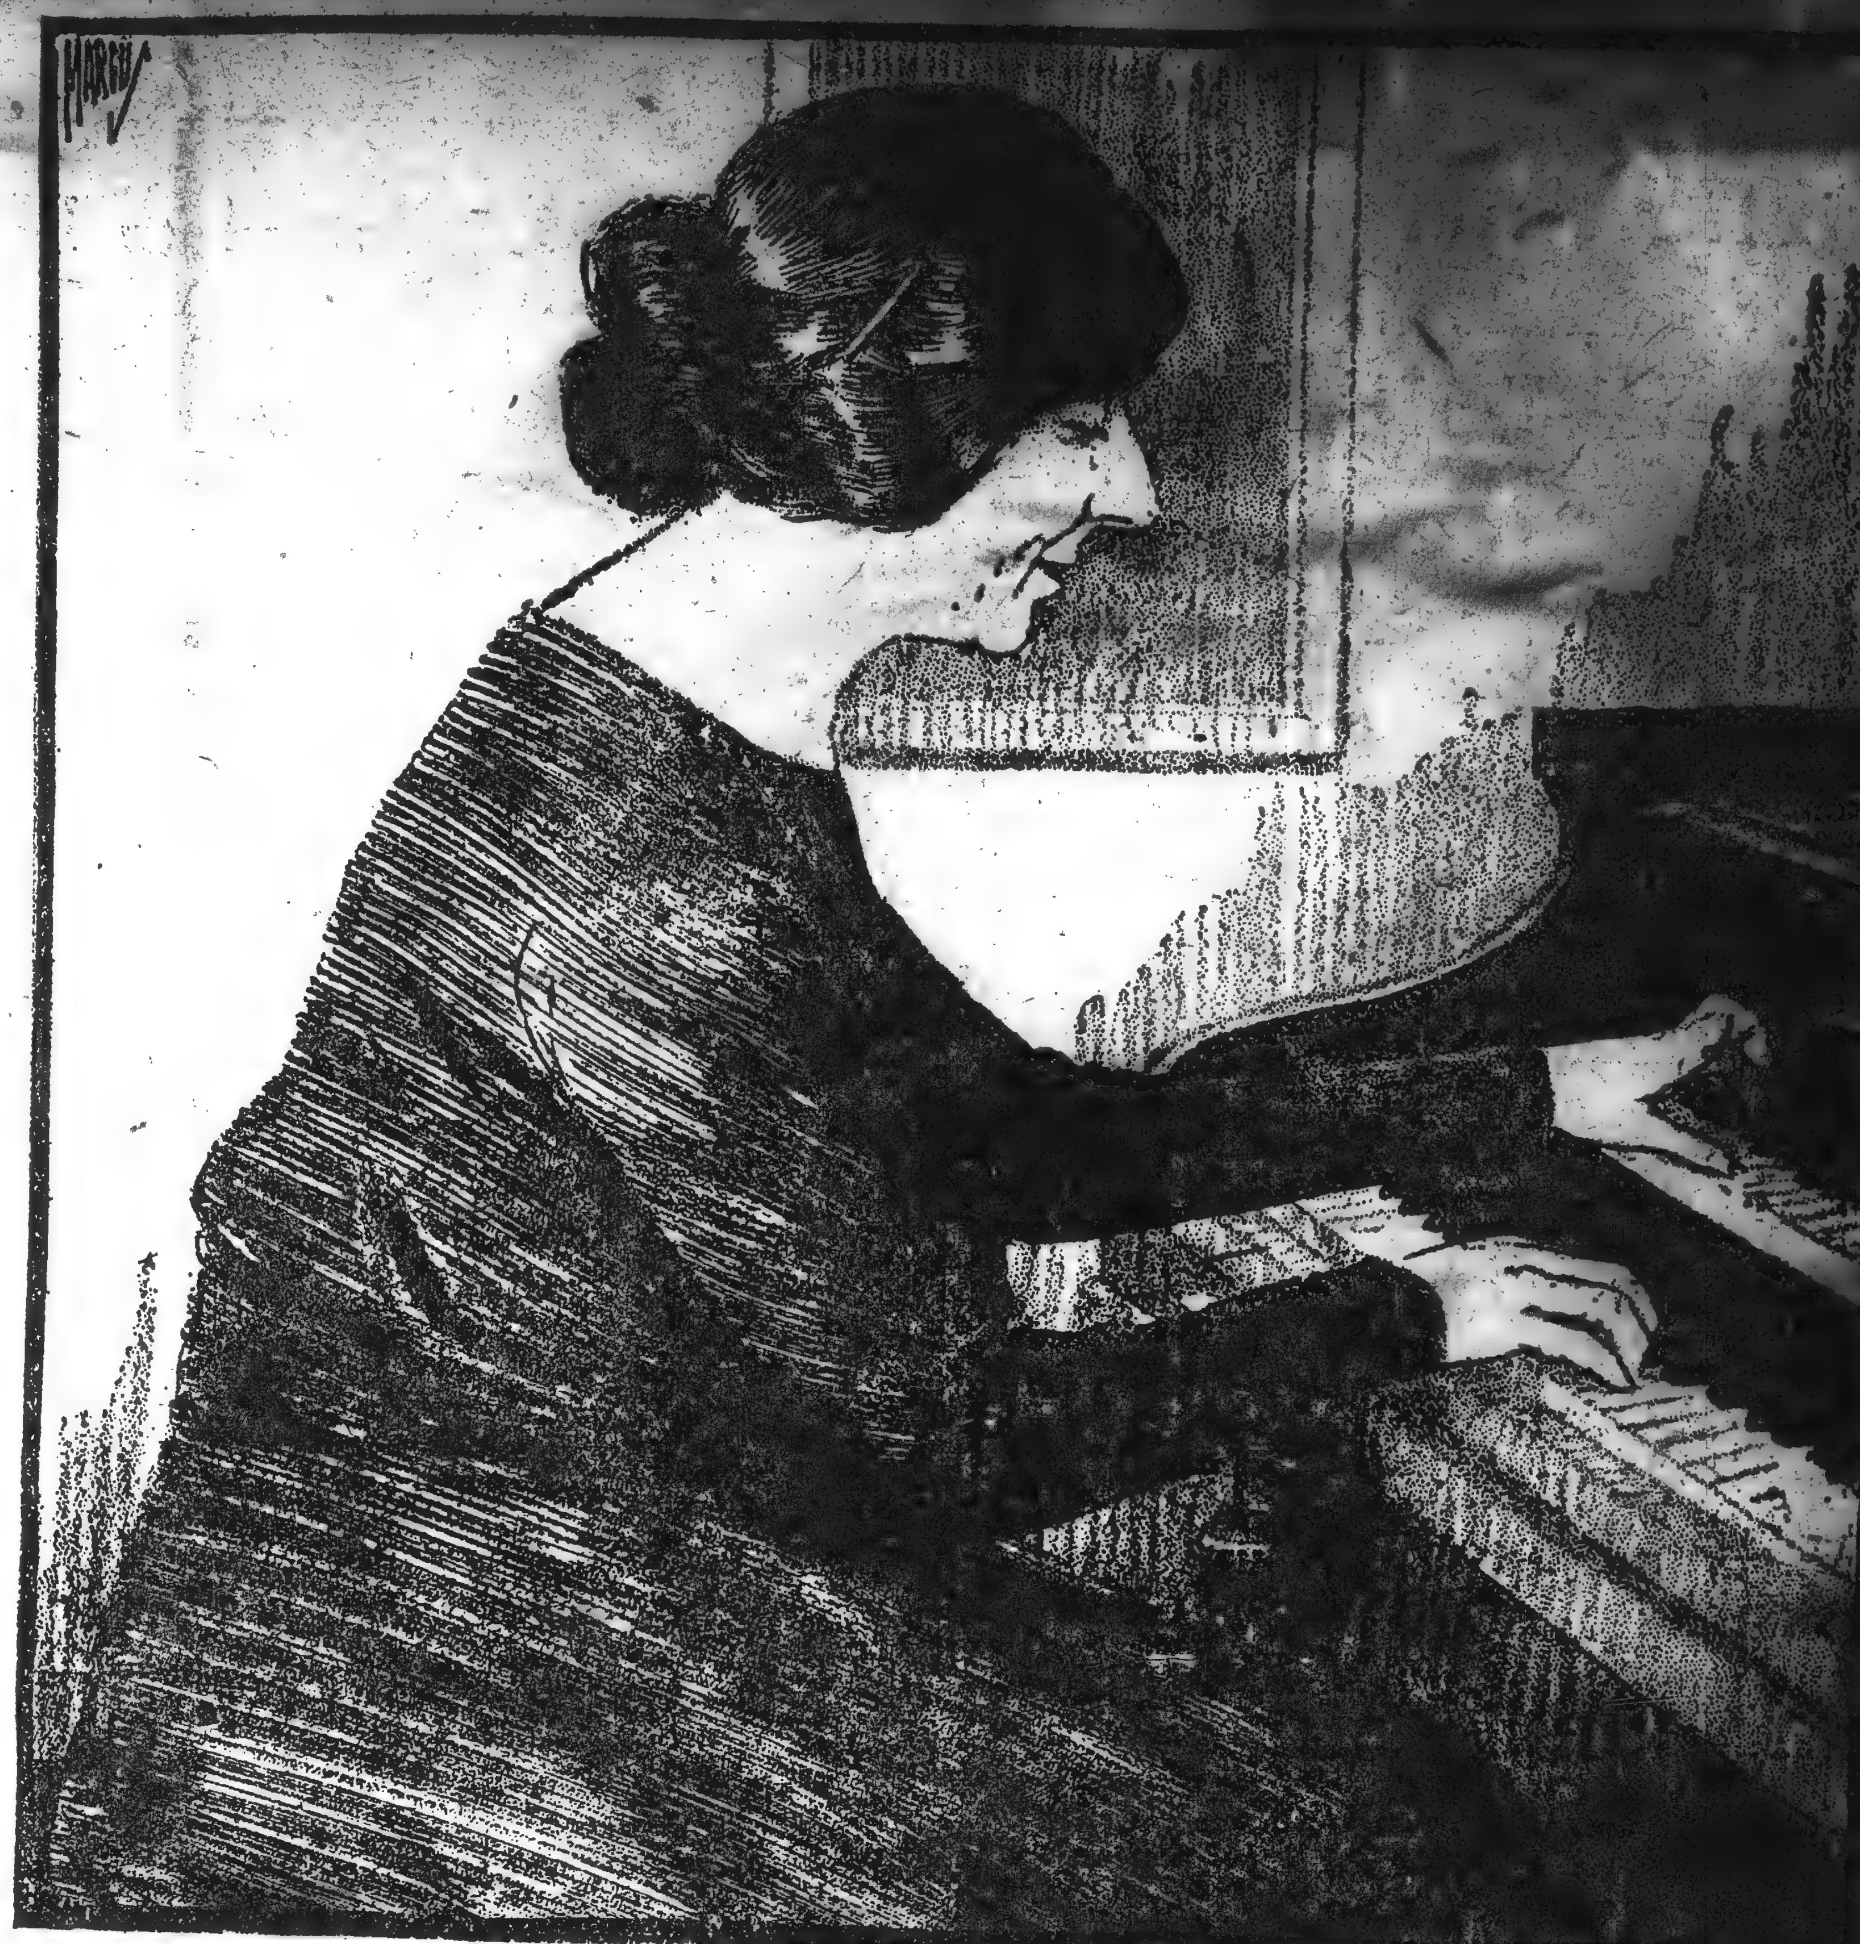
Adv Nov 24

OVATIONS FOR SYMPHONY MEN

This week's Symphony program is one of the best of the season. At the matinee concert yesterday Pierre Monteux and the orchestra won ovations for their admirable interpretation of Mahler's D major symphony, presented for the first time in this city, and of Vaughan Williams' delightful fantasia for stringed orchestra, built upon an old theme by Thomas Tallis.

Mahler's symphony proved entertaining; on the whole, good, straight, old-style music. Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite, a charming work, worthy of comparison in its way with the more famous Debussy score on the same subject, and Borodin's brilliant Polovtsian dances from the opera "Prince Igor," are the other features of the program, which will be given again tonight.

Modern Voice to Ancient Instrument



(From the Drawing by Marcus in The New York Times)

Wanda Landowska

Mistress of the Harpsichord and of the Elder Music

Long Familiar Virtuosa in Europe, Now Newly Come to America

Adv Nov

Landowska First Star at Monday Symphony

WANDA LANDOWSKA, the famous harpsichordist, making her first tour of America, will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall on December 3, January 14, Ferbuary 4, March 10 and April 7. Madame Landowska will be heard in Handel's concerto for the harpsichord in B flat major.

Pierre Monteaux will open the first concert with Schubert's symphony in C major. Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," will also be played.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Harold Bauer will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts, Dec. 7 and 8. He will appear with the orchestra in the Brahms concerto in D flat. Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture, Paine's prelude to "Oedipus," Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances are the other numbers.

HAYES CONCERT

Roland Hayes, the negro tenor who recently appeared as Symphony solist, will give a concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday with a program of German, and [156]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Yale Nove 27

PIERRE MONTEUX

Who will conduct the Boston Symphony in Woolsey Hall To-night at 8:15.

Boston Symphony to Give Concert in Woolsey Hall.

(Continued from page 1)

The appearance of Mr. Bruce Simonds will also be of special interest to Yale men. He graduated from the University in 1917, is a pianist of rare ability, and is at present an instructor in the School of Music. While in the University, he greatly distinguished himself. Even though he was carrying full courses both in the College and the School of Music at the same time, his work was of such quality that he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. In 1917 he was also awarded the Samuel S. Sanford fellowship which gave him the opportunity of carrying on his work in Europe for two years. He did not, however, go abroad until 1919, but studied music in New York under Harold Bauer and taught at Mannis Musical School. Later he toured New England playing for the benefit of the Red Cross. In 1919 he resumed his studies, going to Paris where he studied under Vincent D'Indy and later under T. Matthey in London, where he was awarded the Chappell medal for excellence as a pianist. Since then he was appointed to the Yale School of Music where he is now teaching the History of Music.

Wallingford, London (England), Milford, Toledo, and Scranton, which has 61. The fifty-or-more group is represented by Bristol and Yonkers, with 59 each, and Atlanta, Middletown, Omaha, Stratford, New Orleans, Brookline (Mass.), Auburn, New Rochelle and Dallas, in order of numbers.

Orange, Naugatuck, and Wilmington head the group of cities which have between 25 and 50 Yale Alumni. The others are in order: Mount Vernon, Harrisburgh, Jersey City, Shanghai (China), Wilkes-Barre, Branford, Northampton, Erie, Schenectady, Danbury, Nashville, Salt Lake City, Grand Rapids, Norwalk, Torrington, Peking, Portland (Me.), Princeton, Duluth, Holyoke, Youngston (Ohio), Elizabeth, Pittsfield, South Orange, Tacoma, Des Moines, Fairfield (Conn.), South Norwalk, Troy, Utica, Madison, Colorado Springs, Savannah, Binghamton, Poughkeepsie, Manila, and Spokane.

Monteux, Symphony Conductor, Will Not State Favorite Composer, For Fear of Unfairne

Ah non, monsieur, I would not like to say which are my favorite composers, because that would be unfair to certain excellent musicians," said Pierre Monteux, the smiling leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the intermission at the Woolsey Hall concert last night. The stocky conductor, who symbolizes continent energy, was chatting in rapid and expressive French with Bruce Simonds, the pianist, about the appreciative enthusiasm of the audience.

"My impressions? I would rather have you write up your impressions of me," was the good-natured reply of Mr. Monteux when first approached. "I never give my opinion," he said, "as to who are the greatest composers, except to say that I do not care in the least for the cheap compositions." "No, just because I am French I do not necessarily favor the work of compatriots."

The relative merit of present-day dan music then came under discussion. Th sparkling eyes of the director showed utter lack of comprehension when asked if he liked Paul Whiteman's orchestrations. "Who is he? What sort of things does he play? I must confess my ignorance of this 'jazz.'" Evidently M. Monteux is chiefly concerned with music of a higher plane.

After a slight silence, he inquired why we did not question him about the Yale-Harvard game. Even while giving a difficult program, the great conductor could relax and speak with gracious ease on sporting events. "Oui, I am happy that Yale won—they should win once in a while."

(Continued on page 4)

Eve Mail Nov 30

EVENTS IN MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux led in Carnegie Hall last evening the first New York concert of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That orchestra as it exists today is as much the creation of Mr. Monteux as the older Boston Symphony was the creation of Wilhelm Gericke.

Though other conductors have presided over the Boston Symphony with distinction, notably Arthur Nikisch in its earlier days and Karl Muck in its later, the orchestra which Mr. Monteux was called to lead in October, 1919, was still essentially the orchestra that Herr Gericke had astutely assembled and then trained to primacy among the orchestras of the world.

There came the peril of shipwreck, averted mainly through courage and firmness of Mr. Monteux and the loyal devotion of old members of the orchestra. The present orchestra, which is worthy of all that the words Boston Symphony have meant during so many years, is a monument to the intelligent and untiring labor of Pierre Monteux.

In losing him as conductor Boston will lose a sincere and unaffected musician. Mr. Monteux is not a spectacular leader; he does not indulge in posing and posturing; he does not sacrifice to the idle hunters after sensation; he is no prima donna of the baton.

He has been known as a specialist in ultramodern music; some of the most important modern scores, among them Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," were played first under his direction. But he is thoroughly at home in the classics. Indeed, his attitude to the older classics is not without its touch of the "purism" traditional with French musicians.

Altogether, few conductors in any land are so satisfactory in music of various periods and schools as Pierre Monteux. Doubtless, being, human, he has his preferences and even his prejudices, but rarely, if ever, does the listener at his concerts detect them disagreeably.

He is a conductor of board sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programmes of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian double-bass player, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences; and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he "feels" it, without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics, or expression.

Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joy-ride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew.

The programme last evening began with persuasive exposition of the E minor symphony of Sibelius, a composer who always seems to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms's variations on the "Chorale St. Antoni" of Haydn and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera "Salome."

In the former work the sheer tonal beauty and the technical virtuosity of the orchestra found large scope. As for Salome's dance, tearing it from its context was more than justified by the splendor of the result. Never can that Asiatic page have been more gorgeously set forth, in part because of the surpassing sensuousness of the Boston strings.

The soloist of this concert was Sigrid Onegin. If Adriano's scena from "Rienzi" lies a trifle high for her noble contralto, she was heard with keen pleasure in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" (sung simply, without shrieking) and "Der Erlkoenig." The orchestral accompaniment to both songs was discreet and effective.

The large audience was one of the most enthusiastic of the present season.

symphony concert in the high ton tradition.

P. S.

RUTH ROSENSWEIG

Yale Nov 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY GI CONCERT UNDER MO

Program of Famous O Very Well Received b Enthusiastic Audien

SIMONDS HAS MANY ENC

Faculty Member Praises Playing known Pianist as Excellent— Conducts Orchestra With Brilliance.

The concert of the Boston Sym chestra was well received by a l ence in Woolsey Hall last night. Simonds, the soloist of the evenin called five times by his enthusias "If John the Baptist's head had in convenient reach, Mr. Monte have had it," says a Faculty commenting on the brilliant wo French conductor.

His comment on the concert fol

With the kind assistance of Symphony Orchestra, the Univ brated last night by hearing a her Faculty as soloist and a sy an honorary graduate of 1914. tra did ample justice to one of programs of many years. The Smetana's "Prodana Nexesta" the concert opened, is a gay pie there was one, and one of the most reliable favorites. The Si phony, which was next on th could hardly be called gay. Eve movement which is evidently t idea of a joke, is a rather sav though it certainly is humorous. a big compelling piece of music, intensity and sincerity one does the southern lightness of touch. a great deal of pathos in it, and s dy but no morbidness or unhealth interminable dominant in the f ment—the throbbing of the basse nale—the sad little song that begi position—even the touching bea slow movement—these all make o Finland must be an unhappy pla but it cannot be denied that it pr sic quite unlike anything else on e does greatly enrich our musical with its full harmonies and inher ties.

Mr. Simonds was greeted by th with well merited and obviously s thusiasm. It is indeed a rare p have such a pianist among us. A pupil of D'Indy, it was most fittin should play the Symphonic Var Cesar Franck, who was D'Indy' The variations like all the work Franck, have a fine scholarly bal refreshing in an age that too o art to the winds as outworn rub serves raw emotion. It is great this of Franck's—but it is a co l that needs familiarity for complete appreciation, and, more's the pity, we get too few opportunities to become familiar with it.

The Seven Scarfs from Salome brought the evening to an exciting and bloody close. It is not easy to tell one scarf from the next nor to know what all the fabulous monsters —Heckelphones and xylophones, double-bassoons, tom-toms, harmoniums castenets and Glockenspiels—are about (most of the were not there, by the way) but ther no possible doubt about the effect pro within If John the Baptist's head had bee convenient reach, Mr. Monteux should have had it.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT IN WOOLSEY HAL

Noted Orchestra, on Final To Under Pierre Monteux, Plays To-night at 8:15.

BRUCE SIMONDS SOLOIST.

Dean Smith Says Concert is "Perhaps t Most Important of a Season Rich Wi Concerts of the First Order"—Prai Simonds as Pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra w give its annual New Haven concert, und the auspices of the Univeresity School Music, in Woolsey Hall to-night at 8:1 This orchestra, which has won internatio fame, will be conducted by Pierre Monteu one of the greatest of French conductors who is completing his fifth and last season as its leader. Mr. Bruce Simonds, 1917, well known pianist, and instructor in the School of Music, will appear as a solois at the concert.

To-night's concert will be the first on a week's tour which will include an appearance in Montclair, New Jersey, and which will terminate with one concert in Brooklyn and two in New York City.

Dean Smith of the Music School comments as follows:

"Perhaps the most important concert o a season rich with concerts of the first order is the one to be given this evening i Woolsey Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prestige of this organizatio is very great. No other orchestra in the country seems to equal it in the care wit which the programs are prepared.

"Of especial interest to Yale men and matter of especial pride is the appearanc of Mr. Bruce Simonds, instructor in t School of Music, as assisting artist in t concert. As is well known to the men his classes, Mr. Simonds is a pianist of e ceptional ability and inspiration. The pro gram this evening is of great interest an departs from the ordinary routine of Symphony concerts.

"It is hoped that there will be a larg representation of undergraduates at th concert. The opportunity is unusual. would be gratifying if the visit of the distinguished musicians might be treate with the cordiality that is to be expecte of Yale men."

To-night's program will include the Symphony of Sibelius in E minor, No. 1, t overture to Prudana Nevesta, The Barter Bride, by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance the Seven Veils from his Music Dram Salome. Bruce Simonds, as soloist, will pla with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphon Variations.

Pierre Monteux will return to France the spring. Accordingly this will be one the last opportunities to see him in th country.

(Continued on page 5)

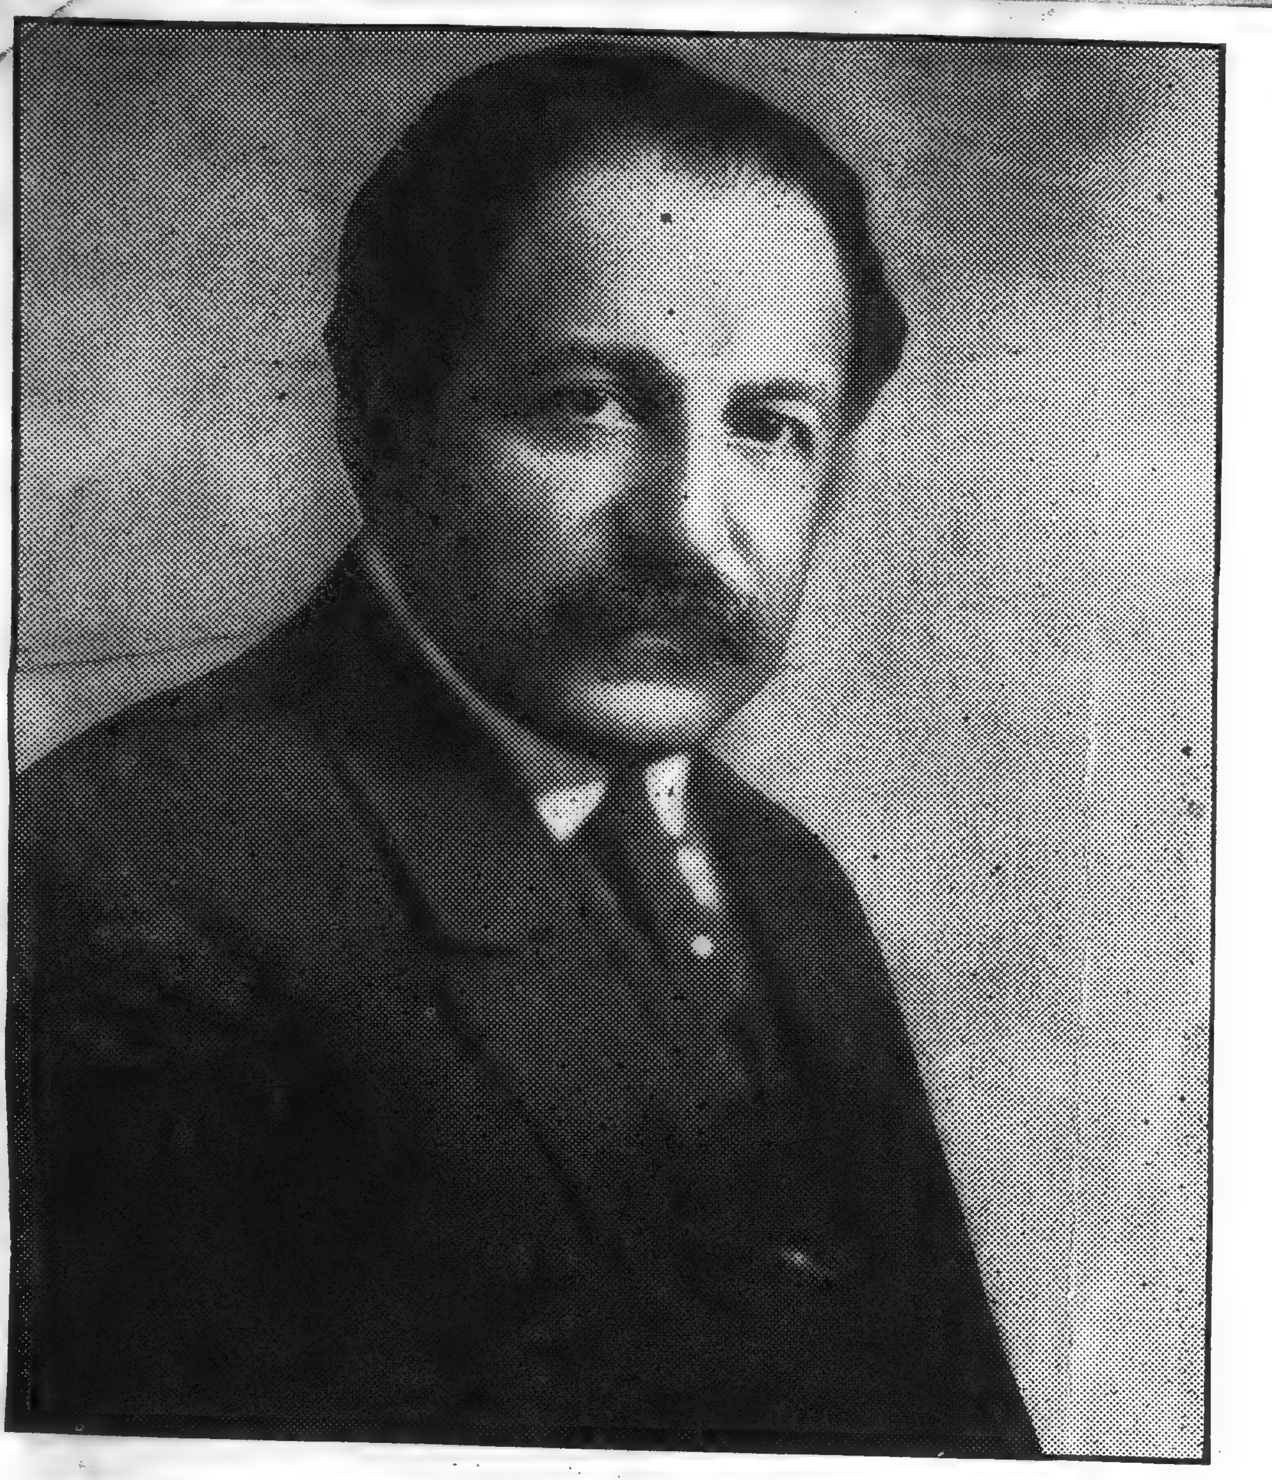
[157]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Yale Nov 27



PIERRE MONTEUX
Who will conduct the Boston Symphony in Woolsey Hall
To-night at 8:15.

Boston Symphony to Give Concert in Woolsey Hall.

(Continued from page 1)

The appearance of Mr. Bruce Simonds will also be of special interest to Yale men. He graduated from the University in 1917, is a pianist of rare ability, and is at present an instructor in the School of Music. While in the University, he greatly distinguished himself. Even though he was carrying full courses both in the College and the School of Music at the same time, his work was of such quality that he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. In 1917 he was also awarded the Samuel S. Sanford fellowship which gave him the opportunity of carrying on his work in Europe for two years. He did not, however, go abroad until 1919, but studied music in New York under Harold Bauer and taught at Mannis Musical School. Later he toured New England playing for the benefit of the Red Cross. In 1919 he resumed his studies, going to Paris where he studied under Vincent D'Indy and later under T. Matthey in London, where he was awarded the Chappell medal for excellence as a pianist. Since then he was appointed to the Yale School of Music where he is now teaching the History of Music.

Wallingford, London (England), Milford, Toledo, and Scranton, which has 61. The fifty-or-more group is represented by Bristol and Yonkers, with 59 each, and Atlanta, Middletown, Omaha, Stratford, New Orleans, Brookline (Mass.), Auburn, New Rochelle and Dallas, in order of numbers.

Orange, Naugatuck, and Wilmington head the group of cities which have between 25 and 50 Yale Alumni. The others are in order: Mount Vernon, Harrisburgh, Jersey City, Shanghai (China), Wilkes-Barre, Branford, Northampton, Erie, Schenectady, Danbury, Nashville, Salt Lake City, Grand Rapids, Norwalk, Torrington, Peking, Portland (Me.), Princeton, Duluth, Holyoke, Youngston (Ohio), Elizabeth, Pittsfield, South Orange, Tacoma, Des Moines, Fairfield (Conn.), South Norwalk, Troy, Utica, Madison, Colorado Springs, Savannah, Binghamton, Poughkeepsie, Manila, and Spokane.

Monteux, Symphony Conductor, Will Not State Favorite Composer, For Fear of Unfairne

Ah non, monsieur, I would not like to say which are my favorite composers, because that would be unfair to certain excellent musicians," said Pierre Monteux, the smiling leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the intermission at the Woolsey Hall concert last night. The stocky conductor, who symbolizes continent energy, was chatting in rapid and expressive French with Bruce Simonds, the pianist, about the appreciative enthusiasm of the audience.

"My impressions? I would rather have you write up your impressions of me," was the good-natured reply of Mr. Monteux when first approached. "I never give my opinion," he said, "as to who are the greatest composers, except to say that I do not care in the least for the cheap compositions." "No, just because I am French I do not necessarily favor the work of compatriots."

The relative merit of present-day da music then came under discussion. Th sparkling eyes of the director showed utter lack of comprehension when asked if he liked Paul Whiteman's orchestrations. "Who is he? What sort of things does he play? I must confess my ignorance of this 'jazz.'" Evidently M. Monteux is chiefly concerned with music of a higher plane.

After a slight silence, he inquired why we did not question him about the Yale-Harvard game. Even while giving a difficult program, the great conductor could relax and speak with gracious ease on sporting events. "Oui, I am happy that Yale won —they should win once in a while."

(Continued on page 4)

Eve Mail Nov 30

EVENTS IN MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux led in Carnegie Hall last evening the first New York concert of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That orchestra as it exists today is as much the creation of Mr. Monteux as the older Boston Symphony was the creation of Wilhelm Gericke.

Though other conductors have presided over the Boston Symphony with distinction, notably Arthur Nikisch in its earlier days and Karl Muck in its later, the orchestra which Mr. Monteux was called to lead in October, 1919, was still essentially the orchestra that Herr Gericke had astutely assembled and then trained to primacy among the orchestras of the world.

There came the peril of shipwreck, averted mainly through courage and firmness of Mr. Monteux and the loyal devotion of old members of the orchestra. The present orchestra, which is worthy of all that the words Boston Symphony have meant during so many years, is a monument to the intelligent and untiring labor of Pierre Monteux.

In losing him as conductor Boston will lose a sincere and unaffected musician. Mr. Monteux is not a spectacular leader; he does not indulge in posing and posturing; he does not sacrifice to the idle hunters after sensation; he is no prima donna of the baton.

He has been known as a specialist in ultramodern music; some of the most important modern scores, among them Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," were played first under his direction. But he is thoroughly at home in the classics. Indeed, his attitude to the older classics is not without its touch of the "purism" traditional with French musicians.

Altogether, few conductors in any land are so satisfactory in music of various periods and schools as Pierre Monteux. Doubtless, being human, he has his preferences and even his prejudices, but rarely, if ever, does the listener at his concerts detect them disagreeably.

He is a conductor of board sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programmes of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian double-bass player, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences; and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he "feels" it, without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics, or expression.

Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joy-ride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew.

The programme last evening began with persuasive exposition of the E minor symphony of Sibelius, a composer who always seems to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms's variations on the "Chorale St. Antoni" of Haydn and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera "Salome."

In the former work the sheer tonal beauty and the technical virtuosity of the orchestra found large scope. As for Salome's dance, tearing it from its context was more than justified by the splendor of the result. Never can that Asiatic page have been more gorgeously set forth, in part because of the surpassing sensuousness of the Boston strings.

The soloist of this concert was Sigrid Onegin. If Adriano's scena from "Rienzi" lies a trifle high for her noble contralto, she was heard with keen pleasure in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" (sung simply, without shrieking) and "Der Erlkoenig." he orchestral accompaniment to oth songs was discreet and effective.

The large audience was one of e most enthusiastic of the present season.

symphony concert in the high ton tradition.

P. S.

RUTH ROSENSWEIG

Yale Nov 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT UNDER MONTEUX

Program of Famous Orchestra Very Well Received by an Enthusiastic Audience.

SIMONDS HAS MANY ENCORES.

Faculty Member Praises Playing of Well-known Pianist as Excellent—Monteux Conducts Orchestra With Fire and Brilliance.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was well received by a large audience in Woolsey Hall last night. Mr. Bruce Simonds, the soloist of the evening was recalled five times by his enthusiastic hearers. "If John the Baptist's head had been within convenient reach, Mr. Monteux should have had it," says a Faculty member in commenting on the brilliant work of the French conductor.

His comment on the concert follows:

With the kind assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the University celebrated last night by hearing a member of her Faculty as soloist and a symphony of an honorary graduate of 1914. The orchestra did ample justice to one of the finest programs of many years. The overture to Smetana's "Prodana Nexesta" with which the concert opened, is a gay piece if ever there was one, and one of the orchestra's most reliable favorites. The Sibelius symphony, which was next on the program could hardly be called gay. Even the third movement which is evidently the Finnish idea of a joke, is a rather savage affair though it certainly is humorous. But it is a big compelling piece of music, and in its intensity and sincerity one does not miss the southern lightness of touch. There is a great deal of pathos in it, and some tragedy but no morbidness or unhealthiness. The interminable dominant in the first movement—the throbbing of the basses in the finale—the sad little song that begins the composition—even the touching beauty of the slow movement—these all make one feel that Finland must be an unhappy place to live but it cannot be denied that it produces music quite unlike anything else on earth which does greatly enrich our musical inheritance with its full harmonies and inherent subtleties.

Mr. Simonds was greeted by the audience with well merited and obviously sincere enthusiasm. It is indeed a rare privilege to have such a pianist among us. As he is a pupil of D'Indy, it was most fitting that he should play the Symphonic Variations of Cesar Franck, who was D'Indy's teacher. The variations, like all the work of Cesar Franck, have a fine scholarly balance most refreshing in an age that too often casts art to the winds as outworn rubbish and serves raw emotion. It is great music—this of Franck's—but it is a cool greatness that needs familiarity for complete appreciation, and, more's the pity, we get too few opportunities to become familiar with it.

The Seven Scarfs from Salome brought the evening to an exciting and bloody close. It is not easy to tell one scarf from the next nor to know what all the fabulous monsters—Heckelphones and xylophones, double-bassoons, tom-toms, harmoniums castenets and Glockenspiels—are about (most of them were not there, by the way) but there's no possible doubt about the effect produced. If John the Baptist's head had been within convenient reach, Mr. Monteux should have had it.

---

g Editor

ssen, '24S.
'24S.
nager

'26
'26
'26

6
r., '26
26

'25
26

e senti-

y has tically,
ctually,
o come fact.
l team arvard ams in iose in sports,
e Uni-spring

elebra-onfire, sibility suggeshat the ed over reward action coming a paring apaduates spend should ur hour or them gnified.
ngs ac-be betniversity day and al jinxes ertime in ns, comes nd knowlon a new rcollegiate

NY TO GIVE OOLSEY HALL

, on Final Tou
Monteux, Plays
nt at 8:15.

MONDS SOLOIST.

Concert is "Perhaps th of a Season Rich Wi e First Order"—Prai ist.

mphony Orchestra
w Haven concert, unde
e Univeresity School
Hall to-night at 8:15
ch has won internationa
cted by Pierre Monteux of French conductors,
is fifth and last season,
Bruce Simonds, 1917,
and instructor in the ill appear as a soloist will be the first on a will include an appea-

New Jersey, and which one concert in Brook-York City.
he Music School com-

st important concert o concerts of the first or e given this evening in e Boston Symphony Or ige of this organization other orchestra in th
qual it in the care wit
s are prepared.
erest to Yale men and pride is the appearanc monds, instructor in th
as assisting artist in th ll known to the men monds is a pianist of e d inspiration. The pro is of great interest an rdinary routine of Sym

there will be a larg undergraduates at th
rtunity is unusual.
g if the visit of the ians might be treate that is to be expecte am will include the Sym in E minor, No. 1, th

a Nevesta, The Barter and Strauss's Dance om his Music Dram
nds, as soloist, will pl
in Franck's Symphon ill return to France gly this will be one to see him in t n page 5)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Yale Nov 27

PIERRE MONTEUX

Who will conduct the Boston Symphony in Woolsey Hall To-night at 8:15.

Boston Symphony to Give Concert in Woolsey Hall.

(Continued from page 1)

The appearance of Mr. Bruce Simonds will also be of special interest to Yale men. He graduated from the University in 1917, is a pianist of rare ability, and is at present an instructor in the School of Music. While in the University, he greatly distinguished himself. Even though he was carrying full courses both in the College and the School of Music at the same time, his work was of such quality that he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. In 1917 he was also awarded the Samuel S. Sanford fellowship which gave him the opportunity of carrying on his work in Europe for two years. He did not, however, go abroad until 1919, but studied music in New York under Harold Bauer and taught at Mannis Musical School. Later he toured New England playing for the benefit of the Red Cross. In 1919 he resumed his studies, going to Paris where he studied under Vincent D'Indy and later under T. Matthey in London, where he was awarded the Chappell medal for excellence as a pianist. Since then he was appointed to the Yale School of Music where he is now teaching the History of Music.

Wallingford, London (England), Milford, Toledo, and Scranton, which has 61. The fifty-or-more group is represented by Bristol and Yonkers, with 59 each, and Atlanta, Middletown, Omaha, Stratford, New Orleans, Brookline (Mass.), Auburn, New Rochelle and Dallas, in order of numbers.

Orange, Naugatuck, and Wilmington head the group of cities which have between 25 and 50 Yale Alumni. The others are in order: Mount Vernon, Harrisburgh, Jersey City, Shanghai (China), Wilkes-Barre, Branford, Northampton, Erie, Schenectady, Danbury, Nashville, Salt Lake City, Grand Rapids, Norwalk, Torrington, Peking, Portland (Me.), Princeton, Duluth, Holyoke, Youngston (Ohio), Elizabeth, Pittsfield, South Orange, Tacoma, Des Moines, Fairfield (Conn.), South Norwalk, Troy, Utica, Madison, Colorado Springs, Savannah, Binghamton, Poughkeepsie, Manila, and Spokane.

Monteux, Symphony Conductor, Will Not State Favorite Composer, For Fear of Unfairne

Ah non, monsieur, I would not like to say which are my favorite composers, because that would be unfair to certain excellent musicians," said Pierre Monteux, the smiling leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the intermission at the Woolsey Hall concert last night. The stocky conductor, who symbolizes continent energy, was chatting in rapid and expressive French with Bruce Simonds, the pianist, about the appreciative enthusiasm of the audience.

"My impressions? I would rather have you write up your impressions of me," was the good-natured reply of Mr. Monteux when first approached. "I never give my opinion," he said, "as to who are the greatest composers, except to say that I do not care in the least for the cheap compositions." "No, just because I am French I do not necessarily favor the work of compatriots."

The relative merit of present-day dan music then came under discussion. Th sparkling eyes of the director showed utter lack of comprehension when asked if he liked Paul Whiteman's orchestrations. "Who is he? What sort of things does he play? I must confess my ignorance of this 'jazz.'" Evidently M. Monteux is chiefly concerned with music of a higher plane.

After a slight silence, he inquired why we did not question him about the Yale-Harvard game. Even while giving a difficult program, the great conductor could relax and speak with gracious ease on sporting events. "Oui, I am happy that Yale won—they should win once in a while."

(Continued on page 4)

Eve Mail Nov 30

EVENTS IN MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux led in Carnegie Hall last evening the first New York concert of his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That orchestra as it exists today is as much the creation of Mr. Monteux as the older Boston Symphony was the creation of Wilhelm Gericke.

Though other conductors have presided over the Boston Symphony with distinction, notably Arthur Nikisch in its earlier days and Karl Muck in its later, the orchestra which Mr. Monteux was called to lead in October, 1919, was still essentially the orchestra that Herr Gericke had astutely assembled and then trained to primacy among the orchestras of the world.

There came the peril of shipwreck, averted mainly through courage and firmness of Mr. Monteux and the loyal devotion of old members of the orchestra. The present orchestra, which is worthy of all that the words Boston Symphony have meant during so many years, is a monument to the intelligent and untiring labor of Pierre Monteux.

In losing him as conductor Boston will lose a sincere and unaffected musician. Mr. Monteux is not a spectacular leader; he does not indulge in posing and posturing; he does not sacrifice to the idle hunters after sensation; he is no prima donna of the baton.

He has been known as a specialist in ultramodern music; some of the most important modern scores, among them Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," were played first under his direction. But he is thoroughly at home in the classics. Indeed, his attitude to the older classics is not without its touch of the "purism" traditional with French musicians.

Altogether, few conductors in any land are so satisfactory in music of various periods and schools as Pierre Monteux. Doubtless, being, human, he has his preferences and even his prejudices, but rarely, if ever, does the listener at his concerts detect them disagreeably.

He is a conductor of board sympathies, as well as of a ruthless artistic conscience. Perhaps no other of the principal symphonic conductors now in America has consistently provided programmes of such stimulating selection and such admirable variety.

Sergei Kussewitzky, the Russian double-bass player, who will succeed Mr. Monteux next season, is quite another story. As an orchestral conductor he is an unashamed sensationalist, relying greatly on the hypnotic influence he exercises over audiences; and his habit has been to conduct a composition as he "feels" it, without subjecting his vagrant fancy to the cramping limitations of the composer's expressed wishes regarding pace, dynamics, or expression.

Doubtless American audiences will revel in many a joy-ride behind this wild Mazeppa of the steppes. But it seems highly probable that within a few years another conductor of the artistic stamp of Gericke and Muck and Monteux will come along and gather up the fragments of the Boston band and piece them together anew.

The programme last evening began with persuasive exposition of the E minor symphony of Sibelius, a composer who always seems to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms's variations on the "Chorale St. Antoni" of Haydn and the dance of Salome from Richard Strauss's opera "Salome."

In the former work the sheer tonal beauty and the technical virtuosity of the orchestra found large scope. As for Salome's dance, tearing it from its context was more than justified by the splendor of the result. Never can that Asiatic page have been more gorgeously set forth, in part because of the surpassing sensuousness of the Boston strings.

The soloist of this concert was Sigrid Onegin. If Adriano's scena from "Rienzi" lies a trifle high for her noble contralto, she was heard with keen pleasure in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" (sung simply, with ut shrieking) and "Der Erlkoenig." he orchestral accompaniment to oth songs was discreet and effec ive.

The large audience was one of e most enthusiastic of the pre t season.

symphony concert in the high ton tradition. P. S.

RUTH ROSENSWEIG

Yale Nov 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIV CONCERT UNDER MO

Program of Famous Or Very Well Received by Enthusiastic Audienc

SIMONDS HAS MANY ENC

Faculty Member Praises Playing known Pianist as Excellent— Conducts Orchestra With Brilliance.

The concert of the Boston Symp chestra was well received by a la ence in Woolsey Hall last night. Simonds, the soloist of the evenin called five times by his enthusiasti "If John the Baptist's head had b in convenient reach, Mr. Monteu have had it," says a Faculty m commenting on the brilliant wo French conductor.

His comment on the concert foll

With the kind assistance of th Symphony Orchestra, the Unive brated last night by hearing a m her Faculty as soloist and a syn an honorary graduate of 1914. T tra did ample justice to one of programs of many years. The o Smetana's "Prodana Nexesta" w the concert opened, is a gay piec there was one, and one of the most reliable favorites. The Sib phony, which was next on the could hardly be called gay. Even movement which is evidently th idea of a joke, is a rather sav though it certainly is humorous. a big compelling piece of music, intensity and sincerity one does the southern lightness of touch. a great deal of pathos in it, and s dy but no morbidness or unhealth interminable dominant in the fi ment—the throbbing of the basses nale—the sad little song that begin position—even the touching beau slow movement—these all make on Finland must be an unhappy pla but it cannot be denied that it pro sic quite unlike anything else on ea does greatly enrich our musical i with its full harmonies and inhere ties.

Mr. Simonds was greeted by the with well merited and obviously s thusiasm. It is indeed a rare pr have such a pianist among us. A pupil of D'Indy, it was most fittin should play the Symphonic Vari Cesar Franck who was D'Indy's The variations, like all the work Franck, have a fine scholarly bal refreshing in an age that too o art to the winds as outworn rub serves raw emotion. It is great this of Franck's—but it is a col that needs familiarity for complete appreciation, and, more's the pity, we get too few opportunities to become familiar with it.

The Seven Scarfs from Salome brought the evening to an exciting and bloody close. It is not easy to tell one scarf from the next nor to know what all the fabulous monsters—Heckelphones and xylophones, double-bassoons, tom-toms, harmoniums castenets and Glockenspiels—are about (most of the were not there, by the way) but there no possible doubt about the effect pro If John the Baptist's head had been within convenient reach, Mr. Monteux should have had it.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT IN WOOLSEY HALL

Noted Orchestra, on Final Tou Under Pierre Monteux, Plays To-night at 8:15.

BRUCE SIMONDS SOLOIST.

Dean Smith Says Concert is "Perhaps th Most Important of a Season Rich Wi Concerts of the First Order"—Prai Simonds as Pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wi give its annual New Haven concert, unde the auspices of the Univeresity School Music, in Woolsey Hall to-night at 8:15. This orchestra, which has won internationa fame, will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, one of the greatest of French conductors, who is completing his fifth and last season as its leader. Mr. Bruce Simonds, 1917, well known pianist, and instructor in the School of Music, will appear as a solois at [illegible]

To-night's concert will be the first on a week's tour which will include an appearance in Montclair, New Jersey, and which will terminate with one concert in Brook lyn and two in New York City.

Dean Smith of the Music School comments as follows:

"Perhaps the most important concert of a season rich with concerts of the first order is the one to be given this evening in Woolsey Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prestige of this organizati is very great. No other orchestra in th country seems to equal it in the care wit which the programs are prepared.

"Of especial interest to Yale men and matter of especial pride is the appearanc of Mr. Bruce Simonds, instructor in th School of Music as assisting artist in concert. As is well known to the men his classes, Mr. Simonds is a pianist of ex ceptional ability and inspiration. The pro gram this evening is of great interest departs from the [illegible] routine of Sym phony concerts.

"It is hoped that there will be a larg representation of [illegible] graduates at th concert. The [illegible] is unusual. would be gratifying [illegible] visit of the distinguished musicians [illegible] be treat with the cordiality that is to be expect of Yale men."

To-night's program will include the Sym phony of Sibelius in F minor, No. 1, th overture to Prodana Nevesta, The Barter Bride, by Smetana, and Strauss's Dance the Seven Veils from his Music Dra Salome. Bruce Simonds, as soloist, will pl with the Orchestra in Franck's Symphon Variations.

Pierre Monteux will return to France the spring. Accordingly this will be one the last opportunities to see him in t country.

(Continued on page 5)

[157]

Sun Nov 30

Boston Symphony in First Concert Here This Season

Sigrid Onegin as Soloist; 'Parsifal' in Holiday Return to Opera Repertory.

Thanksgiving Day and the Boston Symphony were both invented in New England. A synonymity is to be implied. There is cause enough for gratitude in the return to Carnegie Hall yesterday evening of the last of the orchestras which furnish New York with concerts at regular intervals. It was under holiday conditions then that that admirable program maker, Conductor Pierre Monteux, began his final season here in charge of the historic band.

Sibelius's first symphony, an early work in E-minor, started the night off. It is scarcely to be compared, of course, to the Finnish master's subsequent symphonies,—the second, notably,—of a so much darker and, more individual strength. Now and then there was more than hint in this First of what he would arrive at in after years, and the third movement, allegro, was immediately arresting. Yet it is mostly indecisive romance, the groping of a young but chilled Tschaikowsky.

At a later hour the orchestra was playing Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Hydn, fast becoming a familiar classicism hereabouts, and ended with Salome's Dance from the Strauss opera. All these works the orchestra played with that lust for tonal aggrandizement, bluntly occasionally, roughly won, which has come to be one of its recent characteristics. Mr. Monteux, for all his personal calmness, specializes on power, on solidity, on a masculinity of interpretation which has conferred new personality, for better or worse, upon his orchestra.

The evening had a vocal soloist in Mme, Sigrid Onegin, the Metropolitan mezzo, who sang the scena and aria of Adriano from Wagner's "Rienzi." We shall have the opera in its entirety soon, and it will be time enough then to judge of its interest for modern listeners. Again Mme. Onegin gave the two Schubert songs, "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig," with orchestral accompaniment. Her gloriously open voice is a robe of velvet over all she sings, no matter how prodigally and carelessly she flings it. She may wear it cruelly out in the process, but that's her business—and last night was the audience's pleasure

---

[illegible]

The First Boston Symphony Concert

There was a joyous sight for the faithful at Carnegie Hall last night.. the sight of a Boston Symphony audience that almost filled the visible portion of Carnegie Hall. It was the famous orchestra's first New York concert of the season. Mr. Monteux, its devoted and efficient conductor, was on hand, with an infrequently heard symphony of Sibelius—his first, in E minor—and with Mme. Onegin, the contralto of the sumptuous voice and the grand manner, as soloist in an aria from "Rienzi" ("Gerechter Gott") and two Schubert songs: "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig." The rest of the bill promised the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Salome's Dance from the opera of Richard Strauss.

It is delightful to welcome the great organization again to New York—for its concerts have been unjustly neglected in recent years. The orchestra played well last season; it plays better this: with beauty and nobility of tone, with splendid virility and élan, with plasticity and responsiveness. It is now an instrument of wide range and flexibility and finesse; and there is no doubt of its indebtedness to Mr. Monteux for this notable achievement.

They played the symphony of Sibelius—which is seldom heard hereabouts—with superb eloquence; and the work was worthy of that eloquence. This First Symphony of the Finnish master is characteristic, though it is almost a quarter of a century old, and is far from representing the Sibelius of today.

* * *

— one is familiar with the forbid

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL — Today at 3:30, Frieda Hempel, soprano. "Jenny Lind program," assisted by Conrad V. Bos, pianist: "Dedication," Schumann-Liszt; aria, "Schon lacht der holde Fruhling," Mozart; "Ave Maria" and "Auf dem Wasser zu Singen," Schubert; "Bei der Wiege" and "Jetzt kommt der Fruhling," Mendelssohn; Sonata in C major, Mozart; "Ombra leggiera" ("Shadow Song"), from "Dinorah," Meyerbeer; "Away, Away to the Mountain's Brow," Alexander Lee; "Fly Away, Pretty Moth," T. H. Bayly; "Bird Song," Taubert; "Home, Sweet Home," Bishop.

Tonight at 8:15 Roland Hayes, tenor, "Arietta," Paradisi; "When I am Laid in Earth," Purcell; "Would you Gain the Tender Creature," Handel; "Bist du Bei Mir," Bach; "Die Neugierige," "Die Forelle," Schubert; "Ich Hab Im Traum Geweinet," "Der Nussbaum," Schumann; "La Procession," Cesar Franck; "Claire de Lune," Gabriel Faure; No 7 from "Biblical Songs," Dvorak; "It Was a Lover and His Lass," Roger Quilter; Negro Spirituals: "Don't You Weep When I'm Gone," "Every Time I Feel the Spirit," "Sit Down," "The Crucifixion."

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, first Monday concert. Symphony in C major, Schubert; Concerto for harpsichord and orchestra, Handel; Sonata, Scarlatti; Gavotte, Bach; "Nuages" and "Fetes" from "Nocturnes." Debussy; "Roman Carnival," Berlioz. Soloist, Wanda Landowska, harpsichord.

Friday at 2:20, and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventh program. Overture to "Polyeucte," Dukas; Concerto No. 2, in B flat, Brahms; Prelude to "Oedipus Rex," Paine; introduction to act 3 of "Tristan und Isolde," Wagner; "Alborada del Gracioso," Ravel. Soloist, Harold Bauer

---

[illegible]

Boston Orchestra Gives Its Opening Matinee Concert

Mahler's First Symphony on the Program Conducted by Monteux.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was not advertised as a "grand matinee for the ladies and children." The ladies might resent the implication and Mr. Damrosch the insinuation that his symphony concerts for children were not his very own. But surely there was nothing in the entertainment to arouse dangerous passions or to tax homekeeping wits.

Gustave Mahler's first symphony, composed in Cassel in 1883-84, and in the cheerful key of D major, was the piece without resistance. After a brief intermission the audience listened to "Old Airs and Dances for the Lute," freely arranged by Signor Resphighi. The other numbers were Paul Dukas's "La Peri, Poeme Danse," and Smetana's jubilant overture to "The Sold Bride."

Resphighi's arrangement of a galliard by Gallilei, father of the famous astronomer, a villanella and a "passo mezzo e macherada," both of unknown composers, were very pleasant pieces of music, in which the riches of the modern orchestra were employed with color and sonority, but without destroying the archaic charm of the dances. Mahler's symphony made the same impression as it had at previous hearings. It was very, very pretty.

Mahler is preeminently the conductors' composer. They dote upon him. Mahler in his bucolic mood and Mahler in his metaphysical abstraction are quite different incarnations of the same genius. The music of the former might rock one to sleep. That of the latter puts one there. In either case we should be grateful. The Bostonians performed the D major symphony and the Resphighi music admirably and Mr. Monteux conducted both with fine skill.

Times Dec 2

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By H. C. COLLES.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was more calculated to show the qualities of the orchestra than was that of Thursday night. There is not much to be said of Mahler's first symphony, which began the concert, except that Respighi's delightful arrangements of old Italian dances and airs, Dukas's "La Peri-Poème Dansé" and Smetana's overture to "Peodana Nevesta" did all possible to make amends for the tedious three-quarters of an hour which the symphony imposed. Mahler affecting the beauty of simplicity is more wearisome than Mahler adopting the heavily intellectual pose, and this symphony is like an elaborate landscape painted by an artist who never leaves his studio.

Respighi, however, brought an altogether fresher atmosphere. He approaches the work of the part with understanding and sympathy, not with patronage. He does not dress up Vincenzo Galilei and the other sixteenth century composers to tickle modern ears with their quaintness, but he gives them just as much of new orchestral coloring as they need to show the freshness of their melodies and rhythms.

The glowing tone of the strings was specially remarkable in the gagliarda and, altogether, the performance was an admirable piece of work. With Dukas Pierre Monteaux seemed to be on his own ground. Its dance rhythms were played with perfect finish and the wayward charm of its French style was treated with the fullest sympathy. Smetana's overture, the title of which the program translated as "The Sold Bride," belongs to the first and most famous of Smetana's eight Czech operas. It is perhaps the most brilliant of comedy overtures since Mozart's "Figaro," with which it has something in common.

Like the overture to "Figaro" its brilliance depends mainly on the strings, and the playing of the strings, both in those electrifying sforzandos and in the rapid pianissimo passages, was magnificent. One must not forget to mention also the tone of the brass, which throughout the concert was splendidly resonant and never coarse. Indeed the playing of this group of works gave a very strong impression of the musical ensemble which the Boston Orchestra can achieve.

LANDOWSKA PLAYS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Harpsichord Used in Music of Bach and Handel

Wanda Landowska, the soloist at the first of the five extra Boston Symphony concerts last night, played music by Bach, Scarlatti and Handel on the harpischord, an instrument known to the 18th century musicians, instead of using the modern pianoforte, of which they never dreamt. Mme Landowska has mastered the technique of the old instrument, and gets from it far more varied and more brilliant technical effects than are possible if one plays the harpsichord as though it were merely an inferior sort of piano. Last night's large audience applauded her with enthusiasm.

Mr Monteux had chosen an especially fine program, which he and the orchestra performed brilliantly. Schubert's C major symphony, with what Schuman called its "heavenly length" somewhat curtailed by omission of repeats and cuts in the slow movement and finale, gave great pleasure. It was a pity that the problem of securing the necessary female chorus prevented the third of Debussy's "Nocturnes," entitled "Sirens," from being played with the other two last night. "Clouds" and "Festivals" again seemed finely wrought, vividly imagined music. The performance was eloquent and warmly applauded. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" lost none of its marked effectiveness at the hands of the orchestra last night.

Mme Landowska was heard in Handel's B-flat concerto, with a small orchestra. The hall is too big for such music to sound well in it, yet one could not but be impressed with the deftness of the performance.

She also played Handel's so-called "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations, in which she extorted from her instrument unsuspected sonorities; a Scarlatti sonata, where the skill with which she executed passages for crossed hands was astonishing; and a Bach gavotte. In all this music her sound musicianship and extraordinary technical proficiency, as it seemed to ears unused to good harpsichord playing, were both commendable and delightful. Yet a certain monotony of tone color became felt. One wondered how our ancestors endured so much music from so dull an instrument.

At the second Monday concert, Jan 14, Cecilia Hansen, violinist, will be the

---

[illegible]

Probably Mr. Monteux was not aware of the fact when he put John K. Paine's overture to "Oedipus Tyrannus" on the Symphony program of last Friday and Saturday that this was the 50th anniversary of Paine's active work at Harvard as a regular teacher.

is going to change the

Wanda Landowska, the famous harpsichordist, making her first tour of America, will play a Handel concert at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall, Dec 3.

◆◆◆◆◆

The Handel and Haydn Society, Emi

HARPSICHORDIST IS CONCERT FEATURE

Wanda Landowska Is Soloist; Symphony Hall Filled

By PHILIP HALE

The first extra concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. Mme. Wanda Landowska, harpischordist, was the soloist. The audience completely filled the hall.

The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, C major; Handel, Concerto, B flat major for harpischord; Debussy, Two Nocturnes—Clouds and Festivals. Harpischord solos: Handel, "The Harmonious Blacksmith"; Bach, Gavotte; Scarlatti, Sonata; Berlioz, Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

The orchestral pieces are familiar and require no description, but it may be said that Schubert's Symphony seems longer every time it is played. It is all very well to speak of its "heavenly length"; the endless repetitions lead one to wish that the symphony could be put into a duck-press and its essential beauty preserved in such a form that one might wish for more. The playing of the orchestra was fully up to its high standard.

Mme. Landowska's European reputation as a harpischordist crossed the Atlantic long ago. Since her arrival in this country she has played privately in Boston; last night she played here in public for the first time. Her passion for the odd instrument and for the music written for it in past centuries is revealed in her valuable and entertaining volumes of championship. This passion is not merely literary and theoretical. She is an accomplished virtuoso, a well-equipped musician.

The instrument employed by her last night was one of extra size, a harpsichord of the theatre. Mr. Monteux reduced his orchestra to six first violins and a proportionate number of other strings. There were two flutes and a bassoon. Handel's music thus made its effect, played in full understanding and finely phrased by Mme. Landowska to a sympathetic accompaniment. Her skill as a virtuoso was even more liberally displayed in the solo pieces. Scarlatti's Sonata was taken at an incredibly fast pace—Scarlatti himself amazed his hearers by the rapidity of his execution—but every note was distinct. The demoniacal gayety of the music was irresistible. Mme. Landowska was heartily applauded and recalled several times. The playing of the orchestral compositions was also warmly appreciated.

At the second extra concert, Monday evening, Jan. 15, Cecilia Hansen, violinist, will be the soloist.

Post Dec 4.

SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERT

Mme. Landowska Soloist With Harpsichord Novelty

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of a series of five Monday evening concerts last night at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted an interesting programme, which offered for novelty music for the harpsichord. Madame Wanda Landowska was the soloist, playing a Concerto in B-flat for Harpsichord and Orchestra, by Handel, and for further novelty a group of solo pieces for the instrument.

CAPACITY AUDIENCE

The audience was very large, it being difficult to discover an empty seat. What further proof is needed that M. Monteux and the Orchestra have re-established the orchestra on its old standards, and restored it to its former popularity? For this is an audience which comes to concerts primarily to listen to good music, not because mere-

---

Tertis Soloist at Symphony Concerts

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the soloist will be Lionel Tertis, English viola player, who will appear with the orchestra in the concerto written by York Bowen.

Pierre Monteaux will also present Mozart's "The Magic Flute" overture, Schumann's symphony in D minor and the "Ball at the Capulet's" music from Berlioz's romantic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

TWO PERFORMANCES

[158]

Prov Bulletin Dec 4

LEGINSKA, who will appear as piano soloist at the next concert, Dec. 11, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall.

Current Affairs Nov 26

Symphony Concerts On Monday Evenings

THE PROJECT of a series five symphony concerts on Mc day evenings by the regular Bost Symphony Orchestra under Pie Monteux, its conductor, w started two seasons ago. Th were two reasons for this ventu The regular series of twenty-fo Friday afternoon and twenty-fo Saturday evening Boston Sy phony Concerts had grown much in demand that seats were a premium. Whereas this long series had a particular appeal to patrons of considerable musical experience it seemed probable that there must be a large potential pub lic who would be glad of the oppo tunity to hear five symphon concerts through the season by on of the greatest symphony orches tras in the world and under one the most prominent conducto living. These concerts have th added attraction of a soloist interest at each, whether singe pianist, or violinist.

Anticipations were abundantl ealized in the quick response an he crowded patronage which the ave since had; indeed, this serie bids fair to become a permanen part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule. They hav n added musical importance i hat the programs chosen by M Monteux offer no duplications from

Trans Dec 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

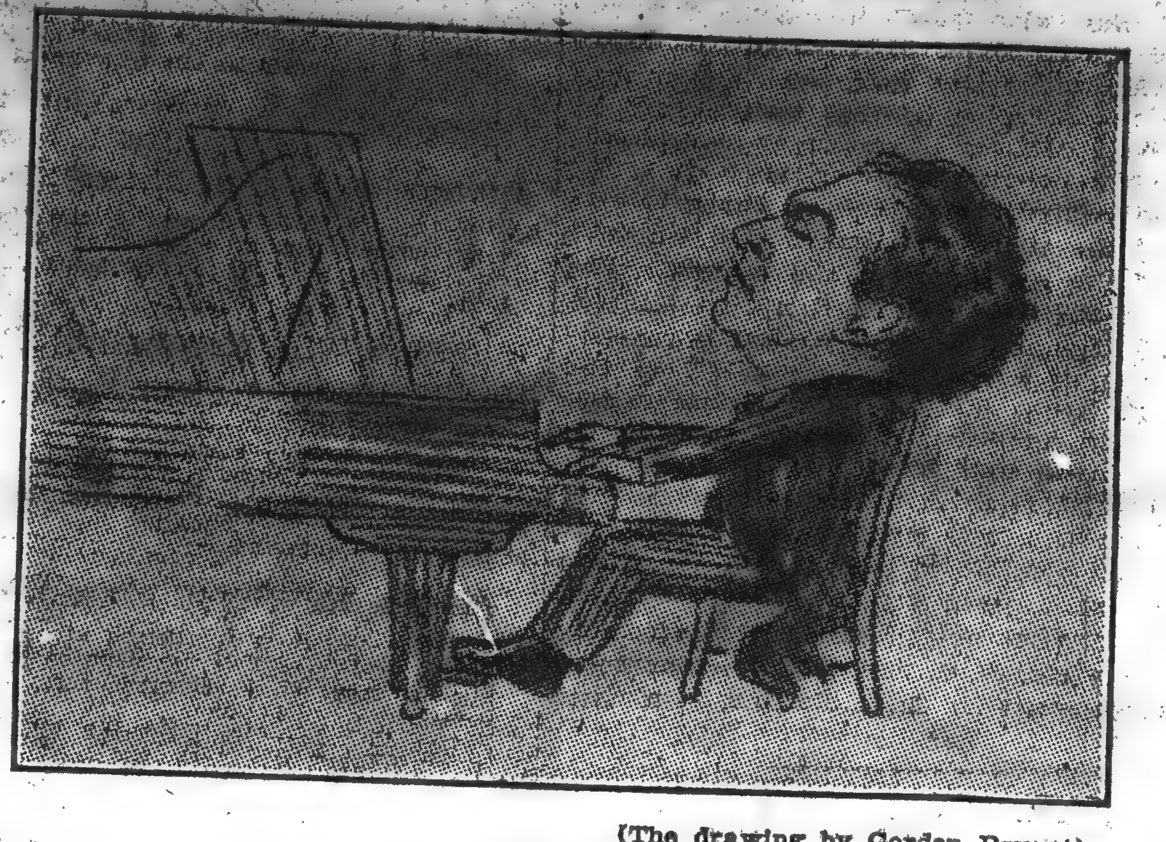
FOR the first time within the longest memory a viola-player will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts—Lionel Tertis, the renowned English virtuoso and musician now ending an American tour that began last September at the Berkshire Festival. He will play with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday of next week through a Concerto written by another Englishman, York Bowen. The other items of the programme are Schumann's Symphony in D minor; the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; and two fragments from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece for which Mr. Monteux has an abiding liking. They are "Romeo Musing" and "The Fete at Capulet's."

Trans Dec 12

Mr. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a petting party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerites whom nothing could daunt or deter. For the "Mahler Question" is no nearer settlement than it ever was. Discussion concerning his qualities as a music-maker persists with unabated fury, dividing those who (like Mr. Mengelberg and other European musicians of eminence and experience) regard him as one of the major prophets of music, from those who (like the majority of American concertgoers) regard him as the abomination of desolation. We know a great Continental conductor who unblushingly ranks Mahler with the high gods of symphonic music, and seats him on the right hand of Beethoven. But there are many musicians of indubitable insight and sensibility who would run screaming into the subway if they read Mahler's name on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed this disputatious name on his programme he was either indifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerphobia in these parts, or his friends had neglected to enlighten him. Nevertheless, in the first movement of this First Symphony, there is perhaps warrant for his Schubertian analogy.

Transcript Dec 6

Pianists as They Play



(The drawing by Gordon Bryant)

Harold Bauer

"Assisting Artist" at the Symphony Concerts

(By Courtesy of Musical America)

Globe Dec 8

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms Concerto, Finely Interpreted, Pleases

Harold Bauer, who has been soloist at Boston Symphony concerts here many times in the years since he made his American debut in that capacity in 1900, played Brahms' second piano concerto yesterday. A musicianly and imaginative performance was cordially applauded.

The "novelty" of the afternoon to the younger generation at least was the overture which John K. Paine, for many years head of the musical department at Harvard, wrote for performances of Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" given in Sanders Theatre in 1881.

Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte" and Ravel's "La Valse," though not especially familiar had both been heard here earlier in Mr Monteux' conduc- orship. The prelude to the third act of "Tristan und Isolde," with a close arranged by somebody for concert use which differs from the opera, was the other number.

One wondered whether or not Mr Monteux had said to himself in making his program that a contrast of three preludes to three different tragedies by three very different composers would prove interesting. Dukas wrote for Corneille's tragedy of Christian martyrdom an overture as formalistic and as dull as Corneille seems to the shallowest school boy modernist. Prof Paine's prelude to Sophocles' tragedy is music not without emotion and dignity. Few 40-year-old pieces sound as fresh and as well worth reviving as this. The music is not as good as the ay, but except the "Tragic Overture" Brahms, which is not intended for y one play, and Beethoven's over- res, what composer has written great usic to go with great tragedy?

Certainly if yesterday's program uld be taken as the sole test, music- ama is all that Wagner thought it s. For the prelude to the third act "Tristan," an act which certainly ls with a tragic situation, quite psed Dukas and Paine.

ne also wondered whether or not "Tristan" excerpt, which taken hout reference to one's memory of t follows in the opera seems point- and disjointed, was played merely ve Mr Speyer a chance to get his in small type in the programs as r of the English horn solo.

least one former conductor of the stra never played fragments of pera or of any other sort of com- n at the regular Symphony con- That may have been too strict a but there have been too many when as in yesterday's bit from an" the programs have included effective only in view of one's ry of their proper setting or, like its of Faure's incidental music ng since, not effective at all. Mr of course played well and was a liberal share of applause.

Bedetti, the first cellist of the or- a, was obliged by Mr Bauer's in- ce to share with the soloist part of pplause after the Brahms con- because the long and conspicuous cello solo in one of the movements had been well played. It was graceful of Bauer to thus show his realization of the fact that the orchestra had a large share in the concerto, but after all an orchestra is an orchestra, not a collection of soloists. It is not the excellence of the leading players as soloists but the quality of the ensemble, which includes many men who never play so-called "incidental solos," that really makes the orchestra first rate.

The concerto replaced a symphony on yesterday's program. A listener old-fashioned enough to dislike to miss hearing most of the major symphonies of the great classic composers at least every other season regretted the loss of one opportunity though Brahms always composed more or less symphonically.

Transcript Dec 7

BRAHMS, BAUER, WEBER, MONTEUX, TOGETHER MATED

NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

The Zest of the Night—The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Born Again—A Concerto for Elation, Not Exhaustion—Miss Stillings Returns — Mr. Paderewski's Programme

IF the President and the Fellows of Harvard University would lend Sanders Theatre, it might profit the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra to invite Bostonian subscribers to special concerts within it. Nowhere else at striking distance does the band sound so clearly, richly, brilliantly. Not even in New York are conductor and players more on their mettle. Far more than in Symphony Hall do audience and orchestra seem en rapport. As eagerly as the music-makers play, do the hearers respond. Not a measure goes unnoted; not a detail passes clouded; piece after piece teems with life, abounds in character; while from the Elysian Fields—or the ante-room—composers beam. Not all this good fortune springs from the wooden walls, the resonant shape of Sanders Theatre. The mood of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, the temper of the company, are both source to it. At least once a year—and there are nine opportunities—the connoisseurs of the performance of music hereabouts should seek a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. They will be rewarded.

At the outset, last evening, came proof positive. The first number of the programme was the Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz"—these many days "old hat" in both senile and youthful ears; cherished only by a few infatuate "romantics" and those who will prefer to the end the "bedtime stories" of music. And lo! as Mr. Monteux and the band played the piece, as it sounded in Sanders Theatre, it was new and strange and stirring. The first darksome measures struck home. The song of the four horns was a marvel of virtuosity on the technical side, of subdued beauty as work of the imagination. To hear was to believe when the sinister and boding music ensued. After a century, yet did it bite. The songful interlude glowed rich upon the ear. Superb were the chords of climax—music-drama indeed; magnificent the onrush of the concluding torrent. The floods of Hugo's verse are not more puissant and romantic. Where else in the works of the arts is the chivalric flourish more round and high? A masterpiece of romantic music is this Overture of Weber to "Der Freischütz," yesterday, today, and for a while to come. As such, for once, did Mr. Monteux and Sanders Theatre make it sound. It was no longer a pretty or a faded piece.

As fortunate was the miscellany that filled the second part of the concert. The first item was the late Professor Paine's Prelude to Sophocles's tragedy, "King Œdipus," laudibly played to mark the fiftieth year of the teaching of music, begun by him, at Harvard. The Prelude is well made according to the orthodoxies—not the pedantries—of those days. It is a clear, knit, succinct, sustained music. It seeks and gains an appropriate austerity of matter and workmanship. In degree, it sounds with Sophocles's tragedy. After forty years, it seems neither a dull nor an inappropriate piece—but the dramatizing voice of music has gone fast and far since those reticent early eighties . . . . To this prelude succeeded numbers lately heard in Boston, advisedly repeated in Cambridge—the Suite from Fauré's Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera of "Prince Igor." Felicities of workmanship everywhere mark Fauré; apt and lovely is his detailing when he would write a misty, wistful, boding music akin to the air and the voice of Maeterlinck's tragedy. Sanders Theatre is becoming place for these miniatures in tones. There the ear perceives the fineness; overlooks the sameness. As for the Polovtsian Dances, the very boards of the stage seemed to leap with the bounding rhythms; while the wooden walls reverberant sang the folk-tunes. Tame seemed the earlier performance in Symphony Hall the lustreless.

No symphony had place on the programme. Instead, in ample equivalent stood the symphonic Concerto in B-flat fo Piano and Orchestra of Johannes Brahm —and of Johannes forty-five minutes long Once in so often it becomes every "serious conductor to revive the piece and ever "serious" audience to hear, mark, and in wardly digest it—if only the highly neces sary pianist is armed and well prepare So long as Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabriilowits flourishes among us, he is ready worthy, while, rather surprisingly, the Concerto was upturned, the other day in the baggage of young Mr. Nikisch. Much, however, depends upon the virtue of the performance. If it sounds only notes, then do bored ears go wool-gathering. If it overdoes "interpretation" and becomes "very personal," then are those ears also resentful. If, on the other hand, it gives Brahms free voice and full, animating and charactering the music withal, it may hold the listener taut to a power of mind and tones, to a grave and complementary beauty.

Transcript Dec 7

To such performance did Mr. Bauer, Mr. Monteux, the orchestra— and with them the audience—rise last evening. The penetrating and analytic mind, the reflective and absorbing temperament, the measured means, of the pianist suit this Brahmsian music. Upon it he has evidently continued his studies until in it he is altogether ripened. The clearness and the precision with which he maintained the particular line of the piano-part and the general design of the whole Concerto, were unclouded, yet not once were they pedagogic and stiffening upon the music. The letter sounded; but the spirit also gave life. Throughout Mr. Bauer was quick to Brahms's vitalizing rhythms. Throughout he missed none of those returns and concentrations of the musical thought that, after long development, seem to re-knit and re-affirm the design and the march. He has discovered now those measures, those periods, that illuminate the Concerto, and to them he gives vivid emphasis. In his ears sound, while his hands convey, the darkling quality that is Brahms's most individual tonal color; while he is as quick to the complementary, if more occasional, gleaming. Above all, he has timely perceived that Brahms may be moody with feeling as well as with thought.

The ear leapt, for example, to the dart of power with which Mr. Bauer flung out the dominating measures of the Allegro Appassionato; to the flashes of grace with which he sent the final Allegretto along its way, to be cumulated, at last, in a happy zest of power. The pianist would not have the first movement an ascetic and abstruse exercise in musical development. As truly as the opening and recurring horns sound the contemplative mood, he insisted upon it, to expand it gradually into warm vigors of release and advance. Right-minded was Mr. Bauer with the slow division. Here vigors end; while to them ensues the charm that is smile upon the face of Brahms's thought—for a persistently serious musical speech is not necessarily strange to it. At one with Mr. Bauer—and with Brahms—were the conductor and the orchestra. As justly, as revealingly, in every essential attribute of performance went Mr. Monteux. The orchestra was as plastic as it was colorful—and both within that precision and moderation which are intrinsically Brahmsian. Again the informing spirit animated the audible letter. For once at least, a performance of this Second Concerto ended, not in exhaustion, but in elation. H. T. P.

Trans Dec 12

As present plans stand, the projected performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to mark the hundredth year of the music, will befall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall. In it Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra, a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society—trained by Dr. Davison, will join hands and voices. The quartet of solo-singers has yet to be chosen.

Mr. Casals, the illustrious violoncellist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Dec. 28 and 29. Only twice before in all his years in America has he been "assisting"—or predominant—artist with the band.

[159]

Pro Bulletin Dec 4

LEGINSKA, who will appear as piano soloist at the next concert, Dec. 11, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall.

Current Affairs Nov 26

Symphony Concerts On Monday Evenings

THE PROJECT of a series five symphony concerts on Mc day evenings by the regular Bost Symphony Orchestra under Pie Monteux, its conductor, w started two seasons ago. Th were two reasons for this ventu The regular series of twenty-fo Friday afternoon and twenty-fo Saturday evening Boston Sy phony Concerts had grown much in demand that seats were a premium. Whereas this long series had a particular appeal to patrons of considerable musical experience it seemed probable that there must be a large potential public who would be glad of the oppo tunity to hear five symphon concerts through the season by on of the greatest symphony orches tras in the world and under one the most prominent conducto living. These concerts have th added attraction of a soloist interest at each, whether singer pianist, or violinist.

Anticipations were abundantl ealized in the quick response an he crowded patronage which the ave since had; indeed, this serie ids fair to become a permanen art of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule. They have n added musical importance i hat the programs chosen by M Monteux offer no duplications from

---

Trans Dec 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

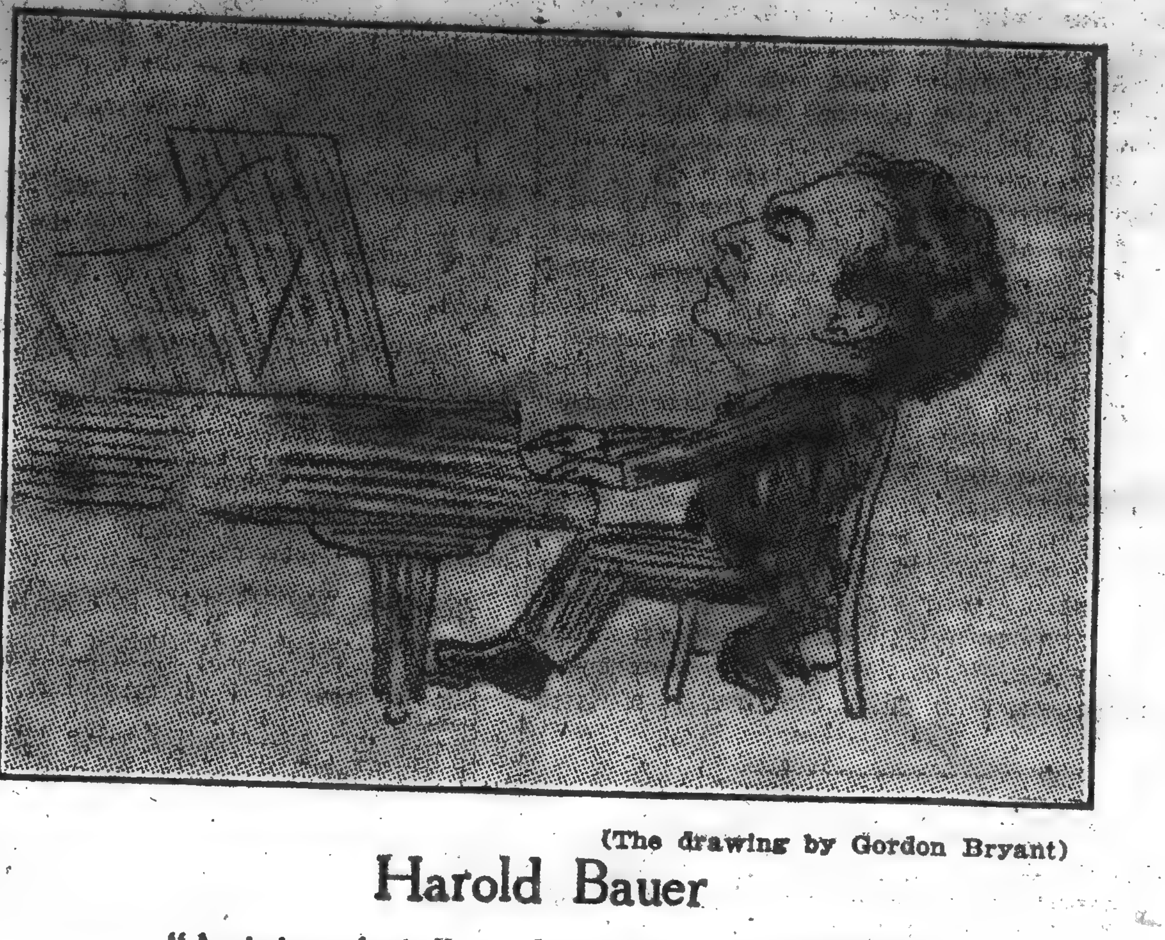
FOR the first time within the longest memory a viola-player will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts—Lionel Tertis, the renowned English virtuoso and musician now ending an American tour that began last September at the Berkshire Festival. He will play with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday of next week through a Concerto written by another Englishman, York Bowen. The other items of the programme are Schumann's Symphony in D minor; the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; and two fragments from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece for which Mr. Monteux has an abiding liking. They are "Romeo Musing" and "The Fete at Capulet's."

Trans Dec 12

Mr. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a petting party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerites whom nothing could daunt or deter. For the "Mahler Question" is no nearer settlement than it ever was. Discussion concerning his qualities as a music-maker persists with unabated fury, dividing those who (like Mr. Mengelberg and other European musicians of eminence and experience) regard him as one of the major prophets of music, from those who (like the majority of American concertgoers) regard him as the abomination of desolation. We know a great Continental conductor who unblushingly ranks Mahler with the high gods of symphonic music, and seats him on the right hand of Beethoven. But there are many musicians of indubitable insight and sensibility who would run screaming into the subway if they read Mahler's name on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed this disputatious name on his programme he was either indifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerphobia in these parts, or his friends had neglected to enlighten him. Nevertheless, in the first movement of this First Symphony, there is perhaps warrant for his Schubertian analogy.

Transcript Dec 6

Pianists as They Play



(The drawing by Gordon Bryant)

Harold Bauer

"Assisting Artist" at the Sympnony Concerts

(By Courtesy of Musical America)

Transcript Dec 7

BRAHMS, BAUER, WEBER, MONTEUX, TOGETHER MATED

NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

The Zest of the Night—The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Born Again—A Concerto for Elation, Not Exhaustion—Miss Stillings Returns — Mr. Paderewski's Programme

IF the President and the Fellows of Harvard University would lend Sanders Theatre, it might profit the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra to invite Bostonian subscribers to special concerts within it. Nowhere else at striking distance does the band sound so clearly, richly, brilliantly. Not even in New York are conductor and players more on their mettle. Far more than in Symphony Hall do audience and orchestra seem en rapport. As eagerly as the music-makers play, do the hearers respond. Not a measure goes unnoted; not a detail passes clouded; piece after piece teems with life, abounds in character; while from the Elysian Fields—or the ante-room—composers beam. Not all this good fortune springs from the wooden walls, the resonant shape of Sanders Theatre. The mood of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, the temper of the company, are both source to it. At least once a year—and there are nine opportunities—the connoisseurs of the performance of music hereabouts should seek a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. They will be rewarded.

At the outset, last evening, came proof positive. The first number of the programme was the Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz"—these many days "old hat" in both senile and youthful ears; cherished only by a few infatuate "romantics" and those who will prefer to the end the "bedtime stories" of music. And lo! as Mr. Monteux and the band played the piece, as it sounded in Sanders Theatre, it was new and strange and stirring. The first darksome measures struck home. The song of the four horns was a marvel of virtuosity on the technical side, of subdued beauty as work of the imagination. To hear was to believe when the sinister and boding music ensued. After a century, yet did it bite. The songful interlude glowed rich upon the ear. Superb were the chords of climax—music-drama indeed; magnificent the onrush of the concluding torrent. The floods of Hugo's verse are not more puissant and romantic. Where else in the works of the arts is the chivalric flourish more round and high? A masterpiece of romantic music is this Overture of Weber to "Der Freischütz," yesterday, today, and for a while to come. As such, for once, did Mr. Monteux and Sanders Theatre make it sound. It was no longer a pretty or a faded piece.

As fortunate was the miscellany that filled the second part of the concert. The first item was the late Professor Paine's Prelude to Sophocles's tragedy, "King Œdipus," laudibly played to mark the fiftieth year of the teaching of music, begun by him, at Harvard. The Prelude is well made according to the orthodoxies—not the pedantries—of those days. It is a clear, knit, succinct, sustained music. It seeks and gains an appropriate austerity of matter and workmanship. In degree, it sounds with Sophocles's tragedy. After forty years, it seems neither a dull nor an inappropriate piece—but the dramatizing voice of music has gone fast and far since those reticent early eighties . . . To this prelude succeeded numbers lately heard in Boston, advisedly repeated in Cambridge—the Suite from Fauré's Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera of "Prince Igor." Felicities of workmanship everywhere mark Fauré; apt and lovely is his detailing when he would write a misty, wistful, boding music akin to the air and the voice of Maeterlinck's tragedy. Sanders Theatre is becoming place for these miniatures in tones. There the ear perceives the fineness; overlooks the sameness. As for the Polovtsian Dances, the very boards of the stage seemed to leap with the bounding rhythms; while the wooden walls reverberant sang the folk-tunes. Tame seemed the earlier performance in Symphony Hall the lustreless.

No symphony had place on the programme. Instead, in ample equivalent stood the symphonic Concerto in B-flat for Piano and Orchestra of Johannes Brahm —and of Johannes forty-five minutes long Once in so often it becomes every "serious conductor to revive the piece and ever "serious" audience to hear, mark, and in wardly digest it—if only the highly neces sary pianist is armed and well prepare So long as Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabrilowit flourishes among us, he is read worthy, while, rather surprisingly, the Concerto was upturned, the other day in the baggage of young Mr. Nikisch. Much, however, depends upon the virtue of the performance. If it sounds only notes, then do bored ears go wool-gathering. If it overdoes "interpretation" and becomes "very personal," then are those ears also resentful. If, on the other hand, it gives Brahms free voice and full, animating and charactering the music withal, it may hold the listener taut to a power of mind and tones, to a grave and complementary beauty.

Transcript Dec 7

To such performance did Mr. Bauer, Mr. Monteux, the orchestra— and with them the audience—rise last evening. The penetrating and analytic mind, the reflective and absorbing temperament, the measured means, of the pianist suit this Brahmsian music. Upon it he has evidently continued his studies until in it he is altogether ripened. The clearness and the precision with which he maintained the particular line of the piano-part and the general design of the whole Concerto, were unclouded, yet not once were they pedagogic and stiffening upon the music. The letter sounded; but the spirit also gave life. Throughout Mr. Bauer was quick to Brahms's vitalizing rhythms. Throughout he missed none of those returns and concentrations of the musical thought that, after long development, seem to re-knit and re-affirm the design and the march. He has discovered now those measures, those periods, that illuminate the Concerto, and to them he gives vivid emphasis. In his ears sound, while his hands convey, the darkling quality that is Brahms's most individual tonal color; while he is as quick to the complementary, if more occasional, gleaming. Above all, he has timely perceived that Brahms may be moody with feeling as well as with thought.

The ear leapt, for example, to the dart of power with which Mr. Bauer flung out the dominating measures of the Allegro Appassionato; to the flashes of grace with which he sent the final Allegretto along its way, to be cumulated, at last, in a happy zest of power. The pianist would not have the first movement an ascetic and abstruse exercise in musical development. As truly as the opening and recurring horns sound the contemplative mood, he insisted upon it, to expand it gradually into warm vigors of release and advance. Right-minded was Mr. Bauer with the slow division. Here vigors end; while to them ensues the charm that is smile upon the face of Brahms's thought—for a persistently serious musical speech is not necessarily strange to it. At one with Mr. Bauer—and with Brahms—were the conductor and the orchestra. As justly, as revealingly, in every essential attribute of performance went Mr. Monteux. The orchestra was as plastic as it was colorful—and both within that precision and moderation which are intrinsically Brahmsian. Again the informing spirit animated the audible letter. For once at least, a performance of this Second Concerto ended, not in exhaustion, but in elation. H. T. P.

Globe Dec 8

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms Concerto, Finely Interpreted, Pleases

Harold Bauer, who has been soloist at Boston Symphony concerts here many times in the years since he made his American debut in that capacity in 1900, played Brahms' second piano concerto yesterday. A musicianly and imaginative performance was cordially applauded.

The "novelty" of the afternoon to the younger generation at least was the overture which John K. Paine, for many years head of the musical department at Harvard, wrote for performances of Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" given in Sanders Theatre in 1881.

Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte" and Ravel's "La Valse," though not especially familiar had both been heard here earlier in Mr Monteux' conduc- orship. The prelude to the third act f "Tristan und Isolde," with a close rranged by somebody for concert use vhich differs from the opera, was the ther number.

One wondered whether or not Mr Monteux had said to himself in making is program that a contrast of three reludes to three different tragedies by hree very different composers would rove interesting. Dukas wrote for orneille's tragedy of Christian mar- yrdom an overture as formalistic and as dull as Corneille seems to the shallowest school boy modernist. Prof Paine's prelude to Sophocles' tragedy is music not without emotion and dignity. Few 40-year-old pieces sound as fresh and as well worth reviving as is. The music is not as good as the y, but except the "Tragic Overture" Brahms, which is not intended for one play, and Beethoven's over- es, what composer has written great ic to go with great tragedy? rtainly if yesterday's program d be taken as the sole test, music- na is all that Wagner thought it For the prelude to the third act "Tristan," an act which certainly with a tragic situation, quite osed Dukas and Paine.

ne also wondered whether or not "Tristan" excerpt, which taken out reference to one's memory of t follows in the opera seems point- and disjointed, was played merely ve Mr Speyer a chance to get his in small type in the programs as r of the English horn solo.

least one former conductor of the estra never played fragments of pera or of any other sort of com- n at the regular Symphony con- That may have been too strict a but there have been too many when as in yesterday's bit from an" the programs have included effective only in view of one's ry of their proper setting or, like its of Faure's incidental music ng since, not effective at all. Mr of course played well and was a liberal share of applause.

Bedetti, the first cellist of the or- a, was obliged by Mr Bauer's in- ce to share with the soloist part of pplause after the Brahms con- because the long and conspicuous solo in one of the movements had been well played. It was graceful of Bauer to thus show his realization of the fact that the orchestra had a large share in the concerto, but after all an orchestra is an orchestra, not a collection of soloists. It is not the excellence of the leading players as soloists but the quality of the ensemble, which includes many men who never play so-called "incidental solos," that really makes the orchestra first rate.

The concerto replaced a symphony on yesterday's program. A listener old-fashioned enough to dislike to miss hearing most of the major symphonies of the great classic composers at least every other season regretted the loss of one opportunity though Brahms always composed more or less symphonically.

Trans Dec 12

As present plans stand, the projected performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to mark the hundredth year of the music, will befall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall. In it Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra, a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society—trained by Dr. Davison will join hands and voices. The quartet of soloists has yet to be chosen.

Mr. Casals, the illustrious violoncellist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Dec. 28 and 29. Only twice before in all his years in America has he been "assisting"—or predominant—artist with the band.

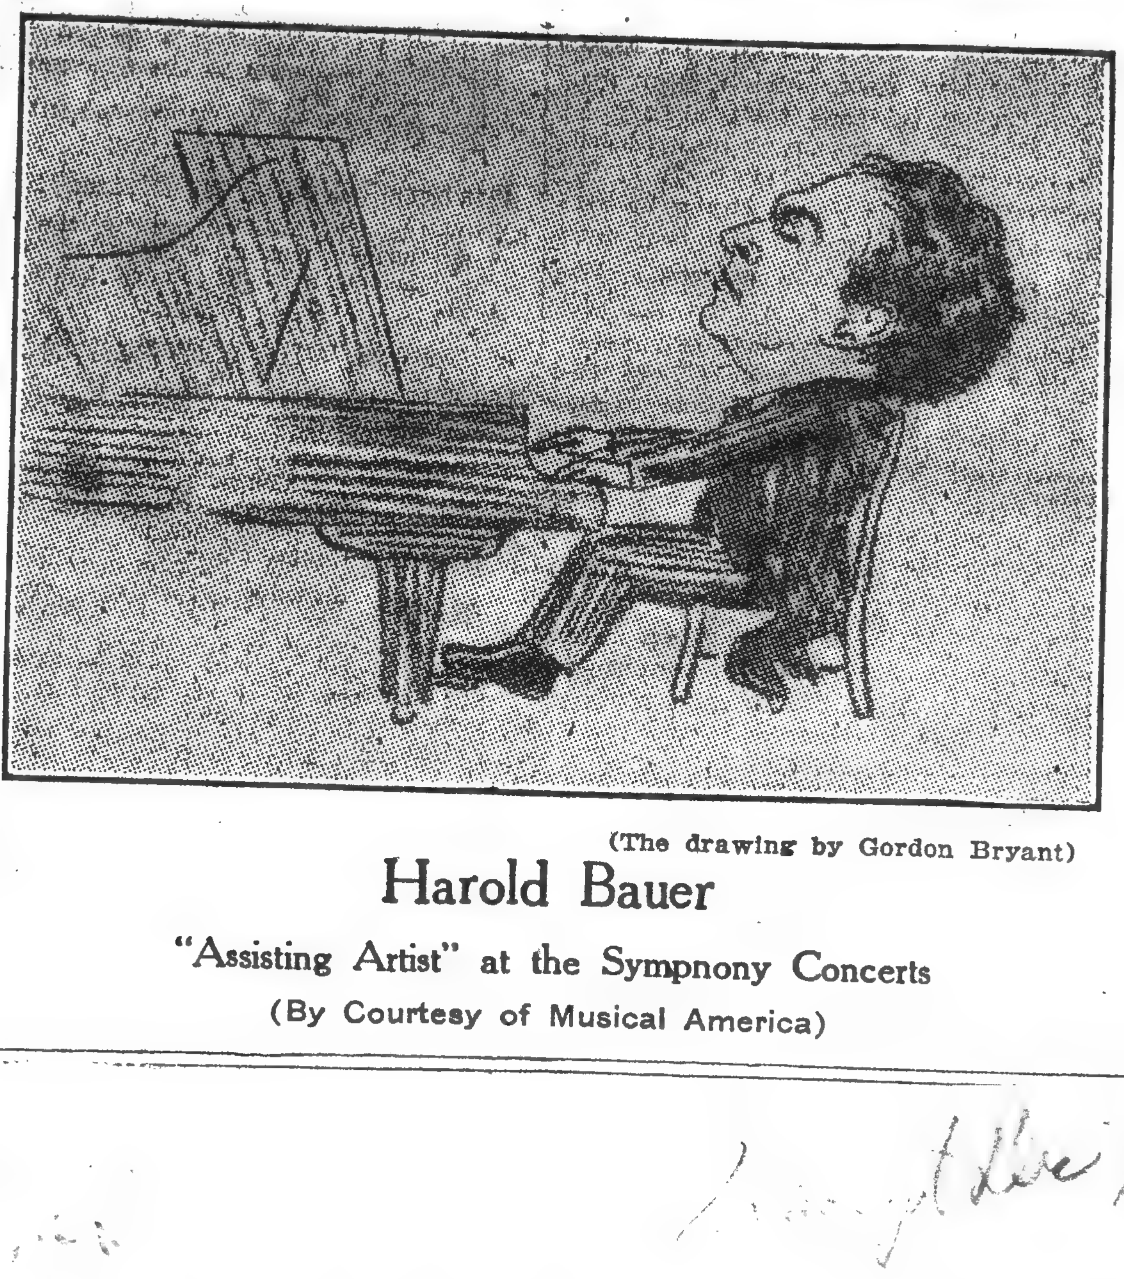
[159]

Pro Bulletin Dec 4

LEGINSKA, who will appear as piano soloist at the next concert, Dec. 11, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall.

Transcript Dec 6

Pianists as They Play



(The drawing by Gordon Bryant)

Harold Bauer

"Assisting Artist" at the Symphony Concerts

(By Courtesy of Musical America)

Transcript Dec 7

BRAHMS, BAUER, WEBER, MONTEUX, TOGETHER MATED

NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

The Zest of the Night--The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Born Again—A Concerto for Elation, Not Exhaustion—Miss Stillings Returns — Mr. Paderewski's Programme

IF the President and the Fellows of Harvard University would lend Sanders Theatre, it might profit the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra to invite Bostonian subscribers to special concerts within it. Nowhere else at striking distance does the band sound so clearly, richly, brilliantly. Not even in New York are conductor and players more on their mettle. Far more than in Symphony Hall do audience and orchestra seem en rapport. As eagerly as the music-makers play, do the hearers respond. Not a measure goes unnoted; not a detail passes clouded; piece after piece teems with life, abounds in character; while from the Elysian Fields—or the ante-room—composers beam. Not all this good fortune springs from the wooden walls, the resonant shape of Sanders Theatre. The mood of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, the temper of the company, are both source to it. At least once a year—and there are nine opportunities—the connoisseurs of the performance of music hereabouts should seek a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. They will be rewarded.

At the outset, last evening, came proof positive. The first number of the programme was the Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz"—these many days "old hat" in both senile and youthful ears; cherished only by a few infatuate "romantics" and those who will prefer to the end the "bedtime stories" of music. And lo! as Mr. Monteux and the band played the piece, as it sounded in Sanders Theatre, it was new and strange and stirring. The first darksome measures struck home. The song of the four horns was a marvel of virtuosity on the technical side, of subdued beauty as work of the imagination. To hear was to believe when the sinister and boding music ensued. After a century, yet did it bite. The songful interlude glowed rich upon the ear. Superb were the chords of climax—music-drama indeed; magnificent the onrush of the concluding torrent. The floods of Hugo's verse are not more puissant and romantic. Where else in the works of the arts is the chivalric flourish more round and high? A masterpiece of romantic music is this Overture of Weber to "Der Freischütz," yesterday, today, and for a while to come. As such, for once, did Mr. Monteux and Sanders Theatre make it sound. It was no longer a pretty or a faded piece.

As fortunate was the miscellany that filled the second part of the concert. The first item was the late Professor Paine's Prelude to Sophocles's tragedy, "King Œdipus," laudibly played to mark the fiftieth year of the teaching of music, begun by him, at Harvard. The Prelude is well made according to the orthodoxies—not the pedantries—of those days. It is a clear, knit, succinct, sustained music. It seeks and gains an appropriate austerity of matter and workmanship. In degree, it sounds with Sophocles's tragedy. After forty years, it seems neither a dull nor an inappropriate piece—but the dramatizing voice of music has gone fast and far since those reticent early eighties . . . To this prelude succeeded numbers lately heard in Boston, advisedly repeated in Cambridge—the Suite from Fauré's Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera of "Prince Igor." Felicities of workmanship everywhere mark Fauré; apt and lovely is his detailing when he would write a misty, wistful, boding music akin to the air and the voice of Maeterlinck's tragedy. Sanders Theatre is becoming place for these miniatures in tones. There the ear perceives the fineness; overlooks the sameness. As for the Polovtsian Dances, the very boards of the stage seemed to leap with the bounding rhythms; while the wooden walls reverberant sang the folk-tunes. Tame seemed the earlier performance in Symphony Hall the lustreless.

No symphony had place on the programme. Instead, in ample equivalent stood the symphonic Concerto in B-flat fo Piano and Orchestra of Johannes Brahm —and of Johannes forty-five minutes long Once in so often it becomes every "serious conductor to revive the piece and ever "serious" audience to hear, mark, and in wardly digest it—if only the highly neces sary pianist is armed and well prepare So long as Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabrilowits flourishes among us, he is ready

---

Current Affairs Nov 28

Symphony Concerts On Monday Evenings

THE PROJECT of a series five symphony concerts on Mc day evenings by the regular Bost Symphony Orchestra under Pie Monteux, its conductor, w started two seasons ago. The were two reasons for this ventu The regular series of twenty-fo Friday afternoon and twenty-fo Saturday evening Boston Sy phony Concerts had grown much in demand that seats were a premium. Whereas this lon series had a particular appeal to patrons of considerable musical experience it seemed probable that there must be a large potential public who would be glad of the oppo tunity to hear five symphon concerts through the season by or of the greatest symphony orches tras in the world and under one the most prominent conducto living. These concerts have th added attraction of a soloist interest at each, whether singe pianist, or violinist.

Anticipations were abundantl ealized in the quick response an he crowded patronage which the ave since had; indeed, this serie ids fair to become a permanen art of the Boston Symphon Orchestra's schedule. They hav n added musical importance i hat the programs chosen by M Monteux offer no duplications from

---

Trans Dec 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the first time within the longest memory a viola-player will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts—Lionel Tertis, the renowned English virtuoso and musician now ending an American tour that began last September at the Berkshire Festival. He will play with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday of next week through a Concerto written by another Englishman, York Bowen. The other items of the programme are Schumann's Symphony in D minor; the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; and two fragments from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece for which Mr. Monteux has an abiding liking. They are "Romeo Musing" and "The Fete at Capulet's."

Trans Dec 12

Mr. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a petting party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerites whom nothing could daunt or deter. For the "Mahler Question" is no nearer settlement than it ever was. Discussion concerning his qualities as a music-maker persists with unabated fury, dividing those who (like Mr. Mengelberg and other European musicians of eminence and experience) regard him as one of the major prophets of music, from those who (like the majority of American concertgoers) regard him as the abomination of desolation. We know a great Continental conductor who unblushingly ranks Mahler with the high gods of symphonic music, and seats him on the right hand of Beethoven. But there are many musicians of indubitable insight and sensibility who would run screaming into the subway if they read Mahler's name on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed this disputatious name on his programme he was either indifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerphobia in these parts, or his friends had neglected to enlighten him. Nevertheless, in the first movement of this First Symphony, there is perhaps warrant for his Schubertian analogy.

Transcript Dec 7

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms Concerto, Finely Interpreted, Pleases

Harold Bauer, who has been soloist at Boston Symphony concerts here many times in the years since he made his American debut in that capacity in 1900, played Brahms' second piano concerto yesterday. A musicianly and imaginative performance was cordially applauded.

The "novelty" of the afternoon to the younger generation at least was the overture which John K. Paine, for many years head of the musical department at Harvard, wrote for performances of Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" given in Sanders Theatre in 1881.

Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte" and Ravel's "La Valse," though not especially familiar had both been heard here earlier in Mr Monteux' conduc orship. The prelude to the third act f "Tristan und Isolde," with a close rranged by somebody for concert use hich differs from the opera, was the ther number.

One wondered whether or not Mr onteux had said to himself in making is program that a contrast of three reludes to three different tragedies by hree very different composers would rove interesting. Dukas wrote for orneille's tragedy of Christian mar yrdom an overture as formalistic and as dull as Corneille seems to the shallowest school boy modernist. Prof Paine's prelude to Sophocles' tragedy is music not without emotion and dignity. Few 40-year-old pieces sound as fresh and as well worth reviving as this. The music is not as good as the y, but except the "Tragic Overture" Brahms, which is not intended for y one play, and Beethoven's over res, what composer has written great ic to go with great tragedy? ertainly if yesterday's program d be taken as the sole test, music na is all that Wagner thought it . For the prelude to the third act "Tristan," an act which certainly with a tragic situation, quite psed Dukas and Paine.

ne also wondered whether or not "Tristan" excerpt, which taken hout reference to one's memory of t follows in the opera seems point and disjointed, was played merely ive Mr Speyer a chance to get his e in small type in the programs as er of the English horn solo.

least one former conductor of the estra never played fragments of opera or of any other sort of com on at the regular Symphony con . That may have been too strict a but there have been too many when as in yesterday's bit from an" the programs have included effective only in view of one's ry of their proper setting or, like its of Faure's incidental musi ng since, not effective at all. M of course played well and was a liberal share of applause.

Bedetti, the first cellist of the or a, was obliged by Mr Bauer's in ce to share with the soloist part of pplause after the Brahms con because the long and conspicuous solo in one of the movements had been well played. It was graceful of Bauer to thus show his realization of the fact that the orchestra had a large share in the concerto, but after all an orchestra is an orchestra, not a collection of soloists. It is not the excellence of the leading players as soloists but the quality of the ensemble, which includes many men who never play so-called "incidental solos," that really makes the orchestra first rate.

The concerto replaced a symphony on yesterday's program. A listener old-fashioned enough to dislike to miss hearing most of the major symphonies of the great classic composers at least every other season regretted the loss of one opportunity though Brahms always composed more or less symphonically.

Transcript Dec 7

worthy, while, rather surprisingly, the Concerto was upturned, the other day in the baggage of young Mr. Nikisch. Much, however, depends upon the virtue of the performance. If it sounds only notes, then do bored ears go wool-gathering. If it overdoes "interpretation" and becomes "very personal," then are those ears also resentful. If, on the other hand, it gives Brahms free voice and full, animating and charactering the music withal, it may hold the listener taut to a power of mind and tones, to a grave and complementary beauty.

To such performance did Mr. Bauer, Mr. Monteux, the orchestra— and with them the audience—rise last evening. The penetrating and analytic mind, the reflective and absorbing temperament, the measured means, of the pianist suit this Brahmsian music. Upon it he has evidently continued his studies until in it he is altogether ripened. The clearness and the precision with which he maintained the particular line of the piano-part and the general design of the whole Concerto, were unclouded, yet not once were they pedagogic and stiffening upon the music. The letter sounded; but the spirit also gave life. Throughout Mr. Bauer was quick to Brahms's vitalizing rhythms. Throughout he missed none of those returns and concentrations of the musical thought that, after long development, seem to re-knit and re-affirm the design and the march. He has discovered now those measures, those periods, that illuminate the Concerto, and to them he gives vivid emphasis. In his ears sound, while his hands convey, the darkling quality that is Brahms's most individual tonal color; while he is as quick to the complementary, if more occasional, gleaming. Above all, he has timely perceived that Brahms may be moody with feeling as well as with thought.

The ear leapt, for example, to the dart of power with which Mr. Bauer flung out the dominating measures of the Allegro Appassionato; to the flashes of grace with which he sent the final Allegretto along its way, to be cumulated, at last, in a happy zest of power. The pianist would not have the first movement an ascetic and abstruse exercise in musical development. As truly as the opening and recurring horns sound the contemplative mood, he insisted upon it, to expand it gradually into warm vigors of release and advance. Right-minded was Mr. Bauer with the slow division. Here vigors end; while to them ensues the charm that is smile upon the face of Brahms's thought—for a persistently serious musical speech is not necessarily strange to it. At one with Mr. Bauer—and with Brahms—were the conductor and the orchestra. As justly, as revealingly, in every essential attribute of performance went Mr. Monteux. The orchestra was as plastic as it was colorful—and both within that precision and moderation which are intrinsically Brahmsian. Again the informing spirit animated the audible letter. For once at least, a performance of this Second Concerto ended, not in exhaustion, but in elation. H. T. P.

Trans Dec 12

As present plans stand, the projected performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to mark the hundredth year of the music, will befall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall. In it Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra, a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society—trained by Dr. Davison will join hands and voices. The quartet of solo-singers has yet to be chosen.

Mr. Casals, the illustrious violoncellist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Dec. 28 and 29. Only twice before in all his years in America has he been "assisting"—or predominant—artist with [illegible] band.

[159]

Pro Bulletin Dec 4

LEGINSKA, who will appear as piano soloist at the next concert, Dec. 11, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall.

Symphony Concerts On Monday Evenings

THE PROJECT of a series five symphony concerts on Mc day evenings by the regular Bost Symphony Orchestra under Pie Monteux, its conductor, w started two seasons ago. The were two reasons for this ventu The regular series of twenty-fo Friday afternoon and twenty-fo Saturday evening Boston Sy phony Concerts had grown much in demand that seats were a premium. Whereas this long series had a particular appeal t patrons of considerable musical experience it seemed probable that there must be a large potential public who would be glad of the oppor tunity to hear five symphon concerts through the season by or of the greatest symphony orches tras in the world and under one c the most prominent conducto living. These concerts have th added attraction of a soloist interest at each, whether singe pianist, or violinist.

Anticipations were abundantl realized in the quick response an the crowded patronage which the have since had; indeed, this serie bids fair to become a permanen part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule. They hav an added musical importance i that the programs chosen by M Monteux offer no duplications from

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

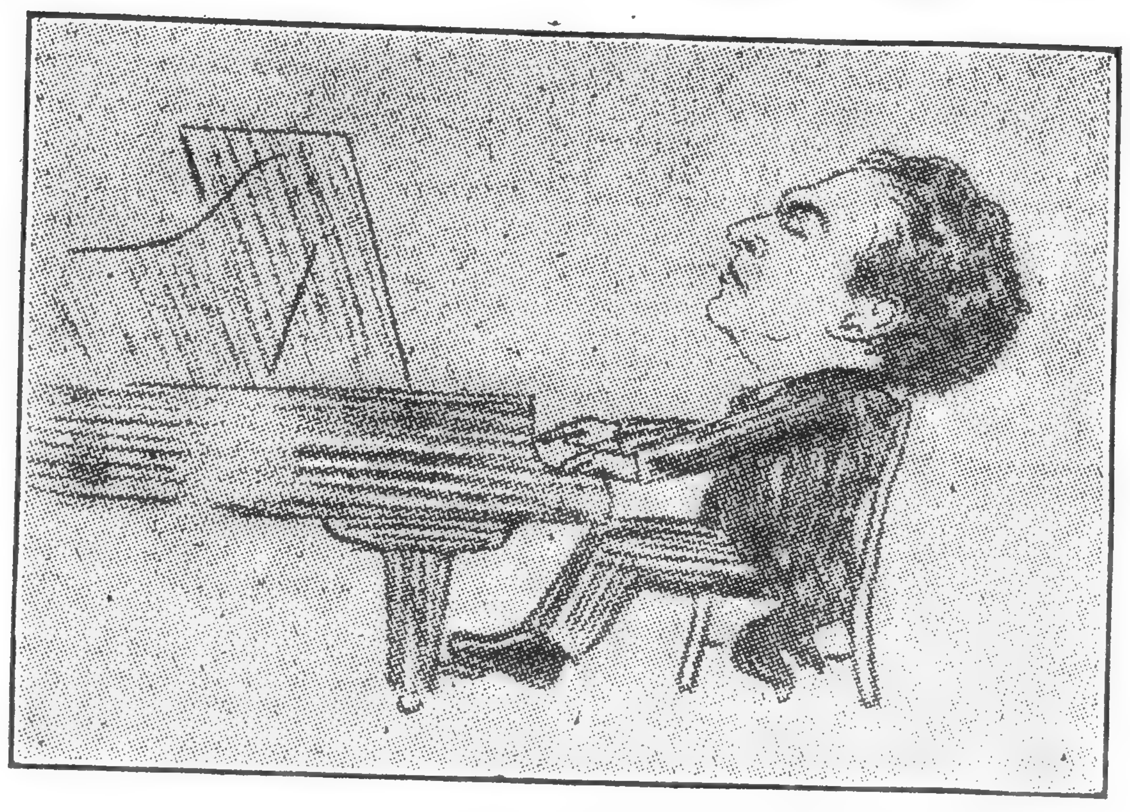
Symphony Orchestra

FOR the first time within the longest memory a viola-player will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts—Lionel Tertis, the renowned English virtuoso and musician now ending an American tour that began last September at the Berkshire Festival. He will play with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday of next week through a Concerto written by another Englishman, York Bowen. The other items of the programme are Schumann's Symphony in D minor; the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; and two fragments from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece for which Mr. Monteux has an abiding liking. They are "Romeo Musing" and "The Fete at Capulet's."

Mr. Monteux is evidently an intrepid soul. Surely he must know that the music of Mahler is about as popular in New York as a chaperone at a petting party—always excepting those few embattled Mahlerites whom nothing could daunt or deter. For the "Mahler Question" is no nearer settlement than it ever was. Discussion concerning his qualities as a music-maker persists with unabated fury, dividing those who (like Mr. Mengelberg and other European musicians of eminence and experience) regard him as one of the major prophets of music, from those who (like the majority of American concertgoers) regard him as the abomination of desolation. We know a great Continental conductor who unblushingly ranks Mahler with the high gods of symphonic music, and seats him on the right hand of Beethoven. But there are many musicians of indubitable insight and sensibility who would run screaming into the subway if they read Mahler's name on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Therefore, when Mr. Monteux placed this disputatious name on his programme he was either indifferent to the prevalence of Mahlerphobia in these parts, or his friends had neglected to enlighten him. Nevertheless, in the first movement of this First Symphony, there is perhaps warrant for his Schubertian analogy.

Transcript Nov 6

Pianists as They Play



(The drawing by Gordon Bryant)

Harold Bauer

"Assisting Artist" at the Symphony Concerts

(By Courtesy of Musical America)

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms Concerto, Finely Interpreted, Pleases

Harold Bauer, who has been soloist at Boston Symphony concerts here many times in the years since he made his American debut in that capacity in 1900, played Brahms' second piano concerto yesterday. A musicianly and imaginative performance was cordially applauded.

The "novelty" of the afternoon to the younger generation at least was the overture which John K. Paine, for many years head of the musical department at Harvard, wrote for performances of Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" given in Sanders Theatre in 1881.

Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte" and Ravel's "La Valse," though not especially familiar had both been heard here earlier in Mr Monteux' conductorship. The prelude to the third act of "Tristan und Isolde," with a close arranged by somebody for concert use which differs from the opera, was the other number.

One wondered whether or not Mr Monteux had said to himself in making his program that a contrast of three preludes to three different tragedies by three very different composers would prove interesting. Dukas wrote for Corneille's tragedy of Christian martyrdom an overture as formalistic and as dull as Corneille seems to the shallowest school boy modernist. Prof Paine's prelude to Sophocles' tragedy is music not without emotion and dignity. Few 40-year-old pieces sound as fresh and as well worth reviving as this. The music is not as good as the ay, but except the "Tragic Overture" Brahms, which is not intended for ay one play, and Beethoven's overres, what composer has written great usic to go with great tragedy? Certainly if yesterday's program uld be taken as the sole test, musicama is all that Wagner thought it as. For the prelude to the third act "Tristan," an act which certainly als with a tragic situation, quite ipsed Dukas and Paine.

ne also wondered whether or not "Tristan" excerpt, which taken hout reference to one's memory of it follows in the opera seems point(and disjointed, was played merely give Mr Speyer a chance to get his ne in small type in the programs as er of the English horn solo.

least one former conductor of the destra never played fragments of popera or of any other sort of compion at the regular Symphony con-t. That may have been too strict a but there have been too many s; when as in yesterday's bit from ntan" the programs have included as effective only in view of one's ry of their proper setting or, like bits of Faure's incidental musi ong since, not effective at all. M r of course played well and was ri a liberal share of applause.

Bedotti, the first cellist of the orhra, was obliged by Mr Bauer's ince to share with the soloist part of pplause after the Brahms conw because the long and conspicuous solo in one of the movements had been well played. It was graceful of Bauer to thus show his realization of the fact that the orchestra had a large share in the concerto, but after all an orchestra is an orchestra, not a collection of soloists. It is not the excellence of the leading players as soloists but the quality of the ensemble, which includes many men who never play so-called "incidental solos," that really makes the orchestra first rate.

The concerto replaced a symphony on yesterday's program. A listener old-fashioned enough to dislike to miss hearing most of the major symphonies of the great classic composers at least every other season regretted the loss of one opportunity though Brahms always composed more or less symphonically.

Transcript Nov 7

BRAHMS, BAUER, WEBER, MONTEUX, TOGETHER MATED

NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

The Zest of the Night--The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Born Again—A Concerto for Elation, Not Exhaustion—Miss Stillings Returns — Mr. Paderewski's Programme

IF the President and the Fellows of Harvard University would lend Sanders Theatre, it might profit the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra to invite Bostonian subscribers to special concerts within it. Nowhere else at striking distance does the band sound so clearly, richly, brilliantly Not even in New York are conductor and players more on their mettle. Far more than in Symphony Hall do audience and orchestra seem en rapport As eagerly as the music-makers play, do the hearers respond. Not a measure goes unnoted; not a detail passes [illegible]; piece after piece teems with [illegible], abounds in character; while from the Elysian Fields—or the ante-room—composers beam. Not all this good fortune springs from the wooden walls, the resonant shape of Sanders Theatre. The [illegible] of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, the temper of the company, are both sources [illegible] At least once a year—and there are nine opportunities—the connoisseurs [illegible] performance of music hereabouts should seek a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. They will be rewarded.

At the outset, last evening, came proof positive. The first [illegible] of the programme was the Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz"—[illegible] days "old hat" in both [illegible] and youthful ears; cherished only by a few [illegible] "romantics" and those who will [illegible] to the end the "bedtime stories" of [illegible]. And [illegible] as Mr. Monteux and the band played the piece, as it sounded in Sanders Theatre, it was new and strange and stirring. The first darksome measures struck home. The song of the four horns was a marvel of virtuosity on the technical side, of subdued beauty as work of [illegible]. To hear was to believe [illegible] sinister and boding music ensued. [illegible] did it bite. The song [illegible] rich upon the ear. Superb [illegible] chords of climax—music-drama [illegible] magnificent the onrush of [illegible] torrent. The floods of [illegible] puissant and [illegible] works of the [illegible] more round an [illegible] romantic music [illegible] of Weber to "Der Freischütz," [illegible] and for a while to come. As [illegible], for once, did Mr. Monteux and [illegible] Theatre make it sound. It was [illegible] of a faded piece.

As fortunate was [illegible] that filled the second [illegible]. The first item was th[illegible] Professor Paine's Prelude to Soph[illegible] "King Œdipus," laudibly played to mark the fiftieth year of the tea[illegible] music, begun by him, at Harvard. The Prelude is well made according to th[illegible]—not the pedantries—of those [illegible]. It is a clear, knit, succinct, sustain[illegible]. It seeks and gains an approp[illegible] of matter and workmans[illegible] degree, it sounds with Soph[illegible]. After forty years, it seems neither [illegible] nor an inappropriate piece—but the dramatizing voice of music has [illegible] fast and far since those reticent ear[illegible]. To this prelude suc[illegible] lately heard in Boston, ad[illegible] repeated in Cambridge—the Suite [illegible] Incidental Music to Maete[illegible] "Pelléas and Mélisande"; [illegible] from Borodin's opera [illegible] Felicities of workman[illegible] mark Fauré; apt and lovely [illegible] detailing when he would wri[illegible] wistful, boding music akin to [illegible] the voice of Maeterlinck's trag[illegible]. Sanders Theatre is becoming plac[illegible] miniatures in tones. There th[illegible] the fineness; overlooks the [illegible]. As for the Polovtsian Dances, th[illegible] boards of the stage seemed to [illegible] the bounding rhythms; while the [illegible] walls reverberant sang the folk-tun[illegible]. Tame seemed the earlier performance in Symphony Hall the lustreless.

No symphony had place on the programme. Instead, in ample equivalent stood the symphonic Concerto in B-flat for Piano and Orchestra of Johannes Brahm —and of Johannes forty-five mi[illegible] Once in so often it becomes every [illegible] conductor to revive the piec[illegible] every "serious" audience to hear, mark, [illegible] inwardly digest it—if only the highly [illegible] sary pianist is armed and well prepare So long as Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabrilowits flourishes among us, he is ready worthy, while, rather surprisingly, the Concerto was upturned, the other day in the baggage of young Mr. Nikisch. Much, however, depends upon the virtue of the performance. If it sounds only notes, then do bored ears go wool-gathering. If it overdoes "interpretation" and becomes "very personal," then are those ears also resentful. If, on the other hand, it gives Brahms free voice and full, animating and charactering the music withal, it may hold the listener taut to a power of mind and tones, to a grave and complementary beauty.

To such performance did Mr. Bauer, Mr. Monteux, the orchestra— and with them the audience—rise last evening. The penetrating and analytic mind, the reflective and absorbing temperament, the measured means, of the pianist suit this Brahmsian music. Upon it he has evidently continued his studies until in it he is altogether ripened. The clearness and the precision with which he maintained the particular line of the piano-part and the general design of the whole Concerto, were unclouded, yet not once were they pedagogic and stiffening upon the music. The letter sounded; but the spirit also gave life. Throughout Mr. Bauer was quick to Brahms's vitalizing rhythms. Throughout he missed none of those returns and concentrations of the musical thought that, after long development, seem to re-knit and re-affirm the design and the march. He has discovered now those measures, those periods, that illuminate the Concerto, and to them he gives vivid emphasis. In his ears sound, while his hands convey, the darkling quality that is Brahms's most individual tonal color; while he is as quick to the complementary, if more occasional, gleaming. Above all, he has timely perceived that Brahms may be moody with feeling as well as with thought.

The ear leapt, for example, to the dart of power with which Mr. Bauer flung out the dominating measures of the Allegro Appassionato; to the flashes of grace with which he sent the final Allegretto along its way, to be cumulated, at last, in a happy zest of power. The pianist would not have the first movement an ascetic and abstruse exercise in musical development. As truly as the opening and recurring horns sound the contemplative mood, he insisted upon it, to expand it gradually into warm vigors of release and advance. Right-minded was Mr. Bauer with the slow division. Here vigors end; while to them ensues the charm that is smile upon the face of Brahms's thought—for a persistently serious musical speech is not necessarily strange to it. At one with Mr. Bauer—and with Brahms—were the conductor and the orchestra. As justly, as revealingly, in every essential attribute of performance went Mr. Monteux. The orchestra was as plastic as it was colorful—and both within that precision and moderation which are intrinsically Brahmsian. Again the informing spirit animated the audible letter. For once at least, a performance of this Second Concerto ended, not in exhaustion, but in elation. H. T. P.

As present plans stand, the projected performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to mark the hundredth year of the music, will befall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall. In it Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra, a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society—trained by Dr. Davison will join hands and voices. The quartet of solo-singers has yet to be chosen.

Mr. Casals, the illustrious violoncellist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Dec. 28 and 29. Only twice before in all his years in America has he been "assisting"—or predominant—artist with the band.

Pro Bulletin Dec 4

LEGINSKA, who will appear as piano soloist at the next concert, Dec. 11, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall.

Current Opinion Nov 26

Symphony Concerts On Monday Evenings

THE PROJECT of a series five symphony concerts on Mc day evenings by the regular Bost Symphony Orchestra under Pie Monteux, its conductor, w started two seasons ago. Th were two reasons for this ventu The regular series of twenty-fc Friday afternoon and twenty-fc Saturday evening Boston Sy phony Concerts had grown much in demand that seats were a premium. Whereas this long series had a particular appeal tc patrons of considerable musical experience it seemed probable that there must be a large potential pub lic who would be glad of the oppo tunity to hear five symphon concerts through the season by or of the greatest symphony orches tras in the world and under one c the most prominent conducto living. These concerts have th added attraction of a soloist c interest at each, whether singe pianist, or violinist.

Anticipations were abundantl realized in the quick response an the crowded patronage which the have since had; indeed, this serie bids fair to become a permanen part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's schedule. They hav an added musical importance i that the programs chosen by M Monteux offer no duplications from

---

Trans Dec 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the first time within the longest memory a viola-player will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts—Lionel Tertis, the renowned English virtuoso and musician now ending an American tour that began last September at the Berkshire Festival. He will play with the orchestra on Friday and Saturday of next week through a Concerto written by another Englishman, York Bowen. The other items of the programme are Schumann's Symphony in D minor; the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute"; and two fragments from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"—a piece for which Mr. Monteux has an abiding liking. They are "Romeo Musing" and "The Fete at Capulet's."

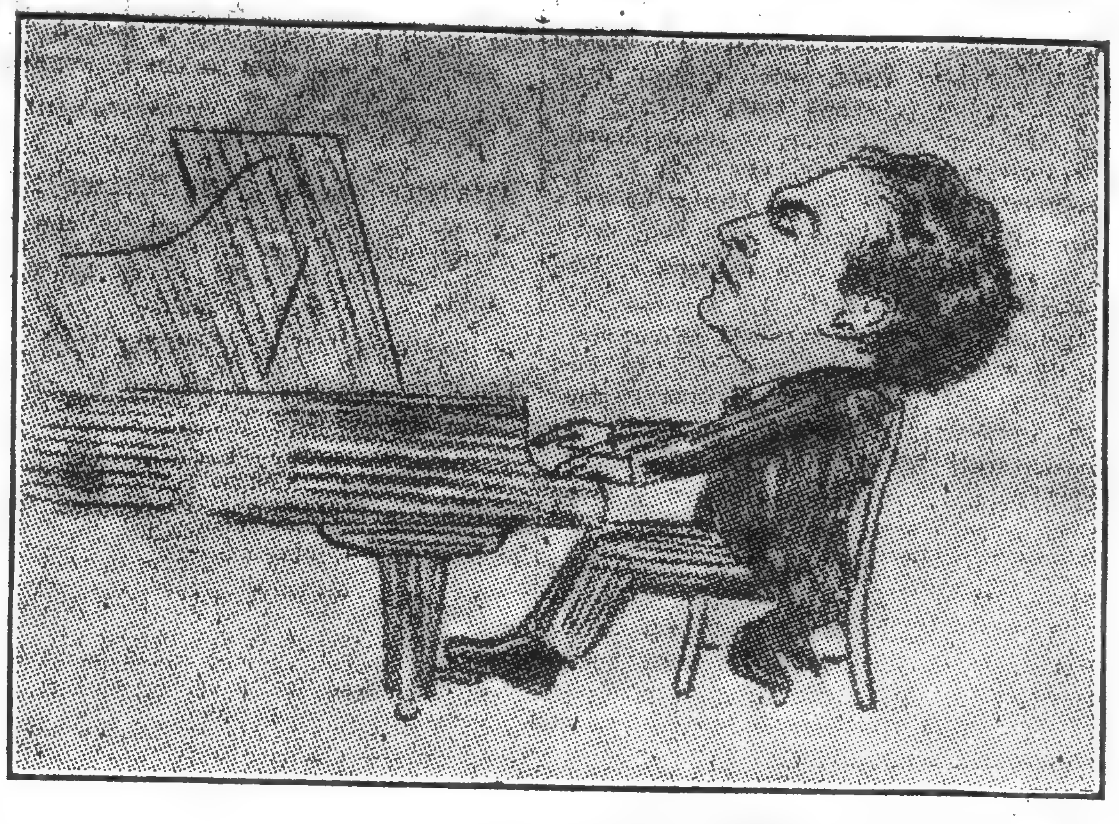
Trans Dec 1

Mr. Monteux is evidently an soul. Surely he must know that t of Mahler is about as popular York as a chaperone at a pettin always excepting those few Mahlerites whom nothing coul deter. For the "Mahler Ques nearer settlement than it eve cussion concerning his qualitie maker persists with unabated ing those who (like Mr. Men other European musicians of e experience) regard him as one o prophets of music, from thos the majority of American conce gard him as the abomination o We know a great Contine who unblushingly ranks M high gods of symphonic mu him on the right hand of B there are many musicians insight and sensibility w screaming into the subwa Mahler's name on a Car board. Therefore, when placed this disputatious n gramme he was either i prevalence of Mahlerphobi or his friends had neglec him. Nevertheless, in the of this First Symphony, warrant for his Sch

---

Transcript Dec 6

Pianists as They Play



(The drawing by Gordon Bryant)

Harold Bauer

"Assisting Artist" at the Sympnony Concerts

(By Courtesy of Musical America)

BAUER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms Concerto, Finely Interpreted, Pleases

Harold Bauer, who has been soloist at Boston Symphony concerts here many times in the years since he made his American debut in that capacity in 1900, played Brahms' second piano concerto yesterday. A musicianly and imaginative performance was cordially applauded.

The "novelty" of the afternoon to the younger generation at least was the overture which John K. Paine, for many years head of the musical department at Harvard, wrote for performances of Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" given in Sanders Theatre in 1881.

Dukas' overture to "Polyeucte" and Ravel's "La Valse," though not especially familiar had both been heard here earlier in Mr Monteux' conductorship. The prelude to the third act of "Tristan und Isolde," with a close arranged by somebody for concert use which differs from the opera, was the other number.

One wondered whether or not Mr Monteux had said to himself in making his program that a contrast of three preludes to three different tragedies by three very different composers would prove interesting. Dukas wrote for Corneille's tragedy of Christian martyrdom an overture as formalistic and as dull as Corneille seems to the shallowest school boy modernist. Prof Paine's prelude to Sophocles' tragedy is music not without emotion and dignity. Few 40-year-old pieces sound as fresh and as well worth reviving as this. The music is not as good as the play, but except the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms, which is not intended for any one play, and Beethoven's overtures, what composer has written great music to go with great tragedy?

Certainly if yesterday's program could be taken as the sole test, music-drama is all that Wagner thought it was. For the prelude to the third act of "Tristan," an act which certainly deals with a tragic situation, quite eclipsed Dukas and Paine.

One also wondered whether or not the "Tristan" excerpt, which taken without reference to one's memory of what follows in the opera seems pointless and disjointed, was played merely to give Mr Speyer a chance to get his name in small type in the programs as player of the English horn solo.

At least one former conductor of the orchestra never played fragments of any opera or of any other sort of composition at the regular Symphony concerts. That may have been too strict a rule, but there have been too many times when as in yesterday's bit from "Tristan" the programs have included things effective only in view of one's memory of their proper setting or, like the bits of Faure's incidental music not long since, not effective at all. Mr Speyer of course played well and was given a liberal share of applause.

Mr Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra, was obliged by Mr Bauer's insistence to share with the soloist part of the applause after the Brahms concerto, because the long and conspicuous 'cello solo in one of the movements had been well played. It was graceful of Bauer to thus show his realization of the fact that the orchestra had a large share in the concerto, but after all an orchestra is an orchestra, not a collection of soloists. It is not the excellence of the leading players as soloists but the quality of the ensemble, which includes many men who never play so-called "incidental solos," that really makes the orchestra first rate.

The concerto replaced a symphony on yesterday's program. A listener old-fashioned enough to dislike to miss hearing most of the major symphonies of the great classic composers at least every other season regretted the loss of one opportunity though Brahms always composed more or less symphonically.

Trans Dec 7

worthy, while, rather surprisingly, the Concerto was upturned, the other day in the baggage of young Mr. Nikisch. Much, however, depends upon the virtue of the performance. If it sounds only notes, then do bored ears go wool-gathering. If it overdoes "interpretation" and becomes "very personal," then are those ears also resentful. If, on the other hand, it gives Brahms free voice and full, animating and charactering the music withal, it may hold the listener taut to a power of mind and tones, to a grave and complementary beauty.

To such performance did Mr. Bauer, Mr. Monteux, the orchestra— and with them the audience—rise last evening. The penetrating and analytic mind, the reflective and absorbing temperament, the measured means, of the pianist suit this Brahmsian music. Upon it he has evidently continued his studies until in it he is altogether ripened. The clearness and the precision with which he maintained the particular line of the piano-part and the general design of the whole Concerto, were unclouded, yet not once were they pedagogic and stiffening upon the music. The letter sounded; but the spirit also gave life. Throughout Mr. Bauer was quick to Brahms's vitalizing rhythms. Throughout he missed none of those returns and concentrations of the musical thought that, after long development, seem to re-knit and re-affirm the design and the march. He has discovered now those measures, those periods, that illuminate the Concerto, and to them he gives vivid emphasis. In his ears sound, while his hands convey, the darkling quality that is Brahms's most individual tonal color; while he is as quick to the complementary, if more occasional, gleaming. Above all, he has timely perceived that Brahms may be moody with feeling as well as with thought.

The ear leapt, for example, to the dart of power with which Mr. Bauer flung out the dominating measures of the Allegro Appassionato; to the flashes of grace with which he sent the final Allegretto along its way, to be cumulated, at last, in a happy zest of power. The pianist would not have the first movement an ascetic and abstruse exercise in musical development. As truly as the opening and recurring horns sound the contemplative mood, he insisted upon it, to expand it gradually into warm vigors of release and advance. Right-minded was Mr. Bauer with the slow division. Here vigors end; while to them ensues the charm that is smile upon the face of Brahms's thought—for a persistently serious musical speech is not necessarily strange to it. At one with Mr. Bauer—and with Brahms—were the conductor and the orchestra. As justly, as revealingly, in every essential attribute of performance went Mr. Monteux. The orchestra was as plastic as it was colorful—and both within that precision and moderation which are intrinsically Brahmsian. Again the informing spirit animated the audible letter. For once at least, a performance of this Second Concerto ended, not in exhaustion, but in elation. H. T. P.

Trans Dec 12

As present plans stand, the projected performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to mark the hundredth year of the music, will befall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall. In it Mr. Monteux, the Symphony Orchestra, a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society—trained by Dr. Davison will join hands and voices. The quartet of solo-singers has yet to be chosen.

Mr. Casals, the illustrious violoncellist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of Dec. 28 and 29. Only twice before in all his years in America has he been "assisting"—or predominant—artist with the band.

Transcript Dec 7

BRAHMS, BAUER, WEBER, MONTEUX, TOGETHER MATED

NOTABLE SYMPHONY CONCERT IN CAMBRIDGE

The Zest of the Night—The Overture to "Der Freischuetz" Born Again—A Concerto for Elation, Not Exhaustion—Miss Stillings Returns — Mr. Paderewski's Programme

IF the President and the Fellows of Harvard University would lend Sanders Theatre, it might profit the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra to invite Bostonian subscribers to special concerts within it. Nowhere else at striking distance does the band sound so clearly, richly, brilliantly. Not even in New York are conductor and players more on their mettle. Far more than in Symphony Hall do audience and orchestra seem en rapport. As eagerly as the music-makers play, do the hearers respond. Not a measure goes unnoted; not a detail passes clouded; piece after piece teems with life, abounds in character; while from the Elysian Fields—or the ante-room—composers beam. Not all this good fortune springs from the wooden walls, the resonant shape of Sanders Theatre. The mood of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, the temper of the company, are both source to it. At least once a year—and there are nine opportunities—the connoisseurs of the performance of music hereabouts should seek a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. They will be rewarded.

At the outset, last evening, came proof positive. The first number of the programme was the Overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz"—these many days "old hat" in both senile and youthful ears; cherished only by a few infatuate "romantics" and those who will prefer to the end the "bedtime stories" of music. And lo! as Mr. Monteux and the band played the piece, as it sounded in Sanders Theatre, it was new and strange and stirring. The first darksome measures struck home. The song of the four horns was a marvel of virtuosity on the technical side, of subdued beauty as work of the imagination. To hear was to believe when the sinister and boding music ensued. After a century, yet did it bite. The songful interlude glowed rich upon the ear. Superb were the chords of climax—music-drama indeed; magnificent the onrush of the concluding torrent. The floods of Hugo's verse are not more puissant and romantic. Where else in the works of the arts is the chivalric flourish more round and high? A masterpiece of romantic music is this Overture of Weber to "Der Freischütz," yesterday, today, and for a while to come. As such, for once, did Mr. Monteux and Sanders Theatre make it sound. It was no longer a pretty or a faded piece.

As fortunate was the miscellany that filled the second part of the concert. The first item was the late Professor Paine's Prelude to Sophocles's tragedy, "King Œdipus," laudibly played to mark the fiftieth year of the teaching of music, begun by him, at Harvard. The Prelude is well made according to the orthodoxies—not the pedantries—of those days. It is a clear, knit, succinct, sustained music. It seeks and gains an appropriate austerity of matter and workmanship. In degree, it sounds with Sophocles's tragedy. After forty years, it seems neither a dull nor an inappropriate piece—but the dramatizing voice of music has gone fast and far since those reticent early eighties . . . To this prelude succeeded numbers lately heard in Boston, advisedly repeated in Cambridge—the Suite from Fauré's Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande"; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera of "Prince Igor." Felicities of workmanship everywhere mark Fauré; apt and lovely is his detailing when he would write a misty, wistful, boding music akin to the air and the voice of Maeterlinck's tragedy. Sanders Theatre is becoming place for these miniatures in tones. There the ear perceives the fineness; overlooks the sameness. As for the Polovtsian Dances, the very boards of the stage seemed to leap with the bounding rhythms; while the wooden walls reverberant sang the folk-tunes. Tame seemed the earlier performance in Symphony Hall the lustreless.

No symphony had place on the programme. Instead, in ample equivalent stood the symphonic Concerto in B-flat fo Piano and Orchestra of Johannes Brahm —and of Johannes forty-five minutes long Once in so often it becomes every "serious conductor to revive the piece and ever "serious" audience to hear, mark, and in wardly digest it—if only the highly neces sary pianist is armed and well prepare So long as Mr. Bauer or Mr. Gabrilowits flourishes among us, he is ready

[159]

Post Dec 8

BAUER AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Plays Brahms' Concerto at Seventh Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, presented Harold Bauer as soloist in the performance of the Brahms piano concerto in B flat. The orchestral compositions were Dukas' overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte"; John Knowles Paine's Prelude to the "Oedipus Rex" of Sophocles; the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," in which the English horn was played by Louis Speyer, and Ravel's "Choreographic poem, "La Valse."

TWO GREAT PIECES OF MUSIC

There were two great pieces of music on the programme: the Brahms concerto, which is a less distinctive work, on the whole, than the other piano concerto in D minor, but nevertheless both rugged and beautiful, and Wagner's music for Tristan who lies half conscious, half dreaming, on a lonely shore—Wagner at a veritable apex, so that notwithstanding Brahms and everything else, which had gone before the first sombre pronouncement of the love motive by the strings awed the hearer.

We are among those, anyhow, who would fain listen to the opera of Tristan, at least once, performed without song, played by an orchestra on the concert stage, where the full sonorities of the instrument are heard as they are heard very rarely in the orchestra pit in the opera house. Better, by far, incomparably more eloquent, is the music of Tristan's loneliness and longing with no stage, than with the finest scenery and the most romantic Tristans we have seen. It was an extremely impressive performance. Mr. Speyer played the famous solo with deep feeling and vibrant beauty of tone. Alas, what a writer of symphonic poems was lost in the Wagner who conferred so much upon the opera house!

Mr. Bauer's Virtuosity

Mr. Bauer gave a performance of Brahms' concerto which it would be difficult to excel. The virility of his conception never interfered with fullness and true sonority of tone. The long "Andante," under his fingers was neither too long nor sentimental, save for the 'cello melody which not even Mr. Jean Bedette, when he plays on his chosen instrument, can possibly prevent sounding sentimental! Consider, too, Mr. Bauer's delightful playing of the finale. For once, that movement was not taken too seriously. For once, it danced and laughed and sparkled.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the breadth of architecture and the great manner of the opening movement of this concerto is a trifle self-conscious, a little the speech of one who realizes over-much the sacredness of the forms which had their culmination in the music of Beethoven. Not that there lack passages of superb line and nobility, or certain tonal vistas peculiar to Brahms, when the beauty of nature, as he knows it, is suddenly revealed in a passage of ravishing instrumentation and musical ideas which render the hearer for the moment breathless.

Prof. Paine's "Oedipus Rex"

Was it in recollection of the recent performance of "Oedipus Rex" at the Opera House that Mr. Monteux performed the music which Professor Paine, first head of the music department of Harvard University wrote for the tragedy when it was performed by Harvard students in 1881? The music is infinitely creditable to him. One cannot claim for it vast originality, or anything remotely approaching the form and atmosphere of the drama. But it is written most earnestly with a sincerity real even while academic and genuine though old-fashioned and not original in the actual musical texture. And for 1881, when musical technic was as rare as musical culture in this country? It isn't at all a bad score.

The final performance of the music by Ravel was exceptionally advantageous for the composer. It is curious to realize how almost indecently clever Ravel is. For all that, he never gets beyond Ravel.

Once more, in all the orchestraa's performances was evident the untiring industry and the masterly labors of Mr. Monteux, which have brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to technical and musical level they have not had for many years. The audience was quick to pay tribute.

Herald Dec 8

BAUER SOLOIST AT 7TH CONCERT

Pianist Plays Brahm's 2d Concerto in B Flat Major in Symphony Hall

ORCHESTRA GIVES DUKAS OVERTURE

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The solo pianist was Harold Bauer. The program was as follows: Dukas, overture to Corneille's "Polyeucte"; Brahms, piano concerto, B flat major, No. 2; Paine, prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus"; Wagner, introduction to act III of "Tristan and Isolde" (English horn solo, Louis Speyer); Ravel The Waltz.

The Symphony audiences are acquainted with Dukas through the overture to "Polyeucte," the Scherzo entitled "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the dance poem "The Peri". They have not heard his Symphony, but reports from Paris do not lead one to believe that it is an inspired work. Dukas is now nearly 60 years old. Is it not probable that he will be known in future by his scherzo? Not because it is a musical illustration of Goethe's poem, but by reason of the music itself, which holds the attention and diverts the hearer that is not concerned with the story and might pronounce the poet's name "Go-ecth."

Take this overture for instance, it was composed six years before "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

In a way it is more elaborately constructed, but who this morning, except the conductor and the players, remembers the chief themes? They are short and not salient. The overture consists for the most part of a labored and prolix treatment of these themes with endless repetitions. The richness of the orchestration reminds one of an over-decorated, drawing-room cluttered with massive furniture. Does the overture suit the iron style of Corneille's tragedy? Is the overture charged with the classic spirit, the spirit that makes Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" the musical expression of that ancient, tragic story? No one insists that a composer, taking a classical subject, should deliberately write archaic music, or attempt to be Grecian or Roman by choice of instruments or by harmonic suggestions. That way madness lies. In the first place, no one has a definite idea of music as practiced by these ancients. But a classic mood can be suggested, and it is wanting in this "Polyeucte," while one may say that Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture is Roman in its conciseness, directness, poignancy and pride; nor is there weeping sentiment in the measures thought to be of entreaty.

We are told that this year is the 50th anniversary of John K. Paine's first instruction at Harvard. Perhaps for this reason; perhaps because "Oedipus" was recently acted here, Mr. Monteux put on the program the overture that with the choral music for the tragedy first gave Paine a widespread reputation. The wonder is not that Paine in 1881 and his environment could write music of solid structure, for he had studied diligently and thoroughly; but that he could at that time write dramatically in classic form. To the young, enthusiastic over the ultra-modern school, missing shrieking dissonances and the swollen orchestra with eight horns, double wood-wind, tam-tam, Glocken spiel, and a variety of drums, this overture may seem "old hat." But remember that it was writen at a time when foreigners could paraphrase the saying of Sydney Smith and ask contemptuously: "Who plays or hears an American orchestral work?"

The Wagnerian Prelude gave the audience opportunity of appreciating the fine art of Mr. Speyer. The music itself, even the English horn solo, suffer when it is heard apart from the scene of Tristan awaiting in his delirium the arrival of Isolde, Ravel's Waltz, with or without the fantastically descriptive argument, is a parade piece, ingeniously contrived, more or less exciting, seldom sensuous. It was brilliantly played, with incomparable cirtuosity.

Mr. Bauer has played at 12 subscription concerts of this orchestra in Boston. He has played Brahms's first concerto thrice; yesterday was his second performance of the second. As Mrs. Micawber vowed she would never leave Mr. Micawber, so Mr. Bauer publicly declares his devotion to Johannes Brahms. Not that he is a specialist. He plays music by Schumann, Franck, and others with singular understanding; when he plays Handel's music "pomposo," one realizes what Mr. Runciman meant when he wrote: "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." Yesterday in spite of excellent qualities in the performance there was too often in the Allegro movements a curious sluggishness in pace. It is true that Brahms was over fond off "Allegro, but not too much so," but even in an Andante there may be the constant suggestion of movement.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: "Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4; Bowen, Concerto, C minor for viola and orchestra (Lionel Tertis, viola); Berlioz, "Romeo Alone" and "The Ball at the Capulets" from "Romeo and Juliet."

Globe Dec 15

TERTIS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Viola Player Heard in New Concerto

The assisting soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was Lionel Tertis, an Englishman who has made his reputation as a player of that unduly neglected instrument, the viola. York Bowen, who has been Mr Tertis' accompanist in concert tours, wrote the concerto played yesterday for him. It affords ample opportunity for feats of skill, which is doubtless its reason for being.

The symphony was Schumann's in D minor. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and a movement detached by Mr Monteux from its proper context in Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" were the other numbers.

Mr Tertis believes that the viola should not be played by men trained as violinists, but by those willing to cultivate its possibilities without attempting the better known solo instrument.

He played yesterday with a warmth and variety of tonal color, which surprised many of his listeners. In the higher registers especially, he produced effects not previously heard from a viola, and distinct from those possible on a violin. He has proved that "virtuoso technique" can well be applied to the viola. But Mr Bowen's concerto, which sounded like a rather inferior work of Vieuxtemps with a little modern embroidery, was appallingly dull to a listener not interested in "stunt" performers.

It is a pity Mr Teitis was not content to play one of the several standard orchestral works with prominent viola solos in them, even if the opportunities for display had been fewer. The viola is a worthwhile solo instrument. But the Symphony concerts are intended to give their hearers music, not to display even the most prodigious talents or the most phenomenal instruments.

The "Egmont" overture fared better than some other works of Beethoven have fared at Mr Monteux' hands. The performance was effective, yet there hung about it an air of it being "all in the day's work." The Berlioz and Schumann were brilliantly played.

Mr Monteux has always shown marked sympathy for Schumann's music. He succeeded in spite of the ineffective writing for orchestra in making most of the D minor symphony "sound." After Schumann stopped trying in the first movement to "develop" according to orthodox first movement form and began to rhapsodize when he should technically have recapitulated the music has real imaginative power. Yet it does sound as though composed for piano and then clumsily arranged for orchestra. Schumann never learned to think orchestrally.

Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" wears much better than most of Schumann. Its melodic idiom is nearer that of the 20th century. Its orchestration is still of dazzling brilliance. The music has intensely dramatic qualities. Why does not someone revive the whole work, which contains parts for a chorus and for solo singers, as well as other orchestral movements besides "Romeo Alone" and "The Ball at the Capulets" heard yesterday? Berlioz, never a popular composer, is now too much neglected.

Next week a Handel "Concerto Grosso," a new piece, called "Bergerie," by Stuart Mason, and conducted by the composer, and Strauss' "Domestic Symphony" fill the program. There is no soloist, and no Christmas music.

MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Dec. 21, and Saturday evening, Dec. 22. Stuart Mason will conduct the first performance of his "Bergerie," a pastoral score after the French manner which includes "Sarabande," "Pastoral Air," and "Gaillarde." A work of Richard Strauss, "Symphonia Domestica," inspired by his own family life and regarded as one of his most important tone poems, a work which has not been heard at these concerts for 11 years, will be one of the features of the programme. Handel's sixth Concerto Grosso in G minor will be given in place of a symphony.

Paderewski

Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will be heard in a concert at Symphony Hall, Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 19, at 3 o'clock sharp. His programme will be as follows:

Variations and Fugue, E flat minor, Op. 23, Paderewski; Sonata, E flat major, Op. 27, No. 1, Beethoven; Sonata, B-minor, Liszt; Ballade, F minor, Op. 52; Nocturne, D flat, Op. 27; Scherzo B flat minor, Chopin; Barcarolle, A minor; Valse Caprice, Rubinstein.

Christmas "Messiah"

This afternoon at 3:30 and tomorrow evening at 8:15 at Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will present its annual Christmas performance of Handel's "Messiah," with a chorus of 400. The Symphony orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer conductor, will assist. The soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, soprana; Barbara Maurel, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Post Dec 15

Post Dec 15

VIOLA HAS DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Concerto for Instrument Played by Lionel Tertis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its eighth programme of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with Lionel Tertis, viola player, as soloist. The programme included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, op. 84; Schumann's fourth symphony in D-minor, op. 120; York Bowen's concerto in C minor for viola and orchestra, and "Romeo Alone" and "The Ball at the Capulets," from Berlioz' dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

A MASTER VIRTUOSO

Mr. Tertis is a distinguished virtuoso and exponent of the viola as a solo instrument. The literature for the viola is scant even now; before Mr. Tertis and a few other enthusiasts created a demand, it was all but non-existent. Plenty of music has been written for the 'cello, and a considerable amount for the double-bass—it was as double-bass virtuoso that Serge Koussevitsky, the next conductor of the Boston Orchestra, first became known. The viola's tone, to be sure, sounds a little odd when played solo for more than a few seconds; but after a few minutes one becomes accustomed to it, and it has an appeal all its own.

The tone of the viola suggests, in the lower register, a muffled (not muted) 'cello, and in the upper, a rather thin-voiced violin. It has a dark, contralto color, and a wide range of subtly varied expression. Its possibilities were, of course, well brought out yesterday, for the concerto was written to exploit the instrument, and the player demonstrated that it is possible to perform all the violin tricks on the viola, as well as to produce from it some lovely legato effects.

The concerto, while it shows familiarity with the modern harmonic idiom, indicates also that its composer has not thought it necessary to throw overboard all the practices of the masters. That is to say, he is capable of melodic invention, and he is willing to allow a melodic line to live and grow instead of cutting off in its infancy, as most of his contemporaries do. You can listen to his music either horizontally or vertically. At a first hearing, the movement sounded conventional, the second was notable for melodiousness, and the third was conspicuous for its cadenza—that's for remembrance. This is the passage in which the fireworks are discharged, and it is just about as musical as the display passages in Mendelssohn's violin concerto, or any other of the kind.

Mr. tertis met all demands with masterful ease, and was recalled many times by the audience, aided and abetted by the orchestra.

The rest of the programme of course was thrice familiar music, but it served to impress one once more (this is a weekly occurrence) with the extraordinary power, plasticity and eloquence of the orchestra Mr. Monteux has rebuilt. Beethoven and Schumann received spirited interpretation, and the Berlioz excerpt renewed admiration for the composer's genius for orchestration.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Trans Dec 15

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Spmphony Orchestra

WITH Mahler's Symphony well behind him, Mr. Monteux passes to the promised tone-poem of Strauss. At the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive the "Symphonia Domestica," unheard in Boston since Dr. Muck's earlier day; then equally acclaimed and belabored; now to fall on fresh and, possibly, altered ears. A Concerto of Handel for String Orchestra and a Suite by Stuart Mason in the manner of an old French Pastoral are the contrasting pieces. The "Domestica" will fill the latter half of the concert.

Herald Dec 15

8TH CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Lionel Tertis, Expected Since 1908, Makes Initial Appearance with Viola

BOWEN CONCERTO HAS FIRST HEARING

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4; Bowen, Concerto in C minor vor viola and orchestra (first time in Boston, Lionel Tertis, viola); Berlioz, "Romeo Alone" and "Ball at Capulet's," from "Romeo and Juliet."

The newspapers of Boston made the statement in the spring of 1908 that Mr. Tertis would arrive here in the fall to be the leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the viola of the Hess-Schroeder String Quartet. The pleasurable anticipation was not fulfilled. Mr. Tertis did not come. Mr. Ferir, the admirable viola player, came in his place.

For many years Mr. Tertis has devoted his art to the viola. In an interesting article contributed to the Daily Telegraph of London last February and reprinted in the symphony program book of this week he tells of the early and long-continued prejudice against the viola as a solo instrument and how he struggled to remove this prejudice from the minds of composers and other musicians. Cecil Forsyth, who has also labored in this vineyard, recognizes the prejudice in his "Orchestration." Speaking of the viola being somewhat affected by the disease commonly known as "sleep," he says: "Perhaps its constitution inured for centuries to sleepy passages, has by now become immune to the microbe of sleeping sickness," and he refers to the "bad old days" when viola players in an orchestra were selected "merely because they were too wicked or too senile to play the violin."

York Bowen, as a composer and pianist, has long been associated with Mr. Tertis. Besides the concerto played yesterday, Mr. Bowen has written a sonata and smaller pieces for the viola. The concerto was played in London by Mr. Tertis as far back as 1908. It is evidently a composition for a virtuoso, for display. It might be said to sound the height and the depth of the instrument, as far as the compass is concerned. The value of the purely musical contents is slight, but one can easily see how the concerto gains popular favor, when played by an accomplished artist. Perhaps the most pleasing portion is the Andante with its sentimental theme, but an audience would also be impressed by the orchestration that has a glitter, that abounds in surprises, of which are not to the advantage of the solo instrument. The concerto chiefly served this purpose: the exhibition of Mr. Tertis's remarkable technical proficiency and his musical phrasing. With all due deference to the opinion of Mr. Tertis, it is doubtful whether the viola is an instrument for a concerto in conventional form. There were many times in the performance when the hearer forgot there is such an instrument as the viola and thought he was listening to a huge violin played with great skill. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra accompanied in a masterly, a brilliant manner. Fortunate, indeed, is the artist who has as sympathetic, experienced and helpful conductor as Mr. Monteux.

The other selections do not call for extended critical remarks. The performance was fully up to the high standard of the orchestra. It was a pleasure to hear Mr. Longy's oboe solo in the beautiful music given to Romeo by Berlioz; it was a pleasure to hear again the romantic song and scherzo Trio of Schumann. The climax in the "Egmont" overture—one of those instances in which Beethoven shouts for joy and tosses his hat in the air—was achieved in a thrilling manner, and the feverish passion of Schumann was as eloquently expressed as was his melancholy, his brooding, his regrets.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 6, G minor; Stuart Mason, "Bergerie" (in three movements, first performance, conducted by the composer); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," unheard here for over a decade, will be the chief item on this week's Symphony program. The novelty is a "Bergerie," by Stuart Mason, conducted by the composer. Mr Mason, as a teacher at the New England Conservatory, and as a music reviewer for a local newspaper, is widely known. His "Rhapsody on a Persian Air," played at the Symphony

[160]

Post Dec 8

BAUER AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Plays Brahms' Concerto at Seventh Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, presented Harold Bauer as soloist in the performance of the Brahms piano concerto in B flat. The orchestral compositions were Dukas' overture to Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte"; John Knowles Paine's Prelude to the "Oedipus Rex" of Sophocles; the introduction to the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," in which the English horn was played by Louis Speyer, and Ravel's "Choreographic poem, "La Valse."

TWO GREAT PIECES OF MUSIC

There were two great pieces of music on the programme: the Brahms concerto, which is a less distinctive work, on the whole, than the other piano concerto in D minor, but nevertheless both rugged and beautiful, and Wagner's music for Tristan who lies half conscious, half dreaming, on a lonely shore—Wagner at a veritable apex, so that notwithstanding Brahms and everything else, which had gone before the first sombre pronouncement of the love motive by the strings awed the hearer.

We are among those, anyhow, who would fain listen to the opera of Tristan, at least once, performed without song, played by an orchestra on the concert stage, where the full sonorities of the instrument are heard as they are heard very rarely in the orchestra pit in the opera house. Better, by far, incomparably more eloquent, is the music of Tristan's loneliness and longing with no stage, than with the finest scenery and the most romantic Tristans we have seen. It was an extremely impressive performance. Mr. Speyer played the famous solo with deep feeling and vibrant beauty of tone. Alas, what a writer of symphonic poems was lost in the Wagner who conferred so much upon the opera house!

Mr. Bauer's Virtuosity

Mr. Bauer gave a performance of Brahms' concerto which it would be difficult to excel. The virility of his conception never interfered with fullness and true sonority of tone. The long "Andante," under his fingers was neither too long nor sentimental, save for the 'cello melody which not even Mr. Jean Bedette, when he plays on his chosen instrument, can possibly prevent sounding sentimental! Consider, too, Mr. Bauer's delightful playing of the finale. For once, that movement was not taken too seriously. For once, it danced and laughed and sparkled.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the breadth of architecture and the great manner of the opening movement of this concerto is a trifle self-conscious, a little the speech of one who realizes over-much the sacredness of the forms which had their culmination in the music of Beethoven. Not that there lack passages of superb line and nobility, or certain tonal vistas peculiar to Brahms, when the beauty of nature, as he knows it, is suddenly revealed in a passage of ravishing instrumentation and musical ideas which render the hearer for the moment breathless.

Prof. Paine's "Oedipus Rex"

Was it in recollection of the recent [illegible] performance of "Oedipus Rex" [illegible] the Opera House that Mr. Monteux [illegible]rmed the music which Professor [illegible]e, first head of the music department of Harvard University wrote for the tragedy when it was performed by Harvard students in 1881? The music is infinitely creditable to him. One cannot claim for it vast originality, or anything remotely approaching the form and atmosphere of the drama. But it is written most earnestly with a sincerity real even while academic and genuine though old-fashioned and not original in the actual musical texture. And for 1881, when musical technic was as rare as musical culture in this country? It isn't at all a bad score.

The final performance of the music by Ravel was exceptionally advantageous for the composer. It is curious to realize how almost indecently clever Ravel is. For all that, he never gets beyond Ravel.

Once more, in all the orchestraa's performances was evident the untiring industry and the masterly labors of Mr. Monteux, which have brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to technical and musical level they had not had for many years. The audience was quick to pay tribute.

Herald Dec 8

BAUER SOLOIST AT 7TH CONCERT

Pianist Plays Brahm's 2d Concerto in B Flat Major in Symphony Hall

ORCHESTRA GIVES DUKAS OVERTURE

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux conducted. The solo pianist was Harold Bauer. The program was as follows: Dukas, overture to Corneille's "Polyeucte"; Brahms, piano concerto, B flat major, No. 2; Paine, prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus"; Wagner, introduction to act III of "Tristan and Isolde" (English horn solo, Louis Speyer); Ravel The Waltz.

The Symphony audiences are acquainted with Dukas through the overture to "Polyeucte," the Scherzo entitled "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the dance poem "The Peri". They have not heard his Symphony, but reports from Paris do not lead one to believe that it is an inspired work. Dukas is now nearly 60 years old. Is it not probable that he will be known in future by his scherzo? Not because it is a musical illustration of Goethe's poem, but by reason of the music itself, which holds the attention and diverts the hearer that is not concerned with the story and might pronounce the poet's name "Go-ecth."

Take this overture for instance, it was composed six years before "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

In a way it is more elaborately constructed, but who this morning, except the conductor and the players, remembers the chief themes? They are short and not salient. The overture consists for the most part of a labored and prolix treatment of these themes with endless repetitions. The richness of the orchestration reminds one of an over-decorated, drawing-room cluttered with massive furniture. Does the overture suit the iron style of Corneille's tragedy? Is the overture charged with the classic spirit, the spirit that makes Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" the musical expression of that ancient, tragic story? No one insists that a composer, taking a classical subject, should deliberately write archaic music, or attempt to be Grecian or Roman by choice of instruments or by harmonic suggestions. That way madness lies. In the first place, no one has a definite idea of music as practiced by these ancients. But a classic mood can be suggested, and it is wanting in this "Polyeucte," while one may say that Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture is Roman in its conciseness, directness, poignancy and pride; nor is there weeping sentiment in the measures thought to be of entreaty.

We are told that this year is the 50th anniversary of John K. Paine's first instruction at Harvard. Perhaps for this reason; perhaps because "Oedipus" was recently acted here, Mr. Monteux put on the program the overture that with the choral music for the tragedy first gave Paine a widespread reputation. The wonder is not that Paine in 1881 and his environment could write music of solid structure, for he had studied diligently and thoroughly; but that he could at that time write dramatically in classic form. To the young, enthusiastic over the ultra-modern school, missing shrieking dissonances and the swollen orchestra with eight horns, double wood-wind, tam-tam, Glocken spiel, and a variety of drums, this overture may seem "old hat." But remember that it was writen at a time when foreigners could paraphrase the saying of Sydney Smith and ask contemptuously: "Who plays or hears an American orchestral work?"

The Wagnerian Prelude gave the audience opportunity of appreciating the fine art of Mr. Speyer. The music itself, even the English horn solo, suffer when it is heard apart from the scene of Tristan awaiting in his delirium the arrival of Isolde, Ravel's Waltz, with or without the fantastically descriptive argument, is a parade piece, ingeniously contrived, more or less exciting, seldom sensuous. It was brilliantly played, with incomparable cirtuosity.

Mr. Bauer has played at 12 subscription concerts of this orchestra in Boston. He has played Brahms's first concerto thrice; yesterday was his second performance of the second. As Mrs. Micawber vowed she would never leave Mr. Micawber, so Mr. Bauer publicly declares his devotion to Johannes Brahms. Not that he is a specialist. He plays music by Schumann, Franck, and others with singular understanding; when he plays Handel's music "pomposo," one realizes what Mr. Runciman meant when he wrote: "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." Yesterday in spite of excellent qualities in the performance there was too often in the Allegro movements a curious sluggishness in pace. It is true that Brahms was over fond off "Allegro, but not too much so," but even in an Andante there may be the constant suggestion of movement.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: "Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4; Bowen, Concerto, C minor for viola and orchestra (Lionel Tertis, viola); Berlioz, "Romeo [illegible]lone" and "The Ball at the Capulets" from "Romeo and Juliet."

Globe Dec 15

TERTIS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Viola Player Heard in New Concerto

The assisting soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was Lionel Tertis, an Englishman who has made his reputation as a player of that unduly neglected instrument, the viola. York Bowen, who has been Mr Tertis' accompanist in concert tours, wrote the concerto played yesterday for him. It affords ample opportunity for feats of skill, which is doubtless its reason for being.

The symphony was Schumann's in D minor. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and a movement detached by Mr Monteux from its proper context in Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" were the other numbers.

Mr Tertis believes that the viola should not be played by men trained as violinists, but by those willing to cultivate its possibilities without attempting the better known solo instrument.

He played yesterday with a warmth and variety of tonal color, which surprised many of his listeners. In the higher registers especially, he produced effects not previously heard from a viola, and distinct from those possible on a violin. He has proved that "virtuoso technique" can well be applied to the viola. But Mr Bowen's concerto, which sounded like a rather inferior work of Vieuxtemps with a little modern embroidery, was appallingly dull to a listener not interested in "stunt" performers.

It is a pity Mr Teitis was not content to play one of the several standard orchestral works with prominent viola solos in them, even if the opportunities for display had been fewer. The viola is a worthwhile solo instrument. But the Symphony concerts are intended to give their hearers music, not to display even the most prodigious talents or the most phenomenal instruments.

The "Egmont" overture fared better than some other works of Beethoven have fared at Mr Monteux' hands. The performance was effective, yet there hung about it an air of it being "all in the day's work." The Berlioz and Schumann were brilliantly played.

Mr Monteux has always shown marked sympathy for Schumann's music. He succeeded in spite of the ineffective writing for orchestra in making most of the D minor symphony "sound." After Schumann stopped trying in the first movement to "develop" according to orthodox first movement form and began to rhapsodize when he should technically have recapitulated the music has real imaginative power. Yet it does sound as though composed for piano and then clumsily arranged for orchestra. Schumann never learned to think orchestrally.

Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" wears much better than most of Schumann. Its melodic idiom is nearer that of the 20th century. Its orchestration is still of dazzling brilliance. The music has intensely dramatic qualities. Why does not someone revive the whole work, which contains parts for a chorus and for solo singers, as well as other orchestral movements besides "Romeo Alone" and "The Ball at the Capulets" heard yesterday? Berlioz, never a popular composer, is now too much neglected.

Next week a Handel "Concerto Grosso," a new piece, called "Bergerie," by Stuart Mason, and conducted by the composer, and Strauss' "Domestic Symphony" fill the program. There is no soloist, and no Christmas music.

MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Dec. 21, and Saturday evening, Dec. 22. Stuart Mason will conduct the first performance of his "Bergerie," a pastoral score after the French manner which includes "Sarabande," "Pastoral Air," and "Gaillarde." A work of Richard Strauss, "Symphonia Domestica," inspired by his own family life and regarded as one of his most important tone poems, a work which has not been heard at these concerts for 11 years, will be one of the features of the programme. Handel's sixth Concerto Grosso in G minor will be given in place of a symphony.

Paderewski

Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will be heard in a concert at Symphony Hall, Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 19, at 3 o'clock sharp. His programme will be as follows:

Variations and Fugue, E flat minor, Op. 23, Paderewski; Sonata, E flat major, Op. 27, No. 1, Beethoven; Sonata, B-minor, Liszt; Ballade, F minor, Op. 52; Nocturne, D flat, Op. 27; Scherzo B flat minor, Chopin; Barcarolle, A minor; Valse Caprice, Rubinstein.

Christmas "Messiah"

This afternoon at 3:30 and tomorrow evening at 8:15 at Symphony Hall the Handel and Haydn Society will present its annual Christmas performance of Handel's "Messiah," with a chorus of 400. The Symphony orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer conductor, will assist. The soloists: Jeanette Vreeland, soprana; Barbara Maurel, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

Post Dec 15

VIOLA HAS DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Concerto for Instrument Played by Lionel Tertis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its eighth programme of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with Lionel Tertis, viola player, as soloist. The programme included Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, op. 84; Schumann's fourth symphony in D-minor, op. 120; York Bowen's concerto in C minor for viola and orchestra, and "Romeo Alone" and "The Ball at the Capulets," from Berlioz' dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

A MASTER VIRTUOSO

Mr. Tertis is a distinguished virtuoso and exponent of the viola as a solo instrument. The literature for the viola is scant even now; before Mr. Tertis and a few other enthusiasts created a demand, it was all but non-existent. Plenty of music has been written for the 'cello, and a considerable amount for the double-bass—it was as double-bass virtuoso that Serge Koussevitsky, the next conductor of the Boston Orchestra, first became known. The viola's tone, to be sure, sounds a little odd when played solo for more than a few seconds; but after a few minutes one becomes accustomed to it, and it has an appeal all its own.

The tone of the viola suggests, in the lower register, a muffled (not muted) 'cello, and in the upper, a rather thin-voiced violin. It has a dark, contralto color, and a wide range of subtly varied expression. Its possibilities were, of course, well brought out yesterday, for the concerto was written to exploit the instrument, and the player demonstrated that it is possible to perform all the violin tricks on the viola, as well as to produce from it some lovely legato effects.

The concerto, while it shows familiarity with the modern harmonic idiom, indicates also that its composer has not thought it necessary to throw overboard all the practices of the masters. That is to say, he is capable of melodic invention, and he is willing to allow a melodic line to live and grow instead of cutting off in its infancy, as most of his contemporaries do. You can listen to his music either horizontally or vertically. At a first hearing, the movement sounded conventional, the second was notable for melodiousness, and the third was conspicuous for its cadenza—that's for remembrance. This is the passage in which the fireworks are discharged, and it is just about as musical as the display passages in Mendelssohn's violin concerto, or any other of the kind.

Mr. tertis met all demands with masterful ease, and was recalled many times by the audience, aided and abetted by the orchestra.

The rest of the programme of course was thrice familiar music, but it served to impress one once more (this is a weekly occurrence) with the extraordinary power, plasticity and eloquence of the orchestra Mr. Monteux has rebuilt. Beethoven and Schumann received spirited interpretation, and the Berlioz excerpt renewed admiration for the composer's genius for orchestration.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Trn Dec 15

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Spmphony Orchestra

WITH Mahler's Symphony well behind him, Mr. Monteux passes to the promised tone-poem of Strauss. At the Symphony Concerts of next week he will revive the "Symphonia Domestica," unheard in Boston since Dr. Muck's earlier day; then equally acclaimed and belabored; now to fall on fresh and, possibly, altered ears A Concerto of Handel for String Orchestra and a Suite by Stuart Mason in the manner of an old French Pastoral are the contrasting pieces. The "Domestica" will fill the latter half of the concert.

Herald Dec 15

8TH CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Lionel Tertis, Expected Since 1908, Makes Initial Appearance with Viola

BOWEN CONCERTO HAS FIRST HEARING

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Schumann, Symphony, D minor, No. 4; Bowen, Concerto in C minor vor viola and orchestra (first time in Boston, Lionel Tertis, viola); Berlioz, "Romeo Alone" and "Ball at Capulet's," from "Romeo and Juliet."

The newspapers of Boston made the statement in the spring of 1908 that Mr. Tertis would arrive here in the fall to be the leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the viola of the Hess-Schroeder String Quartet. The pleasurable anticipation was not fulfilled. Mr. Tertis did not come. Mr. Ferir, the admirable viola player, came in his place.

For many years Mr. Tertis has devoted his art to the viola. In an interesting article contributed to the Daily Telegraph of London last February and reprinted in the symphony program book of this week he tells of the early and long-continued prejudice against the viola as a solo instrument and how he struggled to remove this prejudice from the minds of composers and other musicians. Cecil Forsyth, who has also labored in this vineyard, recognizes the prejudice in his "Orchestration." Speaking of the viola being somewhat affected by the disease commonly known as "sleep," he says: "Perhaps its constitution inured for centuries to sleepy passages, has by now become immune to the microbe of sleeping sickness," and he refers to the "bad old days" when viola players in an orchestra were selected "merely because they were too wicked or too senile to play the violin."

York Bowen, as a composer and pianist, has long been associated with Mr. Tertis. Besides the concerto played yesterday, Mr. Bowen has written a sonata and smaller pieces for the viola. The concerto was played in London by Mr. Tertis as far back as 1908. It is evidently a composition for a virtuoso, for display. It might be said to sound the height and the depth of the instrument, as far as the compass is concerned. The value of the purely musical contents is slight, but one can easily see how the concerto gains popular favor, when played by an accomplished artist. Perhaps the most pleasing portion is the Andante with its sentimental theme, but an audience would also be impressed by the orchestration that has a glitter that abounds in surprises, of which are not to the advantage of the solo instrument. The concerto chiefly served this purpose: the exhibition of Mr. Tertis's remarkable technical proficiency and his musical phrasing. With all due deference to the opinion of Mr. Tertis, it is doubtful whether the viola is an instrument for a concerto in conventional form. There were many times in the performance when the hearer forgot there is such an instrument as the viola and thought he was listening to a huge violin played with great skill. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra accompanied in a masterly, a brilliant manner. Fortunate, indeed, is the artist who has as sympathetic, experienced and helpful conductor as Mr. Monteux.

The other selections do not call for extended critical remarks. The performance was fully up to the high standard of the orchestra. It was a pleasure to hear Mr. Longy's oboe solo in the beautiful music given to Romeo by Berlioz; it was a pleasure to hear again the romantic song and scherzo Trio of Schumann. The climax in the "Egmont" overture—one of those instances in which Beethoven shouts for joy and tosses his hat in the air—was achieved in a thrilling manner, and the feverish passion of Schumann was eloquently expressed as was his melancholy, his brooding, his regrets.

'he concert will be repeated tonight. program of next week is as fol- Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 6 inor; Stuart Mason, "Bergerie" in three movements, first per- ce, conducted by the composer) Symphonia Domestica.

Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," unheard here for over a decade, will be the chief item on this week's Symphony program. The novelty is a "Bergerie," by Stuart Mason, conducted by the composer. Mr Mason, as a teacher at the New England Conservatory, and as a music reviewer for a local newspaper, is widely known. His "Rhapsody on a Persian Air," played at the Symphony

Trans Dec 15 '23

Symphony

ABLE ROUTINE WITH A VIOLA FOR NOVEL SPICE

MR. TERTIS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Rare Virtuoso Not Too Advantageously Placed—Beethoven Goes Curiously Unapplauded—Schumann Thick but Songful—Berlioz by Conductors Beloved

THE Anti-Beethoven Society, once jocularly formed in New York, may take heart of grace. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the first item upon the programme was his Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont." It is music of Beethoven's prime. Through three-quarters of a century it has been both classic and alive. The fateful chords at the beginning still strike home. The rushing measures of the close—piccolo screaming above, brasses striding below—shout in full frenzy. Between, sound the pity and the pang of Egmont's fate, glamoured in tones, of themselves touching ear and heart. Here abides romantic beauty, singing. The performance matched the music. The tragic chords beat large and deep; in euphony and transparency streamed the songful periods, mournful yet benign. The end cried and leapt to heaven. Beethoven, hearing, might have been well pleased. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were altogether in the vein. Their reward—and the composer's—was a light patter of app'ause as perfunctory and polite as though Beethoven were some impressionist from Paris, some variation-maker from Berlin. Is he so taken for granted here and now? Is the orchestra—raised at last to its old mettle—already routine upon these Friday ears?

Yet the same audience clapped hands so long and loudly after Schumann's Symphony in D minor that the conductor twice returned and finally bade the band stand to still heartier plaudits. Unlike one or another predecessor, Mr. Monteux does not much lighten, clarify or vary the instrumental, the harmonic, warp and woof of Schumann's music. Surer than ever might the hearer be yesterday that he was no composer for orchestra—unless some inner fervor burned the clouds away as in the Symphony of the com[illegible] pring; the Symphony of conjuga[illegible] es of the music to "Manfred" [illegible] t." The instrumental and the [illegible] xture of this Symphony in D [illegible] monotonous, repetitious—ost[illegible] orchestra, intrinsically [illegible] uno. Brief, indeed, are the [illegible] in no one, except the last [illegible] and flowing. He thinks, [illegible] Mendelssohn, the agi[illegible] nothing, could put such [illegible] the blush. Yet Schumann, [illegible] to say, and feeling it wi[illegible] saved. No doubt he was [illegible] workmanship of the Finale. [illegible] the pedagogues reason to admire [illegible] adays it stirs by the brightness of th[illegible] [illegible], the glow of the progress. The r[illegible] of the Scherzo springs from the Schum[illegible] [illegible] thick-coming fancies. He can sing [illegible] Romanza—the old, far-off wistful tu[illegible] [illegible] imagination fondled. Through [illegible] formulas and the layers of the first mov[illegible] [illegible] he does now and then swing fre[illegible] [illegible] all the scholar that would be could [illegible] the singer that was. Through the [illegible] instrumentation still pierces the [illegible]m. If it overlooked Beetho[illegible] [illegible] the same audience had it[illegible] [illegible] Schumann's Symphony.

Thereafter Mr. Lionel Tertis played the viola—to admiration, with divination, for all that the instrument as solo-voice may convey. He summoned its plaintive plangency; sounded its penetrating note; gave it an unexpected sonority; drew from it as strange a songful warmth. Obviously he cherishes his instrument; out of affection he idealizes it; after the manner of loved objects, even if they be of wood and strings, it returns him more than it gives to others, perfunctory, dutiful, indifferent. A viola, then, has individuality, outside an orchestral choir; for half an hour may engage the ear and please the fancy. It may do so, in particular, in the Concerto that Mr. York Bowen, the Briton, wrote for it and that Mr. Tertis yesterday played. The piece is smoothly shapen by a practised musician. Over seemly surfaces run amiable melodies, pleasing figures set in a pliant passage-work. There is even an artful and unobtrusive cadenza for the solo-instrument. Here, there and everywhere the music invites the viola to do its full office, yet dwells not too long upon these well devised opportunities.

Composer and virtuoso each led the instrument by an affectionate hand and warm was the applause for all three. Yet somehow a single viola seemed to evaporate through the lengths, breadths and heights of Symphony Hall. Two months ago in Mrs. Coolidge's little "temple" of chamber-music, Mr. Tertis disclosed the viola as instrument of unexpected individuality, variety, suggestion and charm. Heard from his hands in chamber-pieces, it gave them a fresh savor, at moments a novel beauty. Yet, in spite of his clear, penetrating, plastic and perfumed tone; a spacious hall, a substantial orchestra, a full-bodied Concerto tended to smother it, for all Mr. Monteux's lightening pains. For intimacy—it was easy to suspect—are the viola and Mr. Tertis. Therein the hearer perceives their twin perfections.

The glories of the present orchestra returned in a fragment of Berlioz's Symphony upon "Romeo and Juliet"—music that Mr. Monteux, like Dr. Muck, obviously enjoys. It is the custom to label Mahler as the conductors' symphonist. By the same token Berlioz, in many a piece, may more appeal to them than to less susceptible hearers. Once in so ofen they will play his

Trans Dec 10

"Fantastic Symphony," which is beginning to wither; or his symphony of "Harold in Italy," which is already wizened. If they have reason with the overtures to "Benvenuto Cellini" and of the "Roman Carnival," they will not forego that to "King Lear," to "The Corsair," or even "Les Francs Juges." Truth to tell, this tonal-scene of Capulet's fête seems now no "great shakes." Set it beside the festal music of Strauss's "Don Juan," or the "general dance" in Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë," and it shrivels away. On Berlioz's pages Capulet's lordly house keeps none too distinctive state. Far more illusory is the preluding of the musing Romeo through music precise as is the way of Berlioz with melody, yet suffused with an amorous melancholy throbbing against the lustrous night. Upon it, creeping across vistas, the music of the dance begins to steal. . . . Conductor and orchestra were at one with Berlioz in imagination. They enriched his song. Almost they glamored his dance.

H. T. P.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Stuart Mason will conduct the first performances of his "Bergerie," a pastoral score after the French manner; Sarabande, Pastoral Air and Gaillarde. A feature of this program will be the revival of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," inspired by his own family life. Although regarded as one of his most important tone poems, this work has not been heard at these concerts for 11 years. In place of a symphony, Handel's Sixth Concerto Grosso, G minor, will be played.

Trans Dec 20

ONCE MORE THE "DOMESTICA"

Strauss's Tone-Poem of Homely Incident, of Conjugal Bliss and Bickering—Persuasive, Lovely Music; a "Programme" Often Trivial—Mr. Mason's "Bergerie"

IN the eleven years since Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was last played here by our orchestra, a new generation of listeners has been added to the public of the Symphony Concerts. To many who hear the piece at the concerts of this week it will come as new and perhaps baffling music, even though to those who knew it of yore it may now disclose a formerly unsuspected directness and clarity. However intricate the texture that Strauss has here devised, and contrapuntally the "Domestica' is an exceedingly complicated score, his harmonic and melodic idiom, once so perplexing, has become in the light of subsequent musical developments relatively straightforward and orthodox.

Although the "Domestica" was the eighth of Strauss's series of symphonic poems, the discussion it provoked was greater than that aroused by any of its predecessors, not because of its musical content, since in certain respects the "Domestica" is a more understandable music than is either the "Heldenleben" or "Don Quixote," but rather because of Strauss's choice of theme. If there wae little room for doubt that the "Heldenleben" had for hero Strauss himself, there is in that piece nothing essentially personal ors revealing. But in the "Domestica" Strauss unmistakably has put himself, his wife and his child, and the intimate details of their family life. Aside from the fact that an orchestra of almost unprecedented size was incongruously called upon to interpret this domestic idyl, it seemed to Strauss's detractors, and to certain of his admirers as well, that he had here been guilty of egregious folly, even of breach of good taste. "Of the incredible fatuity of the 'Symphonia Domestica,'" wrote Lawrence Gilman in an otherwise appreciative essay on its composer, "one has not the heart to speak—a work in which triviality and ignoble burlesque do their utmost to obscure the glimmering of a persuasive and lovely motive." And in those words he voiced the sentiments of many.

But time softens all things, and few hearing the "Domestica" today will greatly concern themselves with its lack of reticence and propriety, or be disturbed by Strauss's occasional heavy humor. Either the "Domestica" pleases, interests and stirs as music without too much thought of its programmatic content, or it fails so to do. If it so stirs, it matters not a whit whether the "Domestica" be a tonal picture of a day in the life of the Strauss family or whether it be merely a symphony in one movement, with an underlying thread of plot. We of today are not given to taking programmes in music over-seriously.

Indeed it is possible to feel that in the "Domestica," more than in any other of his symphonic poems, Strauss has made a piece that might stand wholly without progamme, perhaps even without title. Forgetting for the moment their supposed significance, the themes of the "Domestica" have each and all a vitality beyond that of most of the motives in the whole range of Strauss's tone-poems. And never before had Strauss built his musical structure so soundly. As organic music the "Domestica" is a stupendous accomplishment, an achievement in musical form beside which the making of the conventional symphony sinks to the level of a class-room exercise. Yet since the "Domestica" has a programme, deliberate and unmistakable, those who would have their music reinforced by extraneous ideas may follow the piece more easily and hear it more responsively in the knowedge of what significance each theme and episode actually or presumably had in the composer's mind.

At the outset Strauss, so to speak, lays all his thematic cards on the table. With true male egotism he makes beginning with himself as pater familias in the tripartite First Theme. Unsupported the violoncellos announce immediately an amiable melody marked "gemächlich." This is the "easy-going" Strauss, who plays skat with his boon companions and tends the flowers in his Bavarian garden. Four measures later, against long-held chords for bassoons, horn and 'cellos, an oboe sings a melody that typifies the dreamy and sentimental Strauss, a melody that is one of the most beautiful of the composer's inventions. Clarinets here interrupt "crossly" with a snapping, incidental figure in sixteenth-notes, and then "in fiery fashion" the violins play a melody of true Straussian sweep and fervor.

The husband is now duly presented, and in a graceful motive for violins and flutes, marked Theme II., we are introduced to the wife. After an extended development of all his material the oboe d'amore, an instrument rare in these days, announces a broad and simple tune that is Theme III., the child. Follows a disturbance and clatter of unexpected guests and over a brief theme for muted trumpets Strauss has written these words, "The Aunts: 'So like the papa,'" and a muted trombone answers for the Uncles, who respond: "So like the mama." This diversion accomplished, there ensues a graceful and charming Scherzo of happy childhood that reaches a broad climax in which the Scherzo theme in the woodwind is sounded against an extended development of the child's motive in the violins. Somewhat later a shuddering passage for full orchestra represents, so the commentators say, the child squirming in its bath. In a graceful cradle song, oddly reminiscent of Mendelssohn's first Venetian "Gondellied" the child is put to sleep; a glockenspiel intones the hour of seven and the evening begins.

At first the husband is alone, perhaps composing, and the theme of musing is developed in an extended passage of entrancing beauty. Now ensues what is commonly known as the "love scene" between husband and wife, a long, glowing, sonorous movement, that comes to an end in the music of fitful dreams. . . . And seven strokes of the clock usher in another day.

For the final section of his piece Strauss has devised an enormously ingenious double-fugue, based on the first section of the husband's theme and a variant of the wife's melody. The name "Merry Dispute" has been given this fugue, and in it, according to the imaginative in such matters, is represented an argument between the parents over the future of their child. In its climax this dispute attains the dimensions of an out-and-out quarrel, but plainly a satisfactory agreement is reached since all ends blithely. A few pages before the final joyful conclusion Strauss introduces an episode of the folk-song quality that lends to "Till Eulenspiegel" so much of its characterisic flavor. Call Strauss's invention in such passages undistinguished if you will. Yet few may resist their appeal. And surely there is in music room for the expression of homely charm as well as for the voicing of the more exalted or more recondite sentiments.

In addition to the semi-novelty of Strauss's "Smphonia Domestica," the programme of this week's pair of Symphony Concerts lists a piece hitherto unheard here or elsewhere, Stuart Mason's "Bergerie" for small orchestra. This little composition runs in three movements, to each of which is affixed a descriptive title. Thus the first is called "Sonneries et Sarabande pour les Bergers." As the name implies, these Sonneries are gay fanfares, mostly for woodwind. In the ensuing Sarabande is strong modal feeling. Indeed the whole suite deliberately assumes not only ancient forms but also the older methods of expression.

Continued on Following Page

ONCE MORE THE "DOMESTICA"

Continued from Preceding Page

In the second movement, an "Air pastorale," the principal melody is first and most appropriately entrusted to the English horn, then echoed by a clarinet. A modal passage for strings leads to a contrasting theme for flute, and the first part is duly repeated.

"Gaillarde et Départ pour le Pays de Tendre" is the name given by Mr. Mason to the final movement. Into this ancient dance there eventually comes, played by harps, a reminiscence of the Sarabande. At the end the departure of the shepherds is quaintly characterized.

A flute, an oboe (alternating with English horn), a clarinet, horn and bassoon comprise the wind instruments in Mr. Mason's score, and the composer asks specifically that there be twenty-four violins, eight violas, six violoncellos and an equal number of double-basses. Replete with felicitous touches of harmony, melody and rhythm as well as of instrumentation is this little score. An unassuming music this, but it were imprudent to call it slight. Beneath its modest exterior lurks a deal of fancy and an abundance of scholarship.

W. S. S.

Dec. 22

Forthcoming Programmes

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, not least among the younger Britons, remains the outstanding number at the Symphony Concerts of next week. It will be played in the presence of the composer, but with Mr. Monteux conducting. The attendant pieces are Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; the Nocturne, Interlude and Warriors' Dance from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë"—a timely revival; a Concerto for Violoncello by Boccherini with Mr. Casals to play the solo-part.

At his concert in Symphony

Kusevitzky in British Ears

To London also has lately gone Mr. Kusevitzky as guest-conductor at a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra. For it he set a programme that may foretell one of his way through the twenty-four that he must make for Boston next season. For, as it happened, it contained no "modernist" number. "The concert began," writes the reviewer for The Times, "with Respighi's arrangement of a group of airs and dances by sixteenth-century composers. Berlioz's Overture, 'Roman Carnival,' followed, and was given a brilliant performance, which had a full-blooded splendor that one imagines to be in keeping with the composer's intention. No better contrast to this could be imagined than Debussy's 'afternoon of a Faun,' which was taken at a rather slower rate than is usual. But the orchestra played it so well that we had no sense of the music dragging.

"But Mr. Kusevitzky seems to be endowed with what Wagner called the 'Andante arm' and is inclined to turn all his adagios into lentos. This was a serious defect in the performance of the Eroica Symphony, in which the funeral march was taken at so slow a pace that its rhythm lost that peculiar surging roll and became unyielding and stiff. The final movement was also slowed down and lacked verve. The performance was, none the less, notable, like everything else in the programme, for the perfect precision of the playing; not an i was left undotted. Yet the effect was disappointing and uninspired. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings completed the programme and was as well played in matters of detail as the rest. But one felt that its spirit was foreign to the conductor's temperament."

The reviewer for The Telegraph also measured his praises, writing:

> It was a curiously mixed achievement that Mr. Kusevitzky piled up for himself. Brilliant, fiery, tempestuous, it was not unlike that of the virtuoso who would hitch his wagon to a star and cannot prevent his feet occasionally trailing on the ground. No one could deny that in the discourse between subject and subject in the first movement of "The Eroica," for example, he was immensely imaginative; and no one could deny that a new thing had been made of Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra." Of Respighi's "Ancient Airs and Dances" we had a performance in places hefty and sonorous, in places delicate as gossamer, in places as untidy as a dinner table that has not been cleared; of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," a performance more brilliant, perhaps, than any heard in recent years; and of "The Afternoon of a Faun," a performance singularly angular and wooden.

Symphony Funds

$60,976 Now Subscribed to Pay Current Deficit

AS reported in the programme-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday, subscriptions to meet the deficit for the current musical year now stand at $60,976, out of a necessary $95,000. The treasurer, Mr. E. B. Dane, further reports the accumulated Endowment Fund as $145,825.52. Subscriptions to the deficit or to the fund may be sent to him at 6 Beacon Street. The newest list of subscribers to the guarantee for 1923-24, names:

Apsey, Laura Soule.
Brewer, F. R.
Coale, George O. G.
Daniels, Miss Mabel W.
Eaton, Miss L. H.
Fox, Felix.
Harding, Emor H.
Jackson, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Kaufman, M. B.
Lilly, Mrs. Channing.
Morse, Henry Lee.
Murdock, Mr. and Mrs. Harold.
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Saltonstall, Mrs. Philip L.
Schneider, Miss Elizabeth.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Swift, Miss Lucy W.
Tapley, Henry F.
Thorndike, Mrs. L. L.
Warner, Elizabeth.

Trans Mar [illegible]

Symphony

ABLE ROUTINE WITH A VIOLA FOR NOVEL SPICE

MR. TERTIS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Rare Virtuoso Not Too Advantageously Placed—Beethoven Goes Curiously Unapplauded—Schumann Thick but Songful—Berlioz by Conductors Beloved

THE Anti-Beethoven Society, once jocularly formed in New York, may take heart of grace. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday, the first item upon the programme was his Overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont." It is music of Beethoven's prime. Through three-quarters of a century it has been both classic and alive. The fateful chords at the beginning still strike home. The rushing measures of the close—piccolo screaming above, brasses striding below—shout in full frenzy. Between, sound the pity and the pang of Egmont's fate, glamoured in tones, of themselves touching ear and heart. Here abides romantic beauty, singing. The performance matched the music. The tragic chords beat large and deep; in euphony and transparency streamed the songful periods, mournful yet benign. The end cried and leapt to heaven. Beethoven, hearing, might have been well pleased. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra were altogether in the vein. Their reward—and the composer's—was a light patter of app'ause as perfunctory and polite as though Beethoven were some impressionist from Paris, some variation-maker from Berlin. Is he so taken for granted here and now? Is the orchestra—raised at last to its old mettle—already routine upon these Friday ears?

Yet the same audience clapped hands so long and loudly after Schumann's Symphony in D minor that the conductor twice returned and finally bade the band stand to still heartier plaudits. Unlike one or another predecessor, Mr. Monteux does not much lighten, clarify or vary the instrumental, the harmonic, warp and woof of Schumann's music. Surer than ever might the hearer be yesterday that he was no composer for orchestra—unless some inner fervor burned the clouds away as in the Symphony of the com[illegible] spring; the Symphony of conjuga[illegible] es of the music to "Manfred" [illegible] t." The instrumental and the [illegible] texture of this Symphony in D [illegible] monotonous, repetitious—ost[illegible] orchestra, intrinsically [illegible] no. Brief, indeed, are the [illegible] in no one, except the last [illegible] and flowing. He thinks, [illegible] Mendelssohn, the agi[illegible] nothing, could put such [illegible] the blush. Yet Schumann, [illegible] to say, and feeling it w[illegible] saved. No doubt he was [illegible] workmanship of the Finale. [illegible] the pedagogues reason to admire. [illegible] adays it stirs by the brightness of th[illegible] the glow of the progress. The r[illegible] of the Scherzo springs from the Schum[illegible] of thick-coming fancies. He can sing [illegible] Romanza—the old, far-off wistful tu[illegible] imagination fondled. Through [illegible] formulas and the layers of the first mov[illegible] he does now and then swing fre[illegible] all the scholar that would be could [illegible] the singer that was. Through th[illegible] instrumentation still pierces th[illegible] If it overlooked Beetho[illegible] the same audience had its [illegible] Schumann's Symphony.

Symphony Funds

$60,976 Now Subscribed to Pay Current Deficit

AS reported in the programme-book at the Symphony Concert yesterday, subscriptions to meet the deficit for the current musical year now stand at $60,976, out of a necessary $95,000. The treasurer, Mr. E. B. Dane, further reports the accumulated Endowment Fund as $145,825.52. Subscriptions to the deficit or to the fund may be sent to him at 6 Beacon Street. The newest list of subscribers to the guarantee for 1923-24, names:

Apsey, Laura Soule.
Brewer, F. R.
Coale, George O. G.
Daniels, Miss Mabel W.
Eaton, Miss L. H.
Fox, Felix.
Harding, Emor H.
Jackson, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Kaufman, M. B.
Lilly, Mrs. Channing.
Morse, Henry Lee.
Murdock, Mr. and Mrs. Harold.
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Saltonstall, Mrs. Philip L.
Schneider, Miss Elizabeth.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Swift, Miss Lucy W.
Tapley, Henry F.
Thorndike, Mrs. L. L.
Warner, Elizabeth.

Thereafter Mr. Lionel Tertis played the viola—to admiration, with divination, for all that the instrument as solo-voice may convey. He summoned its plaintive plangency; sounded its penetrating note; gave it an unexpected sonority; drew from it as strange a songful warmth. Obviously he cherishes his instrument; out of affection he idealizes it; after the manner of loved objects, even if they be of wood and strings, it returns him more than it gives to others, perfunctory, dutiful, indifferent. A viola, then, has individuality, outside an orchestral choir; for half an hour may engage the ear and please the fancy. It may do so, in particular, in the Concerto that Mr. York Bowen, the Briton, wrote for it and that Mr. Tertis yesterday played. The piece is smoothly shapen by a practised musician. Over seemly surfaces run amiable melodies, pleasing figures set in a pliant passage-work. There is even an artful and unobtrusive cadenza for the solo-instrument. Here, there and everywhere the music invites the viola to do its full office, yet dwells not too long upon these well devised opportunities.

Composer and virtuoso each led the instrument by an affectionate hand and warm was the applause for all three. Yet somehow a single viola seemed to evaporate through the lengths, breadths and heights of Symphony Hall. Two months ago in Mrs. Coolidge's little "temple" of chamber-music, Mr. Tertis disclosed the viola as instrument of unexpected individuality, variety, suggestion and charm. Heard from his hands in chamber-pieces, it gave them a fresh savor, at moments a novel beauty. Yet, in spite of his clear, penetrating, plastic and perfumed tone, a spacious hall, a substantial orchestra, a full-bodied Concerto tended to smother it, for all Mr. Monteux's lightening pains. For intimacy—it was easy to suspect—are the viola and Mr. Tertis. Therein the hearer perceives their twin perfections.

The glories of the present orchestra returned in a fragment of Berlioz's Symphony upon "Romeo and Juliet"—music that Mr. Monteux, like Dr. Muck, obviously enjoys. It is the custom to label Mahler as the conductors' symphonist. By the same token Berlioz, in many a piece, may more appeal to them than to less susceptible hearers. Once in so ofen they will play his

Trans Mar 15

"Fantastic Symphony," which is beginning to wither; or his symphony of "Harold in Italy," which is already wizened. If they have reason with the overtures to "Benvenuto Cellini" and of the "Roman Carnival," they will not forego that to "King Lear," to "The Corsair," or even "Les Francs Juges." Truth to tell, this tonal-scene of Capulet's fête seems now no "great shakes." Set it beside the festal music of Strauss's "Don Juan," or the "general dance" in Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë," and it shrivels away. On Berlioz's pages Capulet's lordly house keeps none too distinctive state. Far more illusory is the preluding of the musing Romeo through music precise as is the way of Berlioz with melody, yet suffused with an amorous melancholy throbbing against the lustrous night. Upon it, creeping across vistas, the music of the dance begins to steal. . . . Conductor and orchestra were at one with Berlioz in imagination. They enriched his song. Almost they glamored his dance.

H. T. P.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Stuart Mason will conduct the first performances of his "Bergerie," a pastoral score after the French manner; Sarabande, Pastoral Air and Gaillarde. A feature of this program will be the revival of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," inspired by his own family life. Although regarded as one of his most important tone poems, this work has not been heard at these concerts for 11 years. In place of a symphony, Handel's Sixth Concerto Grosso, G minor, will be played.

Trans Mar 20

ONCE MORE THE "DOMESTICA"

Strauss's Tone-Poem of Homely Incident, of Conjugal Bliss and Bickering—Persuasive, Lovely Music; a "Programme" Often Trivial—Mr. Mason's "Bergerie"

IN the eleven years since Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was last played here by our orchestra, a new generation of listeners has been added to the public of the Symphony Concerts. To many who hear the piece at the concerts of this week it will come as new and perhaps baffling music, even though to those who knew it of yore it may now disclose a formerly unsuspected directness and clarity. However intricate the texture that Strauss has here devised, and contrapuntally the "Domestica' is an exceedingly complicated score, his harmonic and melodic idiom, once so perplexing, has become in the light of subsequent musical developments relatively straightforward and orthodox.

Although the "Domestica" was the eighth of Strauss's series of symphonic poems, the discussion it provoked was greater than that aroused by any of its predecessors, not because of its musical content, since in certain respects the "Domestica" is a more understandable music than is either the "Heldenleben" or "Don Quixote," but rather because of Strauss's choice of theme. If there wae little room for doubt that the "Heldenleben" had for hero Strauss himself, there is in that piece nothing essentially personal ors revealing. But in the "Domestica" Strauss unmistakably has put himself, his wife and his child, and the intimate details of their family life. Aside from the fact that an orchestra of almost unprecedented size was incongruously called upon to interpret this domestic idyl, it seemed to Strauss's detractors, and to certain of his admirers as well, that he had here been guilty of egregious folly, even of breach of good taste. "Of the incredible fatuity of the 'Symphonia Domestica,'" wrote Lawrence Gilman in an otherwise appreciative essay on its composer, "one has not the heart to speak—a work in which triviality and ignoble burlesque do their utmost to obscure the glimmering of a persuasive and lovely motive." And in those words he voiced the sentiments of many.

But time softens all things, and few hearing the "Domestica" today will greatly concern themselves with its lack of reticence and propriety, or be disturbed by Strauss's occasional heavy humor. Either the "Domestica" pleases, interests and stirs as music without too much thought of its programmatic content, or it fails so to do. If it so stirs, it matters not a whit whether the "Domestica" be a tonal picture of a day in the life of the Strauss family or whether it be merely a symphony in one movement, with an underlying thread of plot. We of today are not given to taking programmes in music over-seriously.

Indeed it is possible to feel that in the "Domestica," more than in any other of his symphonic poems, Strauss has made a piece that might stand wholly without progamme, perhaps even without title. Forgetting for the moment their supposed significance, the themes of the "Domestica" have each and all a vitality beyond that of most of the motives in the whole range of Strauss's tone-poems. And never before had Strauss built his musical structure so soundly. As organic music the "Domestica" is a stupendous accomplishment, an achievement in musical form beside which the making of the conventional symphony sinks to the level of a class-room exercise. Yet since the "Domestica" has a programme, deliberate and unmistakable, those who would have their music reinforced by extraneous ideas may follow the piece more easily and hear it more responsively in the knowedge of what significance each theme and episode actually or presumably had in the composer's mind.

At the outset Strauss, so to speak, lays all his thematic cards on the table. With true male egotism he makes beginning with himself as pater familias in the tripartite First Theme. Unsupported the violoncellos announce immediately an amiable melody marked "gemächlich." This is the "easy-going" Strauss, who plays skat with his boon companions and tends the flowers in his Bavarian garden. Four measures later, against long-held chords for bassoons, horn and 'cellos, an oboe sings a melody that typifies the dreamy and sentimental Strauss, a melody that is one of the most beautiful of the composer's inventions. Clarinets here interrupt "crossly" with a snapping, incidental figure in sixteenth-notes, and then "in fiery fashion" the violins play a melody of true Straussian sweep and fervor.

The husband is now duly presented, and in a graceful motive for violins and flutes, marked Theme II., we are introduced to the wife. After an extended development of all his material the oboe d'amore, an instrument rare in these days, announces a broad and simple tune that is Theme III., the child. Follows a disturbance and clatter of unexpected guests and over a brief theme for muted trumpets Strauss has written these words, "The Aunts: 'So like the papa,'" and a muted trombone answers for the Uncles, who respond: "So like the mama." This diversion accomplished, there ensues a graceful and charming Scherzo of happy childhood that reaches a broad climax in which the Scherzo theme in the woodwind is sounded against an extended development of the child's motive in the violins. Somewhat later a shuddering passage for full orchestra represents, so the commentators say, the child squirming in its bath. In a graceful cradle song, oddly reminiscent of Mendelssohn's first Venetian "Gondellied" the child is put to sleep; a glockenspiel intones the hour of seven and the evening begins.

At first the husband is alone, perhaps composing, and the theme of musing is developed in an extended passage of entrancing beauty. Now ensues what is commonly known as the "love scene" between husband and wife, a long, glowing, sonorous movement, that comes to an end in the music of fitful dreams. . . . And seven strokes of the clock usher in another day.

For the final section of his piece Strauss has devised an enormously ingenious double-fugue, based on the first section of the husband's theme and a variant of the wife's melody. The name "Merry Dispute'" has been given this fugue, and in it, according to the imaginative in such matters, is represented an argument between the parents over the future of their child. In its climax this dispute attains the dimensions of an out-and-out quarrel, but plainly a satisfactory agreement is reached since all ends blithely. A few pages before the final joyful conclusion Strauss introduces an episode of the folk-song quality that lends to "Till Eulenspiegel" so much of its characterisic flavor. Call Strauss's invention in such passages undistinguished if you will. Yet few may resist their appeal. And surely there is in music room for the expression of homely charm as well as for the voicing of the more exalted or more recondite sentiments.

In addition to the semi-novelty of Strauss's "Smphonia Domestica," the programme of this week's pair of Symphony Concerts lists a piece hitherto unheard here or elsewhere, Stuart Mason's "Bergerie" for small orchestra. This little composition runs in three movements, to each of which is affixed a descriptive title. Thus the first is called "Sonneries et Sarabande pour les Bergers." As the name implies, these Sonneries are gay fanfares, mostly for woodwind. In the ensuing Sarabande is strong modal feeling. Indeed the whole suite deliberately assumes not only ancient forms but also the older methods of expression.

Continued on Following Page

ONCE MORE THE "DOMESTICA"

Continued from Preceding Page

In the second movement, an "Air pastorale," the principal melody is first and most appropriately entrusted to the English horn, then echoed by a clarinet. A modal passage for strings leads to a contrasting theme for flute, and the first part is duly repeated.

"Gaillarde et Départ pour le Pays de Tendre" is the name given by Mr. Mason to the final movement. Into this ancient dance there eventually comes, played by harps, a reminiscence of the Sarabande. At the end the departure of the shepherds is quaintly characterized.

A flute, an oboe (alternating with English horn), a clarinet, horn and bassoon comprise the wind instruments in Mr. Mason's score, and the composer asks specifically that there be twenty-four violins, eight violas, six violoncellos and an equal number of double-basses. Replete with felicitous touches of harmony, melody and rhythm as well as of instrumentation is this little score. An unassumming music this, but it were imprudent to call it slight. Beneath its modest exterior lurks a deal of fancy and an abundance of scholarship.

W. S. S.

Mar. 22

Forthcoming Programmes

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss not least among the younger Britons, remains the outstanding number at the Symphony Concerts of next week. It will be played in the presence of the composer, but with Mr. Monteux conducting. The attendant pieces are Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; the Nocturne, Interlude and Warriors' Dance from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë"—a timely revival; a Concerto for Violoncello by Boccherini with Mr. Casals to play the solo-part.

At his concert in Symphony

Kusevitzky in British Ears

To London also has lately gone Mr. Kusevitzky as guest-conductor at a concert of the London Symphony Orchestra. For it he set a programme that may foretell one of his way through the twenty-four that he must make for Boston next season. For, as it happened, it contained no "modernist" number. "The concert began," writes the reviewer for The Times, "with Respighi's arrangement of a group of airs and dances by sixteenth-century composers. Berlioz's Overture, 'Roman Carnival,' followed, and was given a brilliant performance, which had a full-blooded splendor that one imagines to be in keeping with the composer's intention. No better contrast to this could be imagined than Debussy's 'afternoon of a Faun,' which was taken at a rather slower rate than is usual. But the orchestra played it so well that we had no sense of the music dragging.

"But Mr. Kusevitzky seems to be endowed with what Wagner called the 'Andante arm' and is inclined to turn all his adagios into lentos. This was a serious defect in the performance of the Eroica Symphony, in which the funeral march was taken at so slow a pace that its rhythm lost that peculiar surging roll and became unyielding and stiff. The final movement was also slowed down and lacked verve. The performance was, none the less, notable, like everything else in the programme, for the perfect precision of the playing; not an i was left undotted. Yet the effect was disappointing and uninspired. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings completed the programme and was as well played in matters of detail as the rest. But one felt that its spirit was foreign to the conductor's temperament."

The reviewer for The Telegraph also measured his praises, writing:

> It was a curiously mixed achievement that Mr. Kusevitzky piled up for himself. Brilliant, fiery, tempestuous, it was not unlike that of the virtuoso who would hitch his wagon to a star and cannot prevent his feet occasionally trailing on the ground. No one could deny that in the discourse between subject and subject in the first movement of "The Eroica," for example, he was immensely imaginative; and no one could deny that a new thing had been made of Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra." Of Respighi's "Ancient Airs and Dances" we had a performance in places hefty and sonorous, in places delicate as gossamer, in places as untidy as a dinner table that has not been cleared; of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," a performance more brilliant, perhaps, than any heard in recent years; and of "The Afternoon of a Faun," a performance singularly angular and wooden.

[161]

Herald Dec 22 Post Dec 22 Globe Dec 22

NINTH CONCERT IS COMPELLING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Strauss "Domestica" Impressive

MASON'S "BERGERIE" ADDS MUCH CHARM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Strauss, Symphonia Domestica; Stuart Mason, Bergerie (Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers; Air pastorale; Gaillarde et Depart pour le pays du Tendre; first time; conducted by the composer), Liszt, Symphonic poem, "Lament and Triumph of Tasso."

There are some who think that the muse of Richard Strauss in this instance should have exercised birth-control.

We cannot subscribe to this opinion. With or without a program, this Symphony contains pages of appropriately homely and wholesome sentiment; pages of glowing beauty; pages that are exciting and in the Straussian manner glorious. It is true that there are also bombastic pages, sound and fury, that, if there is reference to a program, the journal of events in a German apartment, are absurdly incongruous.

Following the program reverently, one would say at the end of the performance: "There were terrible doings in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Strauss. Why did not the neighbors call in the police?"

This "Domestic" Symphony had been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra four times. The last performance was in 1912. Never was the music on the whole so impressive, so compelling, so persuasive as it was yesterday led by Mr. Monteux and played emotionally and superbly by the orchestra. It is true that the weaker pages—they are at the same time among the most pretentious—showed their inherent weakness, for not even Mr. Monteux and the orchestra can supply ideas that the composer lacks or glorify fuss and feathers. It is true that as a complete work of art the Symphony is not equal to Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." But forgetting all about "the easy going husband," the "lively" wife, the parents gloating over their presumably interesting baby, the morning bath—an unusual event in Germany—the dispute over the future of the boy—forgetting that Richard Strauss had a wife, baby, an apartment and that the family was astir at 7 A. M.—one can enjoy, praise be moved and excited by many pages in this supposedly autobiographical work.

Mr. Mason's "Bergerie" is charming music, music to be played at an exhibition of Watteau's paintings. George Moore said long ago of Thomas Hardy that in his early novels he tried to show how "jolly country" he could be. The sneer came from envy rather than discriminating criticism. Mr. Mason did not fall into the error of attempting to be more 18th century than Couperin and Rameau. He says in his modest note contributed to the Program Book, "I did not intend to imitate 18th century music, although I suppose that the general style of that music may have been in my mind as I wrote."

Fortunately Mr. Mason, having musical ideas of his own, having a poetic nature, appreciating the 18th century, caught the spirit of it. Educated largely in Paris, he has not been disturbed by the frantic endeavors of the ultra-modern school to make the bourgeois sit up in wonder. He knows the value of clearness, simplicity, directness, logical sequence. His orchestral scores are never gaudy; his music has demi-tints as well as exquisite colors. Writing for a small orchestra, knowing the admirable qualities of the virtuosos who were to play his "Bergerie," he wrote for them cunningly, without sacrificing to mere individual display. It would be hard to say which one of the three movements is the most delightful: The call to the peasants—nor Zola's, but those of the old France of legend, song and art, and the Sarabande tinged with tender melancholy; the beautiful air for the English horn; or the departure for Cythera, with its finely imagined ending. It is a pleasure to add that the Suite was warmly appreciated. Mr. Mason, who conducted unostentatiously but effectively, was recalled several times.

That wonder of overtures, "The Magic Flute" was played as Mozart's music should be played—and with some conductors this is not always the case. An eloquent performance of Liszt's "Tasso," which does not grow old, brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Boccherini, Concerto for Violoncello (Pablo Casals); Bliss, "Color" Symphony (first time in America); Ravel, Fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe" (Nocturne Interlude, Danse Guerriere).

SYMPHONY REVIVES A STRAUSS

His Tone Poem on Family Life Enjoyed After 11 Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its ninth programme of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," Stuart Mason's suite, "Bergerie," and Liszt's "Tasso." The programme will be repeated this evening.

REAL MUSIC IN STRAUSS

Fifteen or 20 years ago the "Domestica" and its predecessors, notably "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Heldenleben," were both laughed at and hissed, as mere shrieking discord. Times move. Today it seems odd that such things should have happened; almost as odd as that Beethoven's later works should have been denounced as violating all the sacred rules of music. Strauss is no longer the bad boy of music; we've seen lots of worse behaved youngsters since. The question of interest today is, has his music lasting quality?

Definite answer to such questions can be given only 100 years or so after the composer's time. Yet by the evidence of yesterday's performance, there is real music in the "Domestica." One wishes the composer had stuck to his refusal to allow a programme to be given out for this and his other symphonic poems, for it seems that his work not only ought to have to stand as pure music, but should have a better chance of life so considered.

Invention and Imagination

The story of the "Domestica" is not difficult to follow in the playing; but besides being in questionable taste it impairs enjoyment of the music as music. To find passages of such sustained melodic and harmonic beauty as occur in the adagio, you will have to go back as far as Wagner; and in spite of the sneers of Strauss' detractors, there is invention, imagination and scholarship in this score. Why, then, confuse it, or allow it to be confused, with a programme which at most can only amuse briefly? The performance was magnificent, and the warm applause was shared by Mr. Monteux with the men.

Mr. Mason's suite received its first performance, and was conducted by the composer, who is a well-known and highly accomplished local musician. According to Mr. Mason's statement printed in the programme book, he did not intend to imitate 18th century music, "although I suppose that the general style of that music may have been in my mind as I wrote." Evidently it was, because the conception and treatment of the work are quite in the 18th century French spirit.

Originality Impresses

But that is nothing against the suite. Rather, it is a distinct accomplishment to write in that vein in the nineteen-twenties, eschewing modern developments, and still give an impression of originality. And that is what Mr. Mason has done here.

The work has less of obvious modern appeal than the composer's Rhapsody on a Persian air, performed two years ago at the Symphony concerts and again this fall by the People's Symphony, but it has no less distinctive an air. Of the three sections, the first, "Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers," with its delightful spirit of play, had the strongest pull at a first hearing. The "Air Pastorale," beautifully played on Mr. Speyer's English horn, and echoed by the other woodwind, is pleasing, but yesterday seemed somewhat to drag.

We suspect that this movement and the third would have profited by the authoritative guidance of Mr. Monteux. It is no reflection on Mr. Mason, any more than on a visiting conductor from abroad, to say that the man who created the orchestra in its present estate obtains the best results from it. The number was cordially received by the audience.

The Mozart overture was played with the orchestra's customary eloquence, but Liszt was as tiresome as usual. What other composer can make an orchestra work so hard to so little effect?

MASON'S 'BERGERIE' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Composer Conducts Own Music

Stuart Mason, for some years past a well-known figure in Boston musical circles, conducted the first public performance of his own "Bergerie" for orchestra at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Mason's music, which is individually imagined and delicately wrought, was cordially received.

Mr Monteux revived Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," unheard here in a dozen years. He also included two familiar repertory pieces, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and Liszt's "Tasso" on a program altered from the last week's advance announcement by the unexplained omission of Handel's concerto grosso.

Mr Mason has been assistant conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra for three seasons. His conducting yesterday was far from amateurish. The little suite which he calls "Bergerie" has subtitles, of which "Gaillard et Depart pour le Pays du Tendre" is a specimen that sufficiently indicates the character of the music. One of the pastimes of the 17th and 18 century French salons was the sketching of maps of "le Pays du Tendre," which can be only lamely translated as "The Region of Affection." This utterly artificial yet carefully graceful tracing of "oceans of despair, caverns of neglect, groves of bliss," and so on, had its counterpart in tone in Mr Mason's music.

He has not attempted archeological reproduction of 18th century music. He has caught the tone of it, rendered the mood of it, and produced a delightful and wholly new species of American composition, akin to such recent European works as Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Courperin" and Strauss' suite written for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," and not markedly inferior to these celebrated examples. Mr Mason has extraordinary tact and taste in music. He makes no sins of commission.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is as music perfectly straightforward and transparently clear. The only ambiguity about it is in the various program explanations. The listener may enjoy it as music, however, without worrying as to precisely which measure represents the baby's bath. Except for the clock striking 7 twice during the symphony, there is nothing in the piece which is not comprehensible as music for the sake of music.

Nor did one feel after hearing it especially familiar with the Strauss family in its home. As music, except for the overuse of full orchestra charactertisic of the composer, this is likely to prove permanently valuable. Yesterday's performance was unusually good, and the audience applauded so cordially as to cause Mr Monteux to bid the players rise in acknowledgment.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture was not played with quite the superlative deftness it demands. This is both a great classic and a great show piece. Liszt's "Tasso" is mostly sheer claptrap, composed with one eye on the audience. To make it effective claptrap the vehemence of a Mengelberg is needed. Mr Monteux is too conscientious and not nervous enough to do "Tasso" justice. Yet yesterday's applause began before the music had quite ceased.

Next week Pablo Casals will play a Boccherini concerto; Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony" will be played for the first times in America; Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and the first of the two selections made by Ravel from his "Daphnis et Chloe" are the other numbers announced.

Hub Composer Wins Symphony Applause

Stuart Mason, Boston composer, conducted his new piece for orchestra, "Bergerie," at yesterday's Symphony concert and won a richly deserved ovation.

It proved to be a charming work, largely pastoral in manner, as the title suggested, with reminiscences of dances once regarded as classic. On the whole, it proved fully a delightful as any work by an American composer heard at Symphony concerts in recent years.

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra also won an ovation after the

---

SECOND SYMPHONY BRILLIANT CONCERT

Sibelius Work, Composition of High Originality, Receives Excellent Reading.

LEGINSKA SCORES SUCCESS

Assisting Soloist Proves Artist of Vital Force and Dynamic Personality in Liszt Hungarian Fantasia

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Ethel Leginska, pianist, as soloist, last evening played before a big audience at Infantry Hall. It was the orchestra's second concert here this season.

In a programme which offered much in variety and interest, two numbers stood out prominently. These were the Sibelius "Symphony in E-minor," a highly original work, which received a fine reading by M. Monteux, and the Liszt "Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes," that served as a vehicle for a tremendously vital and brilliant performance on the part of Miss Leginska.

This was the programme:

Overture to "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 1, Op. 39 .. Sibelius
  Andante ma non troppo
  Allegro energico
  Andante ma non troppo lento
  Allegro
  Finale (Quasi una Fantasia) Andante
  Allegro molto
Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-tunes, for Pianoforte and Orchestra .... Liszt
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
  a. Clouds
  b. Festivals
"Romeo Alone" and "Ball at the Capulets," from the Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 17 .... Berlioz

PLEASING OVERTURE

Although somewhat overshadowed in interest by the two numbers already mentioned, more than a passing word is due the performanve of the opening overture to "Der Freischutz". This old favorite which wears so well is obvious music. Its melodies and pleasing harmonies, which put little tax upon the listener's power of concentration, last evening seemed fresh and new. The men played it with a technical polish and spirit that made most welcome its inclusion in the programme.

The Sibelius Symphony is one of absorbing interest. In his handling of the orchestral voices the Finnish composer apparently is not a follower of other symphonists. He speaks in a musical language that it at once original and beautiful. Here is a mode of expression which fits the rugged grandeur of his northern home. The wild beauty, the storms, the perpetual struggle of man with nature are all compressed in the measures of this fascinating work. It is indeed an unfamiliar musical region to which the hearer is transported.

In this, his first symphony, Sibelius apparently has not used melody except in fragmentary form. Each movement is a constantly changing tone picture, in which in imagination one sees the outspread natural wonders of Finland. The orchestration is strikingly original and reveals strange, unaccustomed tonal tints.

FINE CONDUCTING

Hhat M. Monteux realizes the possibilities of the symphony's score was seen by the delightfully effective presentation of each movement. It was conducting marked by fine appreciative sense and musicianship. Responsiveness on the part of his men resulted in a very satisfying performance.

Ethel Leginska scored a big success in the Liszt Fantasia. It is hard to believe one's eyes and ears when this slender young woman performs her wonders at the keyboard. She is the personification of vital force, a remarkable personality.

The Fantasia is well suited to display this abounding temperament. It was played with tremendous fire, with unerring technique and with the delicacy which also is frequently demanded. The astonishing power of her tone is amply sufficient to balance in the struggle for mastery between solo instrument and orchestra that occurs so often in the course of this rather exciting piece. M. Monteux gave the artist excellent support. It was a performance that aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and at the close Leginska was recalled a half dozen times.

Two Debussy Nocturnes and the Berlioz excerpt were the other orchestral works played. They were presented in a manner in keeping with th artistic level set by the preceding numbers, the latter piece ending an unusually interesting concert.

A. F. P.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY IS PLAYED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Prov. News 12/21/23

Jan Sibelius's symphony in E minor, the first from the pen of this contemporary Finnish composer, was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. It is a weird but beautiful tale of the frozen wastelands of the North country, expressive of the long twilight, the barren tundras, the ice and snow clad mountains and plains, the terror striking blizzards and, penetrating all, the deadly cold that freezes the blood in the veins of the native.

It is a melancholy symphony, unlike any we have heard, but, withal, it has an enchanting sweetness in parts that holds the attention of the listener as some siren strain of the Ice Queen might, in a frozen palace beyond the Arctic circle. It is dramatic, with the chilly gorgeousness of tonal colors that crash and thunder, only to die away in a wailing echo of memories.

Ethel Leginska, pianiste, played Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Songs, accompanied by the orchestra. It was a clever interpretation of this most delightful portrait of the gay Hungarians at play. Liszt has written many spirited pieces, under varying forms of musical construction, but in few is there a happier theme than in the "Hungarian Fantasie," a succession of crashing chords and rippling, dancing gaieties of tone. Leginska plays with a sure finger, a keen appreciation of the value of shading her work and of fitting it into the very able support of the orchestra, which, in this number especially is very important in order to bring out the full beauty of it.

Opening the program was Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," a finely modeled number, calculated to put an audience in the right mental attitude for those which follow. In playing the overture first M. Monteux somewhat varied his usual practice in the Providence concerts, and one suspects it is because he does not like late comers to interrupt the symphony itself. The overture is almost religious in theme, in part, sweetly, solemnly beautiful.

Following the "Fantasia" there were two of DeBussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," two studies in wonderful tone effects, portraits, almost, etched in gray and white, in the first theme, somber and soft as the easily floating clouds, and gay, cheerful, eloquent in the second theme, as of happy gatherings of people at a fete.

Closing the program was Berlioz's "Romeo Alone," and "Ball at the Capulets," from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." This depicts the visit of Romeo to the great hall of the Capulets, where he has met Juliet, and, knowing that he cannot win her openly because of the bitter antagonism between his family and hers, he retires to meditate in the garden, later to return to the ballroom amid the gay throng, there to be recognized, but allowed to depart in peace, to wait Juliet in her garden. The theme is carried out to suit this plot, making a fine offering for the end.

[162]

Herald Dec 22

NINTH CONCERT IS COMPELLING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Strauss "Domestica" Impressive

MASON'S "BERGERIE" ADDS MUCH CHARM

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Strauss, Symphonia Domestica; Stuart Mason, Bergerie (Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers; Air pastorale; Gaillarde et Depart pour le pays du Tendre; first time; conducted by the composer), Liszt, Symphonic poem, "Lament and Triumph of Tasso."

There are some who think that the muse of Richard Strauss in this instance should have exercised birth-control.

We cannot subscribe to this opinion. With or without a program, this Symphony contains pages of appropriately homely and wholesome sentiment; pages of glowing beauty; pages that are exciting and in the Straussian manner glorious. It is true that there are also bombastic pages, sound and fury, that, if there is reference to a program, the journal of events in a German apartment, are absurdly incongruous.

Following the program reverently, one would say at the end of the performance: "There were terrible doings in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Strauss. Why did not the neighbors call in the police?"

This "Domestic" Symphony had been played at concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra four times. The last performance was in 1912. Never was the music on the whole so impressive, so compelling, so persuasive as it was yesterday led by Mr. Monteux and played emotionally and superbly by the orchestra. It is true that the weaker pages—they are at the same time among the most pretentious—showed their inherent weakness, for not even Mr. Monteux and the orchestra can supply ideas that the composer lacks or glorify fuss and feathers. It is true that as a complete work of art the Symphony is not equal to Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan." But forgetting all about "the easy going husband," the "lively" wife, the parents gloating over their presumably interesting baby, the morning bath—an unusual event in Germany—the dispute over the future of the boy—forgetting that Richard Strauss had a wife, baby, an apartment and that the family was astir at 7 A. M.—one can enjoy, praise be moved and excited by many pages in this supposedly autobiographical work.

Mr. Mason's "Bergerie" is charming music, music to be played at an exhibition of Watteau's paintings. George Moore said long ago of Thomas Hardy that in his early novels he tried to show how "jolly country" he could be. The sneer came from envy rather than discriminating criticism. Mr. Mason did not fall into the error of attempting to be more 18th century than Couperin and Rameau. He says in his modest note contributed to the Program Book, "I did not intend to imitate 18th century music, although I suppose the the general style of that music may have been in my mind as I wrote."

Fortunately Mr. Mason, having musical ideas of his own, having a poetic nature, appreciating the 18th century, caught the spirit of it. Educated largely in Paris, he has not been disturbed by the frantic endeavors of the ultra-modern school to make the bourgeois sit up in wonder. He knows the value of clearness, simplicity, directness, logical sequence. His orchestral scores are never gaudy; his music has demi-tints as well as exquisite colors. Writing for a small orchestra, knowing the admirable qualities of the virtuosos who were to play his "Bergerie," he wrote for them cunningly, without sacrificing to mere individual display. It would be hard to say which one of the three movements is the most delightful: The call to the peasants—nor Zola's, but those of the old France of legend, song and art, and the Sarabande tinged with tender melancholy; the beautiful air for the English horn; or the departure for Cythera, with its finely imagined ending. It is a pleasure to add that the Suite was warmly appreciated. Mr. Mason, who conducted unostentatiously but effectively, was recalled several times.

That wonder of overtures, "The Magic Flute" was played as Mozart's music should be played—and with some conductors this is not always the case. An eloquent performance of Liszt's "Tasso," which does not grow old, brought the end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Boccherini, Concerto for Violoncello (Pablo Casals); Bliss, "Color" Symphony (first time in America); Ravel, Fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe" (Nocturne Interlude, Danse Guerriere).

Post Dec 22

SYMPHONY REVIVES A STRAUSS

His Tone Poem on Family Life Enjoyed After 11 Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its ninth programme of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, presenting Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," Stuart Mason's suite, "Bergerie," and Liszt's "Tasso." The programme will be repeated this evening.

REAL MUSIC IN STRAUSS

Fifteen or 20 years ago the "Domestica" and its predecessors, notably "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Heldenleben," were both laughed at and hissed, as mere shrieking discord. Times move. Today it seems odd that such things should have happened; almost as odd as that Beethoven's later works should have been denounced as violating all the sacred rules of music. Strauss is no longer the bad boy of music; we've seen lots of worse behaved youngsters since. The question of interest today is, has his music lasting quality?

Definite answer to such questions can be given only 100 years or so after the composer's time. Yet by the evidence of yesterday's performance, there is real music in the "Domestica." One wishes the composer had stuck to his refusal to allow a programme to be given out for this and his other symphonic poems, for it seems that his work not only ought to have to stand as pure music, but should have a better chance of life so considered.

Invention and Imagination

The story of the "Domestica" is not difficult to follow in the playing; but besides being in questionable taste it impairs enjoyment of the music as music. To find passages of such sustained melodic and harmonic beauty as occur in the adagio, you will have to go back as far as Wagner; and in spite of the sneers of Strauss' detractors, there is invention, imagination and scholarship in this score. Why, then, confuse it, or allow it to be confused, with a programme which at most can only amuse briefly? The performance was magnificent, and the warm applause was shared by Mr. Monteux with the men.

Mr. Mason's suite received its first performance, and was conducted by the composer, who is a well-known and highly accomplished local musician. According to Mr. Mason's statement printed in the programme book, he did not intend to imitate 18th century music, "although I suppose that the general style of that music may have been in my mind as I wrote." Evidently it was, because the conception and treatment of the work are quite in the 18th century French spirit.

Originality Impresses

But that is nothing against the suite. Rather, it is a distinct accomplishment to write in that vein in the nineteen-twenties, eschewing modern developments, and still give an impression of originality. And that is what Mr. Mason has done here.

The work has less of obvious modern appeal than the composer's Rhapsody on a Persian air, performed two years ago at the Symphony concerts and again this fall by the People's Symphony, but it has no less distinctive an air. Of the three sections, the first, "Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers," with its delightful spirit of play, had the strongest pull at a first hearing. The "Air Pastorale," beautifully played on Mr. Speyer's English horn, and echoed by the other woodwind, is pleasing, but yesterday seemed somewhat to drag.

We suspect that this movement and the third would have profited by the authoritative guidance of Mr. Monteux. It is no reflection on Mr. Mason, any more than on a visiting conductor from abroad, to say that the man who created the orchestra in its present estate obtains the best results from it. The number was cordially received by the audience.

The Mozart overture was played with the orchestra's customary eloquence, but Liszt was as tiresome as usual. What other composer can make an orchestra work so hard to so little effect?

Globe Dec 22

MASON'S 'BERGERIE' AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Composer Conducts Own Music

Stuart Mason, for some years past a well-known figure in Boston musical circles, conducted the first public performance of his own "Bergerie" for orchestra at yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Mason's music, which is individually imagined and delicately wrought, was cordially received.

Mr Monteux revived Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," unheard here in a dozen years. He also included two familiar repertory pieces, Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and Liszt's "Tasso" on a program altered from the last week's advance announcement by the unexplained omission of Handel's concerto grosso.

Mr Mason has been assistant conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra for three seasons. His conducting yesterday was far from amateurish. The little suite which he calls "Bergerie" has subtitles, of which "Gaillard et Depart pour le Pays du Tendre" is a specimen that sufficiently indicates the character of the music. One of the pastimes of the 17th and 18 century French salons was the sketching of maps of "le Pays du Tendre," which can be only lamely translated as "The Region of Affection." This utterly artifical yet carefully graceful tracing of "oceans of despair, caverns of neglect, groves of bliss," and so on, had its counterpart in tone in Mr Mason's music.

He has not attempted archeological reproduction of 18th century music. He has caught the tone of it, rendered the mood of it, and produced a delightful and wholly new species of American composition, akin to such recent European works as Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Courperin" and Strauss' suite written for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," and not markedly inferior to these celebrated examples. Mr Mason has extraordinary tact and taste in music. He makes no sins of commission.

Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is as music perfectly straightforward and transparently clear. The only ambiguity about it is in the various program explanations. The listener may enjoy it as music, however, without worrying as to precisely which measure represents the baby's bath. Except for the clock striking 7 twice during the symphony, there is nothing in the piece which is not comprehensible as music for the sake of music.

Nor did one feel after hearing it especially familiar with the Strauss family in its home. As music, except for the overuse of full orchestra charactertisic of the composer, this is likely to prove permanently valuable. Yesterday's performance was unusually good, and the audience applauded so cordially as to cause Mr Monteux to bid the players rise in acknowledgment.

Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture was not played with quite the superlative deftness it demands. This is both a great classic and a great show piece. Liszt's "Tasso" is mostly sheer claptrap, composed with one eye on the audience. To make it effective claptrap the vehemence of a Mengelberg is needed. Mr Monteux is too conscientious and not nervous enough to do "Tasso" justice. Yet yesterday's applause began before the music had quite ceased.

Next week Pablo Casals will play a Boccherini concerto; Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony" will be played for the first times in America; Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and the first of the two selections made by Ravel from his "Daphnis et Chloe" are the other numbers announced.

Hub Composer Wins Symphony Applause

Stuart Mason, Boston composer, conducted his new piece for orchestra, "Bergerie," at yesterday's Symphony concert and won a richly deserved ovation.

It proved to be a charming work largely pastoral in manner, as the title suggested, with reminiscences of dances once regarded as classic. On the whole, it proved fully a delightful as any work by an American composer heard at Symphony concerts in recent years.

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra also won an ovation after the

---

SECOND SYMPHONY BRILLIANT CONCERT

Sibelius Work, Composition of High Originality, Receives Excellent Reading.

LEGINSKA SCORES SUCCESS

Assisting Soloist Proves Artist of Vital Force and Dynamic Personality in Liszt Hungarian Fantasia

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, with Ethel Leginska, pianist, as soloist, last evening played before a big audience at Infantry Hall. It was the orchestra's second concert here this season.

In a programme which offered much in variety and interest, two numbers stood out prominently. These were the Sibelius "Symphony in E-minor," a highly original work, which received a fine reading by M. Monteux, and the Liszt "Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes," that served as a vehicle for a tremendously vital and brilliant performance on the part of Miss Leginska.

This was the programme:

Overture to "Der Freischutz"..........Weber
Symphony in E-minor, No. 1, Op. 39..Sibelius
  Andante ma non troppo
  Allegro energico
  Andante ma non troppo lento
  Allegro
  Finale (Quasi una Fantasia) Andante
  Allegro molto
Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-tunes, for Pianoforte and Orchestra..........Liszt
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
  a. Clouds
  b. Festivals
"Romeo Alone" and "Ball at the Capulets," from the Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 17 ....Berlios

PLEASING OVERTURE

Although somewhat overshadowed in interest by the two numbers already mentioned, more than a passing word is due the performanve of the opening overture to "Der Freischutz". This old favorite which wears so well is obvious music. Its melodies and pleasing harmonies, which put little tax upon the listener's power of concentration, last evening seemed fresh and new. The men played it with a technical polish and spirit that made most welcome its inclusion in the programme.

The Sibelius Symphony is one of absorbing interest. In his handling of the orchestral voices the Finnish composer apparently is not a follower of other symphonists. He speaks in a musical language that it at once original and beautiful. Here is a mode of expression which fits the rugged grandeur of his northern home. The wild beauty, the storms, the perpetual struggle of man with nature are all compressed in the measures of this fascinating work. It is indeed an unfamiliar musical region to which the hearer is transported.

In this, his first symphony, Sibelius apparently has not used melody except in fragmentary form. Each movement is a constantly changing tone picture, in which in imagination one sees the outspread natural wonders of Finland. The orchestration is strikingly original and reveals strange, unaccustomed tonal tints.

FINE CONDUCTING

Hhat M. Monteux realizes the possibilities of the symphony's score was seen by the delightfully effective presentation of each movement. It was conducting marked by fine appreciative sense and musicianship. Responsiveness on the part of his men resulted in a very satisfying performance.

Ethel Leginska scored a big success in the Liszt Fantasia. It is hard to believe one's eyes and ears when this slender young woman performs her wonders at the keyboard. She is the personification of vital force, a remarkable personality.

The Fantasia is well suited to display this abounding temperament. It was played with tremendous fire, with unerring technique and with the delicacy which also is frequently demanded. The astonishing power of her tone is amply sufficient to balance in the struggle for mastery between solo instrument and orchestra that occurs so often in the course of this rather exciting piece. M. Monteux gave the artist excellent support. It was a performance that aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and at the close Leginska was recalled a half dozen times.

Two Debussy Nocturnes and the Berlioz excerpt were the other orchestral works played. They were presented in a manner in keeping with th artistic level set by the preceding numbers, the latter piece ending an unusually interesting concert.

A. F. P.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY IS PLAYED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Prov. News 12/21/23

Jan Sibelius's symphony in E minor, the first from the pen of this contemporary Finnish composer, was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. It is a weird but beautiful tale of the frozen wastelands of the North country, expressive of the long twilight, the barren tundras, the ice and snow clad mountains and plains, the terror striking blizzards and, penetrating all, the deadly cold that freezes the blood in the veins of the native.

It is a melancholy symphony, unlike any we have heard, but, withal, it has an enchanting sweetness in parts that holds the attention of the listener as some siren strain of the Ice Queen might, in a frozen palace beyond the Arctic circle. It is dramatic, with the chilly gorgeousness of tonal colors that crash and thunder, only to die away in a wailing echo of memories.

Ethel Leginska, pianiste, played Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Songs, accompanied by the orchestra. It was a clever interpretation of this most delightful portrait of the gay Hungarians at play. Liszt has written many spirited pieces, under varying forms of musical construction, but in few is there a happier theme than in the "Hungarian Fantasie," a succession of crashing chords and rippling, dancing gaieties of tone. Leginska plays with a sure finger, a keen appreciation of the value of shading her work and of fitting it into the very able support of the orchestra, which, in this number especially is very important in order to bring out the full beauty of it.

Opening the program was Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz," a finely modeled number, calculated to put an audience in the right mental attitude for those which follow. In playing the overture first M. Monteux somewhat varied his usual practice in the Providence concerts, and one suspects it is because he does not like late comers to interrupt the symphony itself. The overture is almost religious in theme, in part, sweetly, solemnly beautiful.

Following the "Fantasia" there were two of DeBussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," two studies in wonderful tone effects, portraits, almost, etched in gray and white, in the first theme, somber and soft as the easily floating clouds, and gay, cheerful, eloquent in the second theme, as of happy gatherings of people at a fete.

Closing the program was Berlioz's "Romeo Alone," and "Ball at the Capulets," from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." This depicts the visit of Romeo to the great hall of the Capulets, where he has met Juliet, and, knowing that he cannot win her openly because of the bitter antagonism between his family and hers, he retires to meditate in the garden, later to return to the ballroom amid the gay throng, there to be recognized, but allowed to depart in peace, to wait Juliet in her garden. The theme is carried out to suit this plot, making a fine offering for the end.

University
Medical school professor of became dean of Medical School
years old.

Mrs. Da
Mrs.
Florence, Italy, a extending learned,
of Dr.
Brown

[162]

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Transcript 8

Symphony

THREE PRELUDES, SUPER-CONCERTO, ONE TONE-POEM

MR. MONTEUX SETS A SINGULAR PROGRAMME

The Symphony Orchestra Revives Overtures of Dukas and Paine—A Fragment of Wagner, Ravel's "Waltz," and All in Signal Performance—Again Bauer Joins Hands with Brahms

THERE is current a story that the success of Arnold Bax's striking piano piece "In a Vodka Shop" prompted Paul Dukas, long embittered by the emphasis laid upon his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," to warn the young Britisher that he, too, might become known as a man of one composition. Dukas's foreboding has come to naught. Bax's present celebrity rests not upon one piece but upon many pieces—for voice, for orchestra, for string-quartet and for divers other instruments and combinations of instruments. But Dukas's own fate still lies heavily upon him. Friends and champions may insist that his Symphony or "La Peri" or the opera "Ariane et Barbe-Blue" is his chef d'oeuvre: to all these things the general public remains relatively cold, the while it still warms to "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It seems indeed that it is only in that witty and brilliant piece that Dukas has said that which is peculiarly his own. In his other music is much that is noble, eloquent, imaginative or charming, but how often does it echo the voices of other men—of Wagner perhaps, or of Debussy.

As first number upon the programme of the Symphony Concerts of yesterday and today stands Dukas's Overture to Corneille's "Polyeucte." In a few opening measures and recurringly throughout the piece Dukas's music evokes the grave and lofty mood appropriate to this tragedy of Christian martyrdom. For the rest the concerns and difficulties of music-making monopolize unduly the composer's attention: he seems even to forget his thesis. In the writing of his Overtures to "Egmont" and "Coriolanus," Beethoven kept his hero and his hero's destiny ever before his eyes. Through the pages of one stalks the Hollander; across the other falls always the shadow of the mighty Roman. Hearing Dukas's "Polyeucte" one may be less engrossed with the drama it would conjure up than distracted by reminiscences and troubled by inconsequentialities. The programme-book relates that at its first performance in Paris in 1892 this Overture was hissed and that its musical ideas "were thought to be obscure and their developments confused." Since then the world has moved apace—and so far as press and public were concerned France in the early nineties was still a land of musical darkness, ignorance and bigotry. In point of fact the two chief melodies of this Overture are singularly outspoken. And in degree they have physiognomy, but the one recalls Wagner, the other in its mellifluousness hints at Gounod.

Knick Press Nov 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS FINE PROGRAM

Smoothness and Brilliance Characterize Rendition of Four Numbers.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played one of its finest programs last night at Harmanus Bleecker hall; giving to its readings of four numbers that smoothness, brilliance and perfection of ensemble that has given to the organization a place of its own in orchestral history in America.

An audience of immense size that had sat entranced with compositions of Smetana, Beethoven and Saint-Saens, heard in the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera of that name, a marvelous exhibition of bizarre musical interpretation. The savagery of the lustful daughter of Herodias; the wild wailings of a perverse creature, and the sensuous swirl of her dance of death are interpreted in manipulations and combinations, principally of wind instruments, up to a tremendous climax; saturnalia of wierd musical phrases. Pierre Monteux led his men through this number so as to give the impression of a Satanic horde loosing in music its evil thoughts. Strauss is a master of strange melodic combinations, and he has reached the summit of them in this strange and fascinating composition.

The overture to "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana, is a refreshing brilliance of musical fancies, with some charming arrangements for wind and strings, and a reading by the conductor which brings out all the whimsical humor of what has been called a "comedy overture."

Beethoven's symphony in A major in four movements has been described as many things by musical commentators, but to the layman it is a gracious, beautiful benediction of tone. The orchestra gave to the audience every musical mood in its interpretation, with some rare passages in the second movement; a sprightly reading of the third and a massing of lovely effects in the last.

Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, played the concerto in C minor of Saint-Saens with orchestral accompaniment. He is one of the best grounded of piano artists, and his interpretation of this difficult concerto was masterly in its command of keyboard possibilites. The applause at the end was masterly in its command of keyboard possibilities. The applause at the end was the most enthusiastic of the evening, and many in the audience seemed to forget the unbreakable rule of the Boston Symphony concerning encores, for they clamored for more.

Pierre Monteux is closing his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony to return to his native France, and it is doubtful if his successor will erase any memories of Monteux' splendid readings; his perfect command of his men or his gracious personality. The concert last night was under the Albany direction of Ben Franklin.—W. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD Globe

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS AT THE EMPIRE DEC. 30

Fall River music lovers will receive with extraordinary interest the announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra has been engaged by the Fall River Woman's Club for a concert at the Empire theatre, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 30, at 3, because of the opportunity it will give them to meet for perhaps the last time Pierre Monteux, the world-famous leader of that equally famous musical organization, For Monteux has announced his intention of retiring at the end of the current season.

Pierre Monteux

World Famous Leader of Great Musical Organization

Of the many qualities which have placed Monteux in the front rank of world's great orchestra leaders, two are outstanding in their appeal. One of them is his quiet persistency and infinite patience with the players under him. The other is the careful and discerning thought which he devotes to the selection of his programs, to have them well balanced and interesting, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. Thus, Monteux has won in his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both the affection and respect of his players and the grateful approval of his audiences.

The program selected for the concert at the Empire on the Sunday after Christmas is a splendid example of the finesse with which he selects his program. His first number will be Tachaikovky's Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" in B minor, Opus 74. After an intermission of 10 minutes, he will present Lohengrin's Narrative from Wagner's "Lohengrin" (Act III, Scene III); to be followed by Ravel's chorographic poem, "La Valse." Then another Wagner number—Walther's prize song from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg" (Act III, Scene II.) The finale will be a Liszt number—"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3, after Lamartine.

Richard Crooks, the young tenor whose meteoric rise has been nothing short of sensational, will be the soloist for the concert. The warmth and sparkling brilliance of tone which American critics have attributed to Crooks will be heard in all their freshness, and the Fall River public will no doubt relish this first opportunity to pass judgment upon this new arrival.

STRASSBURGER DROPS HIRAM JOHNSON TO SUPPORT COOLIDGE

Continued from Page One.

ernment has vindicated itself in the respect that the man it put into the White House is the man for the hour. The unequivocal tone of the President's message shows him to be above all a man of courage and conviction, a man who will never hesitate to tell his fellow-citizens exactly where he stands on any issue they raise. At this juncture of the country's affairs and the threatening of bi-partisan Government, it would be unfortunate and dangerous to have one who, through pandering to minority blocks or avoidance of issues would seek to gain political advantage thereby. The sentiment of the country undoubtedly demands after the flood of war-time propaganda that its representatives in public office should return to concise truth and accurate statement.

"But there is not only courage and conviction in President Coolidge's message. There is the highest degree of statesmanship and practical wisdom. The message is one to inspire absolute confidence that a broad-minded, far-seeing man, sits in the White House and no presidential utterance of recent years has more strikingly demonstrated that Mr. Coolidge has met hi test and won the approval of his countrymen. Only one conclusion can be drawr after this mesage has been made public that is the man who should direct th affairs of this nation for the next four year is Calvin Coolidge."

Accompanying the statement was a cop of the leading editorial from the Times Herald of yesterday, declaring that th first message of the President is a strik ing illustration of "this nation's good for tune" in having Mr. Coolidge in the Whit House. "The Times-Herald" the editori concludes "takes this opportunity of sta ing its unequivocal support of Preside Coolidge's aims and aspirations."

Again no mention whatsoever is mad of Senator Johnson. Mr. Strassburger's r markable change of position, politicia say weakens Senator Johnson in Pennsy vania and makes more certain that t President will have the bulk of the de gates from the State to the National co vention.

IMPORTED ENGLISH
CALENDARS
Replicas of Oil Paintings
SEE THEM
THEY ARE UNUSUAL
75c to $2.00
HILL, SMITH & CO., Inc.
The Stationery Shop
8 Milk Street, Boston
(R)

Hiram Johnson Says He Is Well Satisfied with Progre

New York, Dec. 8—Senator Hiram Johnson of California left for Washingt today after a busy three days here in co ference with political leaders. He express himself as well satisfied with the progre of his presidential plans in the East.

Headquarters for the country east Chicago, consisting of a suite of six roon has been opened in the Times square se tion. There is a large force of office wor ers, including a publicity department.

Senator Johnson said he probably w

[163]

ued on Following Page

Transcript 8

Symphony

THREE PRELUDES, SUPER-CONCERTO, ONE TONE-POEM

MR. MONTEUX SETS A SINGULAR PROGRAMME

The Symphony Orchestra Revives Overtures of Dukas and Paine—A Fragment of Wagner, Ravel's "Waltz," and All in Signal Performance—Again Bauer Joins Hands with Brahms

THERE is current a story that the success of Arnold Bax's striking piano piece "In a Vodka Shop" prompted Paul Dukas, long embittered by the emphasis laid upon his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," to warn the young Britisher that he, too, might become known as a man of one composition. Dukas's foreboding has come to naught. Bax's present celebrity rests not upon one piece but upon many pieces—for voice, for orchestra, for string-quartet and for divers other instruments and combinations of instruments. But Dukas's own fate still lies heavily upon him. Friends and champions may insist that his Symphony or "La Peri" or the opera "Ariane et Barbe-Blue" is his chef d'oeuvre: to all these things the general public remains relatively cold, the while it still warms to "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It seems indeed that it is only in that witty and brilliant piece that Dukas has said that which is peculiarly his own. In his other music is much that is noble, eloquent, imaginative or charming, but how often does it echo the voices of other men—of Wagner perhaps, or of Debussy.

As first number upon the programme of the Symphony Concerts of yesterday and today stands Dukas's Overture to Corneille's "Polyeucte." In a few opening measures and recurringly throughout the piece Dukas's music evokes the grave and lofty mood appropriate to this tragedy of Christian martyrdom. For the rest the concerns and difficulties of music-making monopolize unduly the composer's attention: he seems even to forget his thesis. In the writing of his Overtures to "Egmont" and "Coriolanus," Beethoven kept his hero and his hero's destiny ever before his eyes. Through the pages of one stalks the Hollander; across the other falls always the shadow of the mighty Roman. Hearing Dukas's "Polyeucte" one may be less engrossed with the drama it would conjure up than distracted by reminiscences and troubled by inconsequentialities. The programme-book relates that at its first performance in Paris in 1892 this Overture was hissed and that its musical ideas "were thought to be obscure and their developments confused." Since then the world has moved apace—and so far as press and public were concerned France in the early nineties was still a land of musical darkness, ignorance and bigotry. In point of fact the two chief melodies of this Overture are singularly outspoken. And in degree they have physiognomy, but the one recalls Wagner, the other in its mellifluousness hints at Gounod. "Polyeucte" in 1923 is not a perplexing but a safe and placid music, well constructed, soundly scored, here and there rising to beauty, albeit a beauty that falls a little short of true distinction and that just misses felicity of characterization.

Almost a concert of preludes was that of yesterday, since besides Dukas's piece the programme listed both the Introduction to the third act of "Tristan" and Paine's musical preface to the "Œdipus" of Sophocles. To discuss this last piece is but to repeat in substance that which was written in this place concerning its performance in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. Professor Paine produced here no masterwork, but neither did he make a mere scholarly and substantial pièce d'occasion. Something of the might and the awesomeness of Sophocles's tragedy does actually inform these pages—enough thereof indeed to lead the hearer to forget and to forgive the measure of academic routine. Few enough are the pieces written in America today that forty-two years from now will sound as fresh as did this Prelude yesterday. We are in danger of forgetting Paine. Not in many a day has music of his been heard in Boston. Yet though the first of our representative composers, he was by no means the least. In reviving the Prelude to "Œdipus" Mr. Monteux did well. Nor should the good work cease there. Recollection is ever and anon treacherous, but some yet remember kindly another Prelude by Professor Paine, that to the "Birds" of Aristophanes.

Not often does the Introduction to the final act of "Tristan" come to a hearing at the regular Symphony Concerts. Clearly, none the less, is this one of the fragments from the music-dramas that best rewards performance outside its place in the opera. It were a pity if here in Boston these excerpts were to be wholly relegated to the Pops or to concerts for the Pension Fund. Again yesterday, as so often when the name of Wagner is upon a programme, no other music played could match in eloquence those measures that etch the loneliness and desolation of the dying Tristan. In that long, ineffably melancholy solo for the English horn Wagner, with an unaccompanied melody, creates and sustains a mood as most composers may not do with a full orchestra.

Even among Wagner's own achievements this Introduction holds high place. Nowhere else in the whole range of music, orchestral or operatic, are the depths of human anguish and the heights of human exaltation set forth with a vividness so searching, with a power so compelling as in the last act of "Tristan and Isolde." The Prelude may not rack and lacerate as does many a passage in the actual course of the drama, yet it is here that Wagner sets the stage for that which follows. With the first groaning, throbbing chord may we feel Tristan's woe and know his doom. In those marvelous ascending thirds for the violins is brought before us the cold and cruel sea that divides Tristan from his beloved. What device of paint and canvas could make so graphic that expanse of lead-colored waters? Distance is there, and the hopelessness that distance may engender. And with this comes something more: the poignant theme of Tristan's suffering. Desolation, hopelessness and suffering are all three repeated with increased intensity; then there is wafted from the orchestra the shepherd's sorrowful melody. . . . "The old tune," moans the wounded Tristan as he hears it—"why wake to that?"

In yesterday's performance the playing of the shepherd's melody fell to Mr. Speyer, and none might utter it more beautifully, while before his portion in the music was reached Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had wrung from the Prelude all its sadness and yearning, even as they had previously disclosed to the full whatever of beauty or of vigor, of passion or of power inhabits the scores of "Polyeucte," of the Prelude to "Œdipus" and (with Mr. Bauer to aid) of the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms. Now turning from the grief-haunted measures of "Tristan" they could wholly abandon themselves to the seductive melodies and the intoxicating rhythms of Ravel's "La Valse." In reviewing the performances by conductor and band during this present season, superlative words of praise become commonplace.

Since together with Paine's Prelude the Concerto was heard in Cambridge and has, within twenty-four hours, been comprehensively discussed in these columns, there is again no call for more than summary. In Symphony Hall, as in Sanders Theatre, neither the Concerto nor Mr. Bauer's surpassing performance of it might gain the effect of intimacy and consequent intensification that would alone illumine certain measures of themselves no longer valid nor even appealing. Yet through this long, yes over-long piece Mr. Bauer, as the trite phrase goes, held his audience. More, at the end he received the acclaim that might conceivably have been accorded a more displayful player of a more brilliant and showier composition. In this Concerto as in practically all his larger pieces, Brahms's inspiration and invention often droop and lag. He develops insignificant phrases; he reiterates well-nigh meaningless melodic figures. Yet even as the hearer's wits go wool-gathering through one of these arid stretches there comes a bit of ingratiating melody, a flash of tone or a new impulse of rhythm—and the composer is once more master of the situation. And if in yesterday's performance this Concerto might not convince, then indeed would it be meet to pronounce it faded past all redeeming. For if Brahms now and then nodded in the writing of it, pianist, conductor and orchestra were ceaselessly vigilant in its playing. Not a detail of the music but was shaped with a loving hand Could he have heard this performance, surely Brahms himself would have found it good.

The announcement that yesterday's programme was to contain Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," hitherto unheard at the Symphony Concerts, aroused pleasant anticipations. Yet it is doubtful whether that piece could have proved more enjoyable than the now familiar "La Valse" substituted for it at the eleventh hour. Ravel's detractors will have it that "La Valse" is Johann Strauss manqué, a feeble and futile echo of the true Wiener Waltzer. Even a Waltz by Waldteufel, they maintain, has more of verve and élan, a more alluring tunefulness. Here as elsewhere, however, there is room for two opinions. Although Ravel has purposely avoided the obvious and forthright contours of the unabashed Viennese Waltz, it is possible to feel that he has caught its spirit and captured its flavor better than has any other of the successors of Johann the second, not even excepting Richard of "Der Rosenkavalier," while the Waltz King could bedeck his tunes with no such ravishing instrumental dress nor could he bring to play upon them in such wise the resources of harmony and counterpoint. So ingratiating is "La Valse," in the eyes of its admirers, that one instinctively suspects its ultimate value. Things which are too immediately agreeable almost always bear within them the seeds of evanescence. But why enquire too closely into the possible permanence or impermanence of "La Valse?" If it lives the world is so much the richer; if it fades and languishes some future Ravel may fashion a piece of like beguilement to tickle the ears and delight the hearts of our children or our grandchildren Sufficient for us that we gather such tonal rosebuds while we may.

W. S. S.

Knick Press Nov 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS FINE PROGRAM

Smoothness and Brilliance Characterize Rendition of Four Numbers.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played one of its finest programs last night at Harmanus Bleecker hall; giving to its readings of four numbers that smoothness, brilliance and perfection of ensemble that has given to the organization a place of its own in orchestral history in America.

An audience of immense size that had sat entranced with compositions of Smetana, Beethoven and Saint-Saens, heard in the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera of that name, a marvelous exhibition of bizarre musical interpretation. The savagery of the lustful daughter of Herodias; the wild wailings of a perverse creature, and the sensuous swirl of her dance of death are interpreted in manipulations and combinations, principally of wind instruments, up to a tremendous climax, saturnalia of wierd musical phrases. Pierre Monteux led his men through this number so as to give the impression of a Satanic horde loosing in music its evil thoughts. Strauss is a master of strange melodic combinations, and he has reached the summit of them in this strange and fascinating composition.

The overture to "The Bartered Bride" of Smetana, is a refreshing brilliance of musical fancies, with some charming arrangements for wind and strings, and a reading by the conductor which brings out all the whimsical humor of what has been called a "comedy overture."

Beethoven's symphony in A major in four movements has been described as many things by musical commentators, but to the layman it is a gracious, beautiful benediction of tone. The orchestra gave to the audience every musical mood in its interpretation, with some rare passages in the second movement; a sprightly reading of the third and a massing of lovely effects in the last.

Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, played the concerto in C minor of Saint-Saens with orchestral accompaniment. He is one of the best grounded of piano artists, and his interpretation of this difficult concerto was masterly in its command of keyboard possibilites. The applause at the end was masterly in its command of keyboard possibilities. The applause at the end was the most enthusiastic of the evening, and many in the audience seemed to forget the unbreakable rule of the Boston Symphony concerning encores, for they clamored for more.

Pierre Monteux is closing his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony to return to his native France, and it is doubtful if his successor will erase any memories of Monteux' splendid readings; his perfect command of his men or his gracious personality. The concert last night was under the Albany direction of Ben Franklin.—W. H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS AT THE EMPIRE DEC. 30

Fall River music lovers will receive with extraordinary interest the announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra has been engaged by the Fall River Woman's Club for a concert at the Empire theatre, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 30, at 3, because of the opportunity it will give them to meet for perhaps the last time Pierre Monteux, the world-famous leader of that equally famous musical organization, For Monteux has announced his intention of retiring at the end of the current season.

Pierre Monteux

World Famous Leader of Great Musical Organization

Of the many qualities which have placed Monteux in the front rank of world's great orchestra leaders, two are outstanding in their appeal. One of them is his quiet persistency and infinite patience with the players under him. The other is the careful and discerning thought which he devotes to the selection of his programs, to have them well balanced and interesting, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. Thus, Monteux has won in his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, both the affection and respect of his players and the grateful approval of his audiences.

The program selected for the concert at the Empire on the Sunday after Christmas is a splendid example of the finesse with which he selects his program. His first number will be

---

Pledges to the Symphony Concerts Now Touch $58,000

Additional Subscribers and Three Balance Sheets

AT noon of Tuesday last, when the subscriptions to the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Concerts through the current season were tabulated for the programme-book, they amounted to $58,706 of the desired $95,000. [illegible] the last report was made, the following subscribers were added to the list already published:

Aubin, Margaret H.
Barrett, Mrs. William E.
Berwick-Walker, Clara
Burnham, Helen C.
Burnham, M. C.
Case, Louise W.
Chapin, Mabel H.
Crafts, Mrs. George P.
Cushing, Sarah P.
Cutler, Mrs. C. H.
Cutler, Elisabeth A.
Day, Mrs. Henry B.
Eaton Miss B. L.
Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. William
Ely, Elizabeth B.
Endicott, S. C.
Farlow, Mrs. William G.
Fisher, Edith
Fisher, Frances B.
Gaston, Mrs. W. A.
Gilmore, Mrs. G. L.
Greenfield, Joseph Baram
Griswold, Roger
Harrington, Mrs. Francis B.
Harris, Frances K.
Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George
Heilman, William C.
Ivers, Ella F.
Jordan, Helen L.
Lee, Mr. and Mrs. James S.
Lombard, Mrs. Ephraim
Manning, Mr. and Mrs. Earl G.
Milliken, Mrs. James I.
McMichael, Mrs. L. G.
Parker, Mrs. Edward L.
Peabody, Mrs. H. Rodman
Putnam, Mrs. James J.
Putnam, Marion C.
Rantoul, Harriet C.
Richardson, Mrs. Charles F.
Sears, Mrs. Montgomery
Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Richard D.
Shaw, Mrs. Henry S., Jr.
Shepard, Mrs. Willis S.
Sortwell, Mrs. A. F.
Staniford, Mrs. Daniel
Stanton, Katharine
Turner, Nellie B.
Warren, Mr. and Mrs. E. R.
Watson, Mrs. Thomas R.
Wright, A. M.

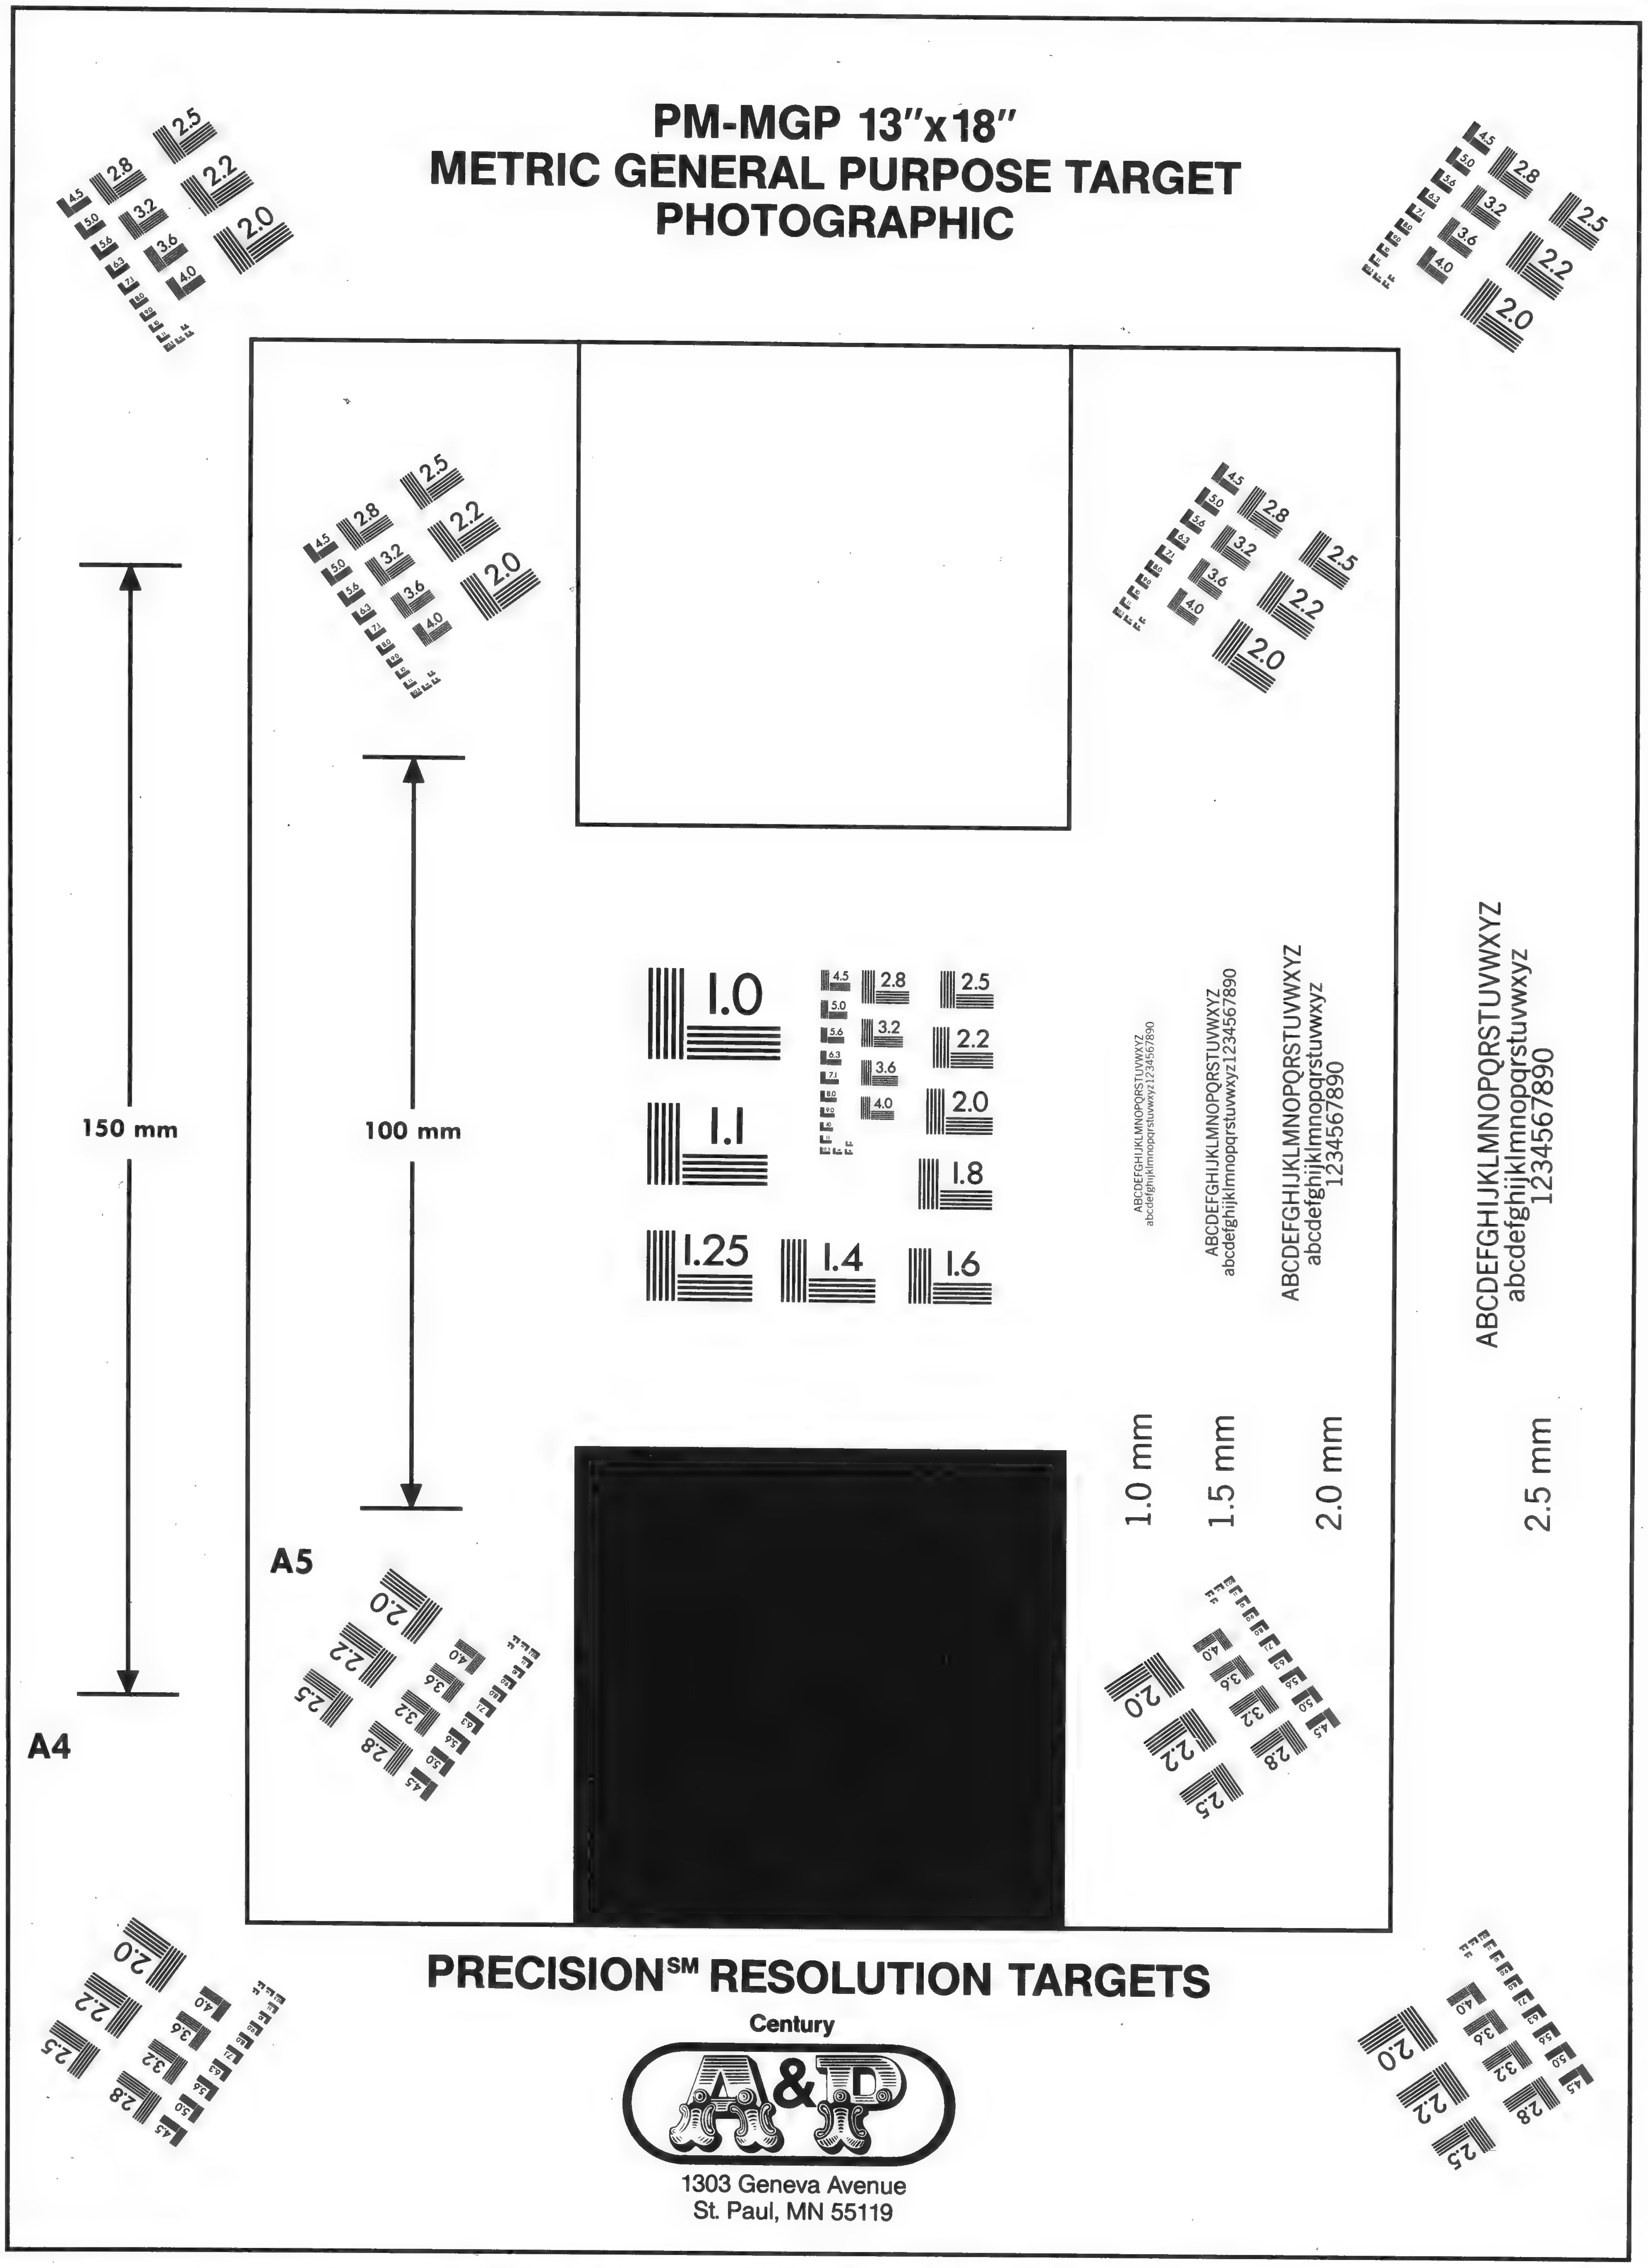
There is reason to believe that of all the orchestras in the United States the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most economically managed. Not a dollar is spent that is unnecessary to the maintenance in every direction of its established standards—for conductor, personnel, repertory, quality of performance, general seemliness. As witness to this prudence, the Trustees now submit these balance-sheets for the years ending July 31, 1921, 1922, 1923. In their view both the subscribers and the public of the Symphony Concerts are entitled to this information. Studied, it should also stir the doubting to make their pledges.

RECEIPTS:	1921	1922	1923
Gross Income from Concerts	$411,275.10	$407,642.32	$423,872.92
Symphony Hall Rents, etc.	90,582.98	91,007.30	95,849.02
Programmes	39,466.59	35,224.73	39,519.09
Sale of Bound Volumes	228.00	180.00	265.00
Interest on Bank Balances	2,679.62	1,173.56	1,412.86
Sundry Receipts	76.55		334.26
OPERATING INCOME	$544,308.84	$535,177.91	$561,253.15
Income Endowment Fund and Interest	2,512.68	5,865.44	6,934.06
TOTAL INCOME	$546,821.52	$541,043.35	$568,187.21
NET LOSS	118,578.47	91,673.88	76,351.93
	$665,399.99	$632,717.23	$644,539.14

PAYMENTS:	1921	1922	1923
Expense of concerts, rent, travelling expenses, soloists, etc.	$190,423.01	$158,101.19	$170,366.58
Symphony Hall Maintenance	93,150.24	95,174.98	98,643.13
Programmes	37,088.44	29,618.88	32,286.30
Orchestra Salaries	299,908.25	308,150.78	308,124.21
Other Salaries	29,245.25	28,928.13	29,885.00
Insurance	1,897.32	1,833.04	1,845.14
Music	2,605.18	2,095.10	2,122.54
Interest on Notes	272.95	569.34	941.90
Sundry Expense	10,814.40	8,245.84	5,324.28
	$665,399.99	$632,717.23	$644,539.14

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

[164]

NEW EARS AND NEW MINDS FOR "THE DOMESTICA"

MR. MONTEUX PLAYS STRAUSS'S TONE-POEM

After Eleven Years the Music Renews Itself in Power and Beauty, Always from the Mind, at Need and Will from the Heart — Revealing and Eloquent Performance—Mozart for Prelude, Liszt for Postlude, and the Artifice of Stuart Mason Between

TIME winnows and clarifies. To hear Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—sixteen years after the first performance in Boston, eleven after the most recent repetition—was to hear only the intrinsic and enduring voice of the music. In those distant days, as now they seem, much breath and much derision were wasted upon what purported to be the details of the piece. Here was the child bathed and bedded; there it crowed or whined. Now were the father and the mother smiling beatifically upon their offspring; again they were in vigorous dispute about its upbringing. Through sundry periods, He was at his work in high zest of creation; through others love and passion stirred within Him. Over these pages sported the wife capricious and teasing; over those she moved considerate and tender. There were times to smile in the progress of the "Symphonia Domestica"; times also to experience graver emotions.

Upon these things that repository of learning, the programme-book, discoursed yesterday, as it had in 1907 and 1912 Many re-read its sayings, taking the pleasure of reminiscent curiosity. Few, however—it is almost safe to believe—took thought of them in the actual hearing of the tone-poem. By the inscrutable processes of time "The Domestica" has become the "absolute" music that, as some say, Strauss designed and wrought. To hold the audience of Friday intent through forty minutes, it needed no more "programme" than the few chapter-heads set by the composer himself. They scarcely outnumber those that Beethoven strewed upon his "Pastoral Symphony."

Rising Slowly

Subscriptions for the Week to the Guarantee Fund of the Symphony Concerts.

BY report in the programme-book of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, the Guarantee Fund to meet the deficit in the working of the orchestra for the current season, now stands at $64,894.34 of a desired $95,000; while the Endowment Fund has risen to $145,953.52. The additional subscribers to the Guarantee Fund are:

Beebe, E. Pierson
Beebe, Frank H.
Burnham, Mrs. W. A.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Chase, Mrs. Henry M.
Cunningham, Mary
Forbes, Mrs. Waldo E.
Frankenstein, Lina H.
Friend
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray
Hyde, Mrs. Katharine H.
Morison, Mrs. John H.
Peabody, Mrs. Francis
Saltonstall, Muriel Gurdon
Spaulding, Emma F.
Sturgis, Misses
Vorenberg, Felix
Ward, Professor R. deC.
Wells, Mrs. Webster

Plainly, further subscriptions are both desirable and necessary. They may be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street.

Purged by time, heard with eager ears and fresh mind, the "Symphonia Domestica" persists as music of manifold power and, at will, of exceeding beauty. In attributes vitalized, in qualities and impression, swift, sure and abiding, it stands increased rather than diminished. Spite of a laudable zeal for terse brevity, many a composer of the younger generation seems short-breathed. Consider and compare the intellectual force and wealth of Strauss stretching this vast canvas—and filling it As in "Ein Heldenleben," he finds the symphonic form suitable to his purpose, unfolds and welds his music accordingly A first division sets forth the subject-matter; a second treats it sportively, fancifully, ironically; the third charges it with emotion; the fourth wings it with full-fraught frenzy. From the motivs exposed fructify these hundreds of measures, these scores of pages. From itself upsprings this symphony, and the progress, cumulation, unity, of the whole are unshakable. The development, transformation, inter-relation and enrichment of the motives remains a marvel of polyphonic skill and abundance. The harmonic vesture flags not in opulence and glow. Every play of timbres does its office. Nay, one reproach that still lies against "The Domestica" is Strauss's occasional tendency to pursue these exercises for themselves—"the strong man exulting in his strength"—while the thought and the emotion for the instant stand still.

In the whole invention, the whole consist of the tone-poem works an intellect of music in the prime of puissance and unity. Conspicuously, it can character tones. The motivs of the husband and her are clearly recognizable, as clearly convey the desired qualities and tempers the man. The two motivs of the wife higher upbears, the tone-poem. The exceptional spirit may keep the faith and do the deed when there is no affection to quicken and maintain it. Yet to no such ascetic isolation is Strauss minded in the "Symphonia Domestica." The He of the music loves and is loved; the mutual passion, conjugal though it be, is also strength and wing. The blended motives testify to it; the outpouring tones sing it in beauty richer and richer, more and more ardent. As in the mists and wisps of dream the elation flutters and flickers away. . . .

It is time to exult, and if ever composer wrote a music of exultation, of such is the fugued finale of "The Domestica." Down the wind it whistles the "interpretations" once beslathered upon it. Here strides music that needs no other reason for being than its own frenzy. It leaps; it dances; it cries; it shouts. It boils with its own heat. It reels with its own tumults; or for the instant stops to sing, as though some dear memory were quick and staying upon it. A marvel of facture is this double fugue scrutinized; a marvel also, when a hundred orchestral voices outpour it, of far-flung and seething power. As breathless as Mr. Monteux and the band, did one and another listener end yesterday. For this revival of "The Domestica" will not be the least remembered of the conductor's works in Symphony Hall. It was possible to wish for a little slower pace through the middle music of deed and devotion that it might run in yet ampler and more glowing flood; but elsewhere rose no question. The essential motivs stood clear and charactered. Full-voiced, plastic and luminous ran the polyphony. As multi-colored as the palette of Strauss flashed the harmonic, the instrumental texture. The playful, the ironic periods of the Scherzo sported or bit; upon the slow division Mr. Monteux and the orchestra laid the magnificence of song sustained and passioned. The fugue from their hands, raced and chortled upon the reverberant air. To the memories of Muck with this "Domestica," add now a memory of Monteux.

There was music to precede and to follow; for Strauss's tone-poem finally emerged as central number in a changed programme. Mozart's Overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute" was prelude. Relatively, it stretched a diminutive canvas, plied scanty means. Yet within these proportions and these resources, of the deep magnificences of music were also Mozart's chords of mystery; while with the same "life-force" that permeates Strauss's finale ran also his finer-fibred and, for the fugue. By whether "The Domestica" will also be played, say in December of 2055.

The postlude to the whole concert—for there can be none to that uprearing Straussian close—was Liszt's symphonic poem of "Tasso." The pompous tonal pageantry of the end has become hollow witness to a departed fashion. So, with or without occasion, could the romantical composers of mid-nineteenth century wave their arms and "throw" their voices. The preceding lament—the better as well as the longer half of the piece—still touches the hearer's imagination, still attests Liszt's. The wailing melody, not without grace or dignity, summons his phantom-figure of the woeful poet. If he borrowed the motiv from gondoliers' song, his own are the sombre and stately permutations through which he leads it. If he often ranted, often, too, he visioned.

Contrast to all these went the novel piece of the day—a "Bergerie" of Mr. Stuart Mason, composer, teacher, conductor and reviewer of music in this town. Interpreted, a "Bergerie" appears to be a music of the ways and tastes and artifice of a time when Marie Antoinette played about as dairy-maid in the park of the Trianon—counterpart in tones to sundry pictures of Watteau, to scores of "pastorals" written by "petits abbés" or "petits marquis" who also fancied themselves as poetasters. It assumes a manner; courts an artful simplicity and elegance; seeks an illusion easy to reproach as affectation. Nothing could be farther from these United States which also breed composers; from this life of ours, which one and another of them, say Mr. Chadwick or Mr. Gilbert or Mr. Schelling, has made bold to transfuse into symphonic music. Mr. Mason has indisputable right to choice of matter, method, manner. The listener, the reviewer, may only inquire how perfectly he has achieved his "Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers"; his "Air Pastoral"; his "Gaillarde et Départ pour le Pays du Tendre."

The first and the second divisions, Mr. Mason seems to have written at over-length, with a perceptible monotony of delicate fancy and adroit procedure. They cloy, they pale, by sheer excess of felicitous inventions, piquant embroideries, whispered graces, elegant attitudes. The mind appraises and applauds the composer's apt artifice. The fancy lingers for the while over his charm of winding melody, light-fingered modulations, insinuating rhythms, figures in lace, harmonies in brocade—albeit here and there the twentieth-century, as it writes music, flavors them. The third division more briefly and piquantly renews

---

Trns Dec 27.

Incidents and Prospects

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will make its monthly journey to New York and other cities southward. At home, it will not be heard again until Friday and Saturday, Jan. 11 and 12. At these concerts it will play the sixth Concerto Grosso of Handel (in G minor); d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air"; the Russian Glière's tone-poem, "The Sirens"; Mr. Gilbert's rarely heard "Negro Rhapsody." In the Symphony, Mr. Schmitz will play the conspicuous piano-part.

On the preceding Thursday, Jan. 10, d'Indy's Symphony will also be played in Cambridge, along with the Overture to Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman"; Smetana's tone-picture of the river Moldau; Liszt's "Tasso"; the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fetes."

Glbe Dec 23

This week brings the shortest concert schedule of the entire season, as usual. Mr Monteux has put Bliss' "Color Symphony" on the Symphony program, and also Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis et Chloe," which was first heard here some years ago. Bliss, an Englishman still under middle age, is a modernist. He lately lectured at Harvard in the course of an American tour. There is no announcement that the colored lights which the score is said to demand will be used at the performance, which is the first in this country.

No major work of Bliss has yet been heard in Boston. The soloist is Pablo Casals. Not only is he the one person capable of making a cello concerto endurable, he has kindly dug up for the occasion a concerto by Boccherini instead of offering us Saint-Saens again.

Times Dec 23

On Concert Horizon for 1923

COLOR in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra produces in its home city this week and will bring to town at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 5. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," "Blue," "Green."

The Bostonians on Jan. 3 will revive here Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," of which the composer gave New York the world première years ago. Mr. Monteux's evening program adds Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso." The matinee, besides Bliss's symphony, will include Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Mozart's E flat violin concerto, with Jacques Thibaud.

Trns Dec 22

Trns Dec 24

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

ull and Running Over

IN the records of the Symphony Orchestra was written on Saturday evening a strange, new thing. So far as he longest memory ran backward, never efore at the end of a single piece had the rchestra been twice called to its feet. The usic was the "Symphonia Domestica" of trauss, until the day before unheard in Boston through eleven years. The performance excelled even that of Friday afternoon. The motivs were set forth and defined with enkindling zest. Conductor and orchestra touched in the playful, homely, fancies of Strauss's scherzo, gave a tang to his thrusts. They renewed the ardors, the passion, the deep-set and outpouring beauty of the slow divisions; tossed themselves and their hearers through the final fugue. At the close, the excitement on the stage and in the auditorium was not to be withstood. From balconies and floor pelted the applause. On the instant, by a quick and happy intuition, Mr. Monteux bade a beaming orchestra rise and share it. Twice was the conductor recalled; once more, as the clapping swelled, he stood in the crescent of his standing men. These ardors were, indeed, the natural sequence of music and performance. Yet upon them Mr. Monteux's divination laid the fine edge of the occasion; while quick to understand were both audience and orchestra. In Mr. Gericke's day as conductor, when he and the band visited New York, they used to be saluted as "the gentlemen from Boston." Saturday evening that old and honorable title stood renewed. H. T. P.

Adv Dec 23

Don Juan Fantasia……………

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pablo Casals will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He has chosen Boccherini's concerto for 'cello. Pierre Monteux wil conduct Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," and the first suite from Ravel's 'Daphnie and Chloe." Bliss' work will be heard for the first time in this country.

Glbe Dec 23

SYMPHONY HALL—Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. "Color Symphony," Arthur Bliss (first time in America); "Tragic Overture," Brahms; concerto for cello and orchestra Boccherini; first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" Ravel; soloist, Pablo Casals.

Trns Dec 27

NOVEL PIECES, FRESH COMERS, MORE CONCERTS

BLISS'S "COLOR SYMPHONY" AT HAND

The Young Briton's Fancy with an Able Music—Mr. Casals Also with the Symphony Orchestra — The Harvard Glee Club in the Ears of a Detached Reviewer—Prospects

THOSE who are fearful that the radical composers of today and their perhaps more radical successors will send all musical canons and traditions to the dogs should take heart from the fact that these anarchs still write symphonies, and on occasion fugues as well. At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will bring to its first hearing in America the "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, a composer just turned thirty and bold and venturesome enough to suit the most unorthodox of musical free-thinkers. Yet in this, his latest piece, Mr. Bliss has respected form if not always in the classical sense of the word; for all its title his Symphony has line as well as color. Indeed, the final movement, an elaborate double-fugue, has caused one reviewer to declare that in Bliss "we have found a contrapuntal rhapsodist to match with Reger."

So far Mr. Bliss's music is known to Boston only through two relatively unimportant songs, "The Buckle" and "To a Dandelion," the latter written with an accompaniment for a single clarinet. So much has been printed and said of him, however, that it seems scarcely necessary here to enter into an explicit account of his achievements or a lengthy exposition of his aims, tendencies and ideals. Suffice it to say that the keynote of Bliss's personality and the dominant characteristic of his music is exuberant vitality, that in certain of his pieces he has employed unusual means to gain novel ends, that only indirectly has he been influenced by any of the representative composers of the nineteenth century, and that, reverencing Byrd and the other English madrigalists, he has striven to restore to the music of Britain its long-lost racial distinctiveness.

Undoubtedly the "Color Symphony," with its conventional instrumental make-up and its formal plan, is less typical of the individual trend of Bliss's music than are such untrammelled things as the wordless Rhapsody for two voices and seven instruments, the exhilarating "Rout" for soprano and chamber orchestra, or the Concerto for piano and tenor voice accompanied by strings and percussion. Nevertheless in the Symphony Bliss is true to himself. It were difficult to find in this score reminiscences or even unescapable suggestions of the work of others. Together with every contemporary composer he is indebted to Debussy for his use of the "higher dissonances," his entire independence of all that was once harmonic orthodoxy. But these chords of the eleventh and thirteenth, these parallel fourths, fifths, sevenths and ninths, these dislocations, elisions and false basses are now a part of the vocabulary of music. It is more significant that in the "Color Symphony" Bliss has been faithful to his own predilections for vigorous diatonic melody, for irregular but forceful rhythms, and for pungent and original instrumental combinations.

The age-old discussion of the relation between color and sound was given fresh impetus a few years ago when Skryabin incorporated in his "Promethus" a part for a "keyboard of light" or, to use the now accepted term, a color-organ. And now comes Bliss's Symphony to renew these diverting if unprofitable speculations. We are told by Percy Scholes, who has prepared an informative and suggestive brochure on the "Color Symphony," that Bliss when composing "always experiences a play of color sensation, that such a play had been vivid in his mind when working at this Symphony, and that the title, 'A Color Symphony,' which at once suggested itself to him, would actually express a conception that had dominated him when at work." There is reason to believe that Bliss does not confine this color sensation to the trite and wholly arbitrary analogies between keys and hues. Rather his color is harmonic and orchestral, instinct in the general character and texture of the music.

Each of the four movements has its own distinguishing color-name. Thus the first movement is entitled "Purple," the second "Red," the third "Blue" and the fourth "Green." But it seems to have been less the abstract colors that have prompted this music or that have been reflected in it than the objects and moral qualities associated in the composer's mind with these colors. Though they are not indicated in the score, Bliss has declared these associative ideas: For him purple is the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death; red suggests rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, color and magic; Blue calls to mind sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy, and green is the color of emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory.

The prevailing tonality of the first movement is D major, a key that Rimsky-Ko sakov has described as yellow and su and that for Skryabin was yellow and bri liant. Nor is it likely that D major merely as a key suggests to Bliss the color purp But clear in the music is the though pageantry, a certain solemnity hints times of death, and one episode for full chestra, prefaced by a vivid trumpet fa fare, has been termed the "Royalty S tion." "The approach of the end of t movement," to quote Mr. Scholes, "is ind cated by the entrance of a Bell, strikin continuously. There is then a four-ba Coda, and finally a stroke of the Gong which may fancifully be taken as a final symbol of Pageantry and Death. It should however, be recognized that the work is no what is usually spoken of as 'Programme Music'; there are hints, here and there and there is a vague symbolism and color association underlying everythin but there is not the detailed procedure a cording to pictorial, or narrative, or poeti cal plan that is to be found in such work for instance, as those of Liszt and Strauss.

"Red" is a Scherzo, as assertive, brilliant and at times as screaming as its name im plies. The idea of magic is expressed a section less violent than the rest, and th movement comes to its conclusion in blaze of scarlet flame."

Among us the word "blue" has of lat years acquired a definite musical connota tion. It will be idle, however, to look the third movement of this Symphony f any suggestion of that dismally waili type of jazz known as "blues," althou the element of melancholy is not ove looked. But it is the blue of nature a the blue that is emblem of loyalty whic here predominate. According to Mr. Lan ford, who wrote of the Symphony for t Manchester Guardian, there is in th movement "a grim and moving rhythm, b melodically seriousness only slants the music of cadenzas of flute and ot woodwind notes."

The first subject of the final dou fugue, with its initial upward leap o diminished octave, might have come Bach in a nightmare, and had he dream of treating fugally such a subject we m imagine that his waking would ha brought him welcome relief from so u grateful a task. Yet Bliss handle seemingly intractable subject in maste fashion. Incidentally the liveller sec subject, though likewise pronouncedly dividual, is more nearly after the accep pattern of such things. Into this sec section of the fugue melodies from preceding movements are introduced. long the two subjects are heard in c bination, and in the third and final sec comes what Mr. Scholes has termed culminating point of the whole Symph Of this verdant fugue Bliss himself said: "It is as spring-like as anyth I can write—growing all the time."

W. S.

Casals Also Comes

In further zest to these Symphony certs, Mr. Casals, the violoncellist, will with the orchestra for the first time some years. Again he has been delv among the secondary composers of the ei teenth century, and the minor classic he has now upturned is a Concert A-flat by Boccherini. On his way to United States, he shared it with the Orchestra at Manchester in England the reviewer for The Guardian wrote: Casals went on in the second part concert to lavish the beauty of hi ing to reanimate an old concerto cherini. It is rarely indeed that for the continuance of the cadenzas certo-playing, but in this case they such marvels of reposeful and ma execution, and such fair specim musicianship, that one could not their continuance."

More fortunate than Boston, Man also heard Mr. Casals play a S Bach-music in which the listener is to forget the felicities of the virtuo admiration for the larger and deeper ties of the musician. Again Mr. Lan wrote in The Guardian not only o violoncellist but of the composer as w

> When Casals plays Bach, o mind's eye begins to see music in te of architecture. It is all form— sic in marble, though marble smoothness does not chill but wa the senses . . . one feels intuiti the rightness of the interpreta simply because the formal outline the music are settled beyond all a ment with the moulding of the phrase. All that follows after, one vines while the piece goes on, foll according to the law of inevit growth and development. We see end of the music in Casals's beginn of it—just as we feel that with the la ing of the first stone a great cathe was bound to take ultimate shape beauty. Form in Bach is really more to be argued about than form geometry; its truth, its rightness, be grasped by the mind a priori. so at any rate when Casals plays Ba —and let it be said that the 'cell the composer and the piece itself a listener as one and indivisible. sals in his presentation of the ma is no more to be thought of as a from Bach than the light of the m is to be thought of as apart from moon's shape. All of which is to that Casals in Bach gives us a preme sort of intellectual delight.

His playing is technically as won ful as it is in conception. He ge suspected shades of color out o 'cello; at the close of Bach's will give you a diminuendo with imperceptibly graded tone that be hard for you to tell exac what moment the music dies lence. You will not know it until you see Casal's bow rais the strings. Amazing, too, is bility of tone—for how rarely 'cello an instrument of moveme the writer were a 'cellist, he after hearing Casals be adver his willingness to exchange his

Continued on

NEW EARS AND NEW MINDS FOR "THE DOMESTICA"

MR. MONTEUX PLAYS STRAUSS'S TONE-POEM

After Eleven Years the Music Renews Itself in Power and Beauty, Always from the Mind, at Need and Will from the Heart — Revealing and Eloquent Performance—Mozart for Prelude, Liszt for Postlude, and the Artifice of Stuart Mason Between

TIME winnows and clarifies. To hear Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon—sixteen years after the first performance in Boston, eleven after the most recent repetition—was to hear only the intrinsic and enduring voice of the music. In those distant days, as now they seem, much breath and much derision were wasted upon what purported to be the details of the piece. Here was the child bathed and bedded; there it crowed or whined. Now were the father and the mother smiling beatifically upon their offspring; again they were in vigorous dispute about its upbringing. Through sundry periods, He was at his work in high zest of creation; through others love and passion stirred within Him. Over these pages sported the wife capricious and teasing; over those she moved considerate and tender. There were times to smile in the progress of the "Symphonia Domestica"; times also to experience graver emotions.

Upon these things that repository of learning, the programme-book, discoursed yesterday, as it had in 1907 and 1912 Many re-read its sayings, taking the pleasure of reminiscent curiosity. Few, however—it is almost safe to believe—took thought of them in the actual hearing of the tone-poem. By the inscrutable processes of time "The Domestica" has become the "absolute" music that, as some say, Strauss designed and wrought. To hold the audience of Friday intent through forty minutes, it needed no more "programme" than the few chapter-heads set by the composer himself. They scarcely outnumber those that Beethoven strewed upon his "Pastoral Symphony."

Purged by time, heard with eager ears and fresh mind, the "Symphonia Domestica" persists as music of manifold power and, at will, of exceeding beauty. In attributes vitalized, in qualities and impression, swift, sure and abiding, it stands increased rather than diminished. Spite of a laudable zeal for terse brevity, many a composer of the younger generation seems short-breathed. Consider and compare the intellectual force and wealth of Strauss stretching this vast canvas—and filling it As in "Ein Heldenleben," he finds the symphonic form suitable to his purpose, unfolds and welds his music accordingly A first division sets forth the subject-matter; a second treats it sportively, fancifully, ironically; the third charges it with emotion; the fourth wings it with full-fraught frenzy. From the motivs exposed fructify these hundreds of measures, these scores of pages. From itself upsprings this symphony, and the progress, cumulation, unity, of the whole are unshakable. The development, transformation, inter-relation and enrichment of the motives remains a marvel of polyphonic skill and abundance. The harmonic vesture flags not in opulence and glow. Every play of timbres does its office. Nay, one reproach that still lies against "The Domestica" is Strauss's occasional tendency to pursue these exercises for themselves—"the strong man exulting in his strength"—while the thought and the emotion for the instant stand still. [illegible] the whole invention, the whole con[illegible]t of the tone-poem works an intellect of [illegible] in the prime of puissance and [illegible]ity. Conspicuously, it can character[illegible] tones. The motivs of the husband and [illegible] are clearly recognizable, as clearly [illegible] the desired qualities and tempers [illegible] the man. The two motivs of the wife [illegible] higher upbears, the tone-poem. The exceptional spirit may keep the faith and do the deed when there is no affection to quicken and maintain it. Yet to no such ascetic isolation is Strauss minded in the "Symphonia Domestica." The He of the music loves and is loved; the mutual passion, conjugal though it be, is also strength and wing. The blended motives testify to it; the outpouring tones sing it in beauty richer and richer, more and more ardent. As in the mists and wisps of dream the elation flutters and flickers away. . . .

It is time to exult, and if ever composer wrote a music of exultation, of such is the fugued finale of "The Domestica." Down the wind it whistles the "interpretations" once beslathered upon it. Here strides music that needs no other reason for being than its own frenzy. It leaps; it dances; it cries; it shouts. It boils with its own heat. It reels with its own tumults; or for the instant stops to sing, as though some dear memory were quick and staying upon it. A marvel of facture is this double fugue scrutinized; a marvel also, when a hundred orchestral voices outpour it, of far-flung and seething power. As breathless as Mr. Monteux and the band, did one and another listener end yesterday. For this revival of "The Domestica" will not be the least remembered of the conductor's works in Symphony Hall. It was possible to wish for a little slower pace through the middle music of deed and devotion that it might run in yet ampler and more glowing flood; but elsewhere rose no question. The essential motivs stood clear and charactered. Full-voiced, plastic and luminous ran the polyphony. As multi-colored as the palette of Strauss flashed the harmonic, the instrumental texture. The playful, the ironic periods of the Scherzo sported or bit; upon the slow division Mr. Monteux and the orchestra laid the magnificence of song sustained and passioned. The fugue from their hands, raced and chortled upon the reverberant air. To the memories of Muck with this "Domestica," add now a memory of Monteux.

There was music to precede and to follow; for Strauss's tone-poem finally emerged as central number in a changed programme. Mozart's Overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute" was prelude. Relatively, it stretched a diminutive canvas, plied scanty means. Yet within these proportions and these resources, of the deep magnificences of music were also Mozart's chords of mystery; while with the same "life-force" that permeates Strauss's finale ran also his finer-fibred and, for the [illegible] fugue. By [illegible]

whether "The Domestica" will also be played, say in December of 2055.

The postlude to the whole concert—for there can be none to that uprearing Strausian close—was Liszt's symphonic poem of "Tasso." The pompous tonal pageantry of the end has become hollow witness to a departed fashion. So, with or without occasion, could the romantical composers of mid-nineteenth century wave their arms and "throw" their voices. The preceding lament—the better as well as the longer half of the piece—still touches the hearer's imagination, still attests Liszt's. The wailing melody, not without grace or dignity, summons his phantom-figure of the woeful poet. If he borrowed the motiv from gondoliers' song, his own are the sombre and stately permutations through which he leads it. If he often ranted, often, too, he visioned.

Contrast to all these went the novel piece of the day—a "Bergerie" of Mr. Stuart Mason, composer, teacher, conductor and reviewer of music in this town. Interpreted, a "Bergerie" appears to be a music of the ways and tastes and artifice of a time when Marie Antoinette played about as dairy-maid in the park of the Trianon—counterpart in tones to sundry pictures of Watteau, to scores of "pastorals" written by "petits abbés" or "petits marquis" who also fancied themselves as poetasters. It assumes a manner; courts an artful simplicity and elegance; seeks an illusion easy to reproach as affectation. Nothing could be farther from these United States which also breed composers; from this life of ours, which one and another of them, say Mr. Chadwick or Mr. Gilbert or Mr. Schelling, has made bold to transfuse into symphonic music. Mr. Mason has indisputable right to choice of matter, method, manner. The listener, the reviewer, may only inquire how perfectly he has achieved his "Sonnerie et Sarabande pour les Bergers"; his "Air Pastoral"; his "Gaillarde et Départ pour le Pays du Tendre."

The first and the second divisions, Mr. Mason seems to have written at over-length, with a perceptible monotony of delicate fancy and adroit procedure. They cloy, they pale, by sheer excess of felicitous inventions, piquant embroideries, whispered graces, elegant attitudes. The mind appraises and applauds the composer's apt artifice. The fancy lingers for the while over his charm of winding melody, light-fingered modulations, insinuating rhythms, figures in lace, harmonies in brocade—albeit here and there the twentieth-century, as it writes music, flavors them. The third division more briefly and piquantly renews [illegible] Excellently w[illegible]

Rising Slowly

Subscriptions for the Week to the Guarantee Fund of the Symphony Concerts.

BY report in the programme-book of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, the Guarantee Fund to meet the deficit in the working of the orchestra for the current season, now stands at $64,894.34 of a desired $95,000; while the Endowment Fund has risen to $145,953.52. The additional subscribers to the Guarantee Fund are:

Beebe, E. Pierson
Beebe, Frank H.
Burnham, Mrs. W. A.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Chase, Mrs. Henry M.
Cunningham, Mary
Forbes, Mrs. Waldo E.
Frankenstein, Lina H.
Friend
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray
Hyde, Mrs. Katharine H.
Morison, Mrs. John H.
Peabody, Mrs. Francis
Saltonstall, Muriel Gurdon
Spaulding, Emma F.
Sturgis, Misses
Vorenberg, Felix
Ward, Professor R. deC.
Wells, Mrs. Webster

Plainly, further subscriptions are both desirable and necessary. They may be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street.

Trans Dec 27.

Incidents and Prospects

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will make its monthly journey to New York and other cities southward. At home, it will not be heard again until Friday and Saturday, Jan. 11 and 12. At these concerts it will play the sixth Concerto Grosso of Handel (in G minor); d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air"; the Russian Glière's tone-poem, "The Sirens"; Mr. Gilbert's rarely heard "Negro Rhapsody." In the Symphony, Mr. Schmitz will play the conspicuous piano-part.

On the preceding Thursday, Jan. 10, d'Indy's Symphony will also be played in Cambridge, along with the Overture to Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman"; Smetana's tone-picture of the river Moldau; Liszt's "Tasso"; the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fetes."

Globe Dec 23

This week brings the shortest concert schedule of the entire season, as usual. Mr Monteux has put Bliss' "Color Symphony" on the Symphony program, and also Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis et Chloe," which was first heard here some years ago. Bliss, an Englishman still under middle age, is a modernist. He lately lectured at Harvard in the course of an American tour. There is no announcement that the colored lights which the score is said to demand will be used at the performance, which is the first in this country.

No major work of Bliss has yet been heard in Boston. The soloist is Pablo Casals. Not only is he the one person capable of making a cello concerto endurable, he has kindly dug up for the occasion a concerto by Boccherini instead of offering us Saint-Saens [illegible] again

---

Dec 23

On Concert Horizon for 1923

COLOR in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra produces in its home city this week and will bring to town at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 5. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," "Blue," "Green."

The Bostonians on Jan. 3 will revive here Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," of which the composer gave New York the world première years ago. Mr. Monteux's evening program adds Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso." The matinee, besides Bliss's symphony, will include Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Mozart's E flat violin concerto, with Jacques Thibaud.

Trans Dec 22

Trans Dec 24

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Full and Running Over

IN the records of the Symphony Orchestra was written on Saturday evening a strange, new thing. So far as the longest memory ran backward, never before at the end of a single piece had the orchestra been twice called to its feet. The music was the "Symphonia Domestica" of Strauss, until the day before unheard in Boston through eleven years. The performance excelled even that of Friday afternoon. The motivs were set forth and defined with enkindling zest. Conductor and orchestra touched in the playful, homely, fancies of Strauss's scherzo, gave a tang to his thrusts. They renewed the ardors, the passion, the deep-set and outpouring beauty of the slow divisions; tossed themselves and their hearers through the final fugue. At the close, the excitement on the stage and in the auditorium was not to be withstood. From balconies and floor pelted the applause. On the instant, by a quick and happy intuition, Mr. Monteux bade a beaming orchestra rise and share it. Twice was the conductor recalled; once more, as the clapping swelled, he stood in the crescent of his standing men. These ardors were, indeed, the natural sequence of music and performance. Yet upon them Mr. Monteux's divination laid the fine edge of the occasion; while quick to understand were both audience and orchestra. In Mr. Gericke's day as conductor, when he and the band visited New York, they used to be saluted as "the gentlemen from Boston." Saturday evening that old and honorable title stood renewed. H. T. P.

Adv Dec 23

Don Juan Fantasia........

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pablo Casals will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He has chosen Boccherini's concerto for 'cello. Pierre Monteux wil conduct Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," and the first suite from Ravel's 'Daphnie and Chloe." Bliss' work will be heard for the first time in this country.

Globe Dec 23

SYMPHONY HALL—Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15 Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. "Color Symphony," Arthur Bliss (first time in America); "Tragic Overture," Brahms; concerto for cello and orchestra Boccherini; first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" Ravel; soloist, Pablo Casals.

Trans Dec 27

[164]

NOVEL PIECES, FRESH COMERS, MORE CONCERTS

BLISS'S "COLOR SYMPHONY" AT HAND

The Young Briton's Fancy with an Able Music—Mr. Casals Also with the Symphony Orchestra — The Harvard Glee Club in the Ears of a Detached Reviewer—Prospects

THOSE who are fearful that the radical composers of today and their perhaps more radical successors will send all musical canons and traditions to the dogs should take heart from the fact that these anarchs still write symphonies, and on occasion fugues as well. At the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will bring to its first hearing in America the "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, a composer just turned thirty and bold and venturesome enough to suit the most unorthodox of musical free-thinkers. Yet in this, his latest piece, Mr. Bliss has respected form if not always in the classical sense of the word; for all its title his Symphony has line as well as color. Indeed, the final movement, an elaborate double-fugue, has caused one reviewer to declare that in Bliss "we have found a contrapuntal rhapsodist to match with Reger."

So far Mr. Bliss's music is known to Boston only through two relatively unimportant songs, "The Buckle" and "To a Dandelion," the latter written with an accompaniment for a single clarinet. So much has been printed and said of him, however, that it seems scarcely necessary here to enter into an explicit account of his achievements or a lengthy exposition of his aims, tendencies and ideals. Suffice it to say that the keynote of Bliss's personality and the dominant characteristic of his music is exuberant vitality, that in certain of his pieces he has employed unusual means to gain novel ends, that only indirectly has he been influenced by any of the representative composers of the nineteenth century, and that, reverencing Byrd and the other English madrigalists, he has striven to restore to the music of Britain its long-lost racial distinctiveness.

Undoubtedly the "Color Symphony," with its conventional instrumental make-up and its formal plan, is less typical of the individual trend of Bliss's music than are such untrammelled things as the wordless Rhapsody for two voices and seven instruments, the exhilarating "Rout" for soprano and chamber orchestra, or the Concerto for piano and tenor voice accompanied by strings and percussion. Nevertheless in the Symphony Bliss is true to himself. It were difficult to find in this score reminiscences or even unescapable suggestions of the work of others. Together with every contemporary composer he is indebted to Debussy for his use of the "higher dissonances," his entire independence of all that was once harmonic orthodoxy. But these chords of the eleventh and thirteenth, these parallel fourths, fifths, sevenths and ninths, these dislocations, elisions and false basses are now a part of the vocabulary of music. It is more significant that in the "Color Symphony" Bliss has been faithful to his own predilections for vigorous diatonic melody, for irregular but forceful rhythms, and for pungent and original instrumental combinations.

The age-old discussion of the relation between color and sound was given fresh impetus a few years ago when Skryabin incorporated in his "Promethus" a part for a "keyboard of light" or, to use the now accepted term, a color-organ. And now comes Bliss's Symphony to renew these diverting if unprofitable speculations. We are told by Percy Scholes, who has prepared an informative and suggestive brochure on the "Color Symphony," that Bliss when composing "always experiences a play of color sensation, that such a play had been vivid in his mind when working at this Symphony, and that the title, 'A Color Symphony,' which at once suggested itself to him, would actually express a conception that had dominated him when at work." There is reason to believe that Bliss does not confine this color sensation to the trite and wholly arbitrary analogies between keys and hues. Rather his color is harmonic and orchestral, instinct in the general character and texture of the music.

Each of the four movements has its own distinguishing color-name. Thus the first movement is entitled "Purple," the second "Red," the third "Blue" and the fourth "Green." But it seems to have been less the abstract colors that have prompted this music or that have been reflected in it than the objects and moral qualities associated in the composer's mind with these colors. Though they are not indicated in the score, Bliss has declared these associative ideas: For him purple is the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death; red suggests rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, color and magic; Blue calls to mind sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy, and green is the color of emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory.

The prevailing tonality of the first movement is D major, a key that Rimsky-Korsakov has described as yellow and sun and that for Skryabin was yellow and brilliant. Nor is it likely that D major merely as a key suggests to Bliss the color purp But clear in the music is the thought pageantry, a certain solemnity hints times of death, and one episode for full chestra, prefaced by a vivid trumpet fare, has been termed the "Royalty S tion." "The approach of the end of t movement," to quote Mr. Scholes, "is ind cated by the entrance of a Bell, strikin continuously. There is then a four-bar Coda, and finally a stroke of the Gong, which may fancifully be taken as a final symbol of Pageantry and Death. It should however, be recognized that the work is no what is usually spoken of as 'Programme Music'; there are hints, here and there and there is a vague symbolism and color association underlying everything but there is not the detailed procedure according to pictorial, or narrative, or poetical plan that is to be found in such works for instance, as those of Liszt and Strauss."

"Red" is a Scherzo, as assertive, brilliant and at times as screaming as its name implies. The idea of magic is expressed a section less violent than the rest, and th movement comes to its conclusion in blaze of scarlet flame."

Among us the word "blue" has of la years acquired a definite musical connota tion. It will be idle, however, to look the third movement of this Symphony f any suggestion of that dismally wailin type of jazz known as "blues," althou the element of melancholy is not over looked. But it is the blue of nature an the blue that is emblem of loyalty whic here predominate. According to Mr. Lan ford, who wrote of the Symphony for th Manchester Guardian, there is in th movement "a grim and moving rhythm, b melodically seriousness only slants the music of cadenzas of flute and ot woodwind notes."

The first subject of the final dou fugue, with its initial upward leap o diminished octave, might have come Bach in a nightmare, and had he dream of treating fugally such a subject we m imagine that his waking would ha brought him welcome relief from so u grateful a task. Yet Bliss handles [illegible] seemingly intractable subject in maste fashion. Incidentally the liveller sec subject, though likewise pronouncedly dividual, is more nearly after the accep pattern of such things. Into this sec section of the fugue melodies from preceding movements are introduced. long the two subjects are heard in c bination, and in the third and final sec comes what Mr. Scholes has termed culminating point of the whole Symph Of this verdant fugue Bliss himself said: "It is as spring-like as anyth I can write—growing all the time."

W. S.

Casals Also Comes

In further zest to these Symphony c certs, Mr. Casals, the violoncellist, will with the orchestra for the first time some years. Again he has been delv among the secondary composers of the ei teenth century, and the minor classic he has now upturned is a Concert A-flat by Boccherini. On his way to United States, he shared it with the Orchestra at Manchester in England the reviewer for The Guardian wrote: Casals went on in the second part concert to lavish the beauty of hi ing to reanimate an old concerto cherini. It is rarely indeed that for the continuance of the cadenzas certo-playing, but in this case they such marvels of reposeful and ma execution, and such fair specim musicianship, that one could not their continuance."

More fortunate than Boston, Man also heard Mr. Casals play a S Bach-music in which the listener is to forget the felicities of the virtuo admiration for the larger and deeper ties of the musician. Again Mr. Lan wrote in The Guardian not only o violoncellist but of the composer as w

When Casals plays Bach, o mind's eye begins to see music in te of architecture. It is all form—it sic in marble, though marble w smoothness does not chill but wa the senses . . . one feels intuiti the rightness of the interpretat simply because the formal outlines the music are settled beyond all a ment with the moulding of the phrase. All that follows after, one vines while the piece goes on, foll according to the law of inevit growth and development. We see end of the music in Casals's beginn of it—just as we feel that with the la ing of the first stone a great cathe was bound to take ultimate shape a beauty. Form in Bach is really more to be argued about than form geometry; its truth, its rightness, i be grasped by the mind a priori. so at any rate when Casals plays Ba —and let it be said that the 'cell the composer and the piece itself s a listener as one and indivisible. sals in his presentation of the ma is no more to be thought of as a from Bach than the light of the m is to be thought of as apart from moon's shape. All of which is to that Casals in Bach gives us a preme sort of intellectual delight.

His playing is technically as wo ful as it is in conception. He ge suspected shades of color out o 'cello; at the close of Bach's will give you a diminuendo wit imperceptibly graded tone that be hard for you to tell exac what moment the music dies lence. You will not know it until you see Casal's bow rais the strings. Amazing, too, is bility of tone—for how rarely 'cello an instrument of movem the writer were a 'cellist, he after hearing Casals, be adver his willingness to exchange his

Continued on [illegible]

Transcript Dec 28

CONCERTS AND CONDUCTORS

Kusevitzky Praised

SERGE KUSEVITZKY as a conductor has won for himself many admirers in England, yet by no means is there unanimity of opinion regarding his powers. This is chiefly due to the fact that his make-up is not that of a man who can apply himself universally. He has distinct preferences and distinct perjudices. His attitude towards music would seem to be subjective. Give him a piece which appeals to him without the necessity of his going out half-way to meet it, then he will give you a performance both powerful and balanced; but with music which comes to him less directly he will deal impatiently and often with misunderstanding. We remember hearing him on one occasion in three of Wagner's overtures to which he brought such freshness and vigor that they took their stand again on a priori grounds. But there have been other occasions; stereotype is anathema to him, and this very fact has sometimes led him into strange error. In his concert at Albert Hall the other day he revealed but one aspect—that of amazing mastery. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherazade" Suite was the burden of the concert, and with this vehement and exhilarating brilliance the conductor was among his kin. It is difficult to recall a performance of this music which has made imaginative effort so entirely unnecessary, and in this tribute must be included the London Symphony Orchestra. Kusevitzky's injunctions were very clear but often impetuous and sudden, yet as it seemed not a shade of his intentions was lost. [The London Telegraph.

Kusevitzky Blamed

Coleridge was once taken to one of our Philharmonic Society's concerts to hear Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," and of the march he remarked that it was "like a funeral procession in deep purple." That, of course, is precisely what it is intended to be, and in conducting it one may do almost what one will, provided only that any chance poet who has been brought to the hall is led to make that particular suggestion. If there were a poet present at Mr. Kusevitzky's concert, I doubt whether he did this. He might easily have expressed admiration for one passage or another. He might have praised Beethoven's melodies, or his harmonies, and praise of the orchestration would be very likely to come, since Kusevitzky brought out every detail of it in the clearest way. But I do not think that he would talk of purple, or of funerals, and I feel sure that (unless he had been shown the programme) the word "march" would never have come to his mind.

The strange tempi adopted had a good deal to do with this, and the constant variation of these tempi still more. Admittedly a march for orchestra need not be played like a march for a regimental band; there may be a flexibility in the concert-room that would be disastrous in the street. But it must feel none the less a march for this, and if every hearer is plainly conscious of the changes of speed, they are either excessive or, as to their transitions, injudiciously managed. A complaint as to erratic tempi might also be made in reference to the performance of the last movement. The best-controlled movement was the Scherzo, which was very swift and "slick," as it should be. [The London Observer

---

Stravinsky's "Sacré"

Mr. Monteux's Next Major "Novelty" at the Symphony Concerts

AT last the full score and the separate parts have come from Paris. They are unpacked. They rest now on the library-shelves at Symphony Hall. Before long they will be distributed to the Symphony Orchestra, and then will begin long and arduous rehearsal of "Le Sacré du Printemps" or "The Rite of the Spring." Possibly late in January, certainly early in February, Mr. Monteux will have this masterpiece of Stravinsky ready for concert-performance. Boston and New York are both to hear it.

"Concert" is written advisedly for "Le Sacré" was originally a mimodrama danced and mimed by Monsieur Diaghylev's ballet as primitive Russian folk. In those days, 1913-14, so loud were the contending tumults of divided Parisian audiences that the music might barely be heard—and not at all grasped—in the theatre. The much-enduring and rebellious Monteux resolved to transfer it bodily to the concert-hall as tone-poem. He would and he did. There "Le Sacré" carried all before it. Many times since, with or without cuts, has it been so repeated. Now, after ten years, Boston is at last to hear this epitome of Stravinsky, this [illegible] masterpiece of modernism in [illegible]. Slow but sure. . . . ?

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Monteux will soon set on the pro- [illegible] for a pair of Symphony Concerts [illegible] r's amusing orchestral suite, [illegible] and episodes in "Alice [illegible] the music, as yet un- [illegible] fancy and skill

---

Herald Dec 28

TENTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Bliss's "Color" Symphony Played First Time in America

COMPOSER IS CALLED ON STAGE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Boccherini; Violoncello concerto in B flat major (Pablo Casals, violoncellist); Bliss, "Color" Symphony (first time in America); Ravel, First Series of Fragments from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The "Color" Symphony of Mr. Bliss, who was present at the concert and was called on the stage after the performance, was produced at the Three Choirs Festival, Gloucester, England, in September, 1922. It is said of him that, composing, he has long associated colors with music. In this symphony, which is in four movements, he strives to give in tones the ideas that come into the mind with the words "purple," "red," "blue," "green." Thus to Mr. Bliss and no doubt to some others, "purple" suggests amethysts, royalty, pageantry and death; "red" is the color of rubies, wine, revery, furnaces courage, magic; "blue" represents sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy; "green," emerals, hope, joy, youth, Spring, victory."

This symphony might be described as a document in color audition, which has interested many for many years. Rimbaud and Ghil found that vowels have colors. Unfortunately for an exact science, Rimbaud said that "i" is red and "o" is blue, while Ghil said that "o" is red and "i" is blue. This difference of opinion on an important point makes the judicious grieve.

It is also unfortunate that various colors suggest widely differing things to different persons. Then, again, there are many who cannot distinguish tints, much less demi-tints; and there are those that are color-blind.

To watch for the sounds that in Mr. Bliss's movement, "Blue" for instance, would suggest to this or that hearer a sapphire, or the ocean depths, the sky (star bedecked or murky), loyalty (to a political party or to friends), and melancholy might pass the time agreeably, but the character of the music itself would probably escape one. "Melanchody," yes, that can easily be expressed, but we have our doubts about the sapphire, deep water (storm tossed waves can be expressed in music; that is if the hearer is told beforehand that these waves are to be portrayed in tones); we have our doubts about the sky, whatever the meteorological condition may be.

Would it not be better, then, to hear this music without eyes glued on the descriptive program notes? To consider the music and musical idiom of Mr. Bliss.

He certainly has ideas; he has technical skill; his instrumentation is often ingenious in that it surprises; but is he, after all, a colorist? He can create a mood—as in the funeral music of "Purple," but with a great orchestra at his hand he does not seem to us to have so great a command of color as, say Duparc, scoring discreetly an accompaniment for one of his songs for a much smaller orchestra, but with a fine sense of combinations and solo effects.

The most musical of the four movements is "Blue," in which there was some charming pages, charming melodically, and by reason of the simple orchestral dress.

Few of us are now afraid of dissonances. We welcome them when they are introduced to gain an effect, and the result is powerful. The bitterer, the harsher, the better. Mr Bliss's dissonances too often turn sound into mere noise, and no descriptive program could justify these pages, which was not even interestingly ugly.

Mr. Monteux had, as is his wont, taken great pains in preparation. Mr. Bliss could not hope for a more expressive performance. The orchestra played brilliantly. 'When works like this "Color" Symphony are produced the hearer must meet the composer more than half way. The Symphony audience as a rule does not rush forward at the risk of tripping and breaking legs when a new work is performed. It is inclined to be shy and backward, words that are not necessarily synonymous with critical. At the end of the performance there was generous applause.

Mr. Casals gave a delightful reading of Boccherini's concerto. The beauty of his tone, his command of nuances, his exquisite phrasing, his technical mastery, and the ease with which he plays, have long excited world-wide admiration.

An eloquent performance of Brahms's noble "Tragic" overture opened the concert, which closed with a poetic and dramatic reading of the fragments from Ravel's ballet.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for the concerts of Jan. 11, 12 is as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso No. 6, G minor; d'Indy, Symphony on a French Mountain Air (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); Gliere, "The Sirens"; Gilbert, Negro Rhapsody.

His 'Color' Symphony Given Here Yesterday

Photograph by Kesslers
ARTHUR BLISS

[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of our visitors from Boston provided an evening of keen pleasure.

Pierre Monteux has done magnificent work with that celebrated body of musicians, and the results were apparent to the very large audience that greeted the band, and Mme. Sigrid Onegin, who graced the occasion with her truly glorious singing of Wagner's aria from "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott," and Schubert's "Erlkoenig," and "Allmacht."

Mr. Monteux elected the first symphony of Sibelius as his principal number, for which we offer devout thanks. Sibelius has written six symphonies, but unless Messrs. Monteux, Muck or Stransky play one or the other every few years, New Yorkers are treated to "Finnlandia," and the "Valse Triste." We wager that the programs of our local orchestras are determined by throwing a coin, heads meaning the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique," and tail a Wagner program. But perhaps we are unjust. We are occasionally treated to such futurist stuff as Dvorak's "New World," Schubert's "Unfinished," and Beethoven's "C Minor Symphonies."

Mr. Monteux's program included Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," and Strauss's "Salome Dance." The Orchestra played delightfully.

Globe Dec 28

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bliss' "Color Symphony" for First Time Here

Boccharini Concerto Played Marvelously

Yesterday's Symphony concert was in every way the most notable of the present season to date. The soloist was Pablo Casals, who gave what can only be described as a marvelous performance of an unfamiliar and thoroughly delightful concerto by Boccherini. The novelty was Arthur Bliss' "A Colour Symphony," which proved to be, with the exception of Holst's "The Planets," by far the most notable English composition heard at these concerts in years.

The repertory pieces were Brahms' "Tragic Overture," a very great classic, and some "Orchestral Fragments" from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." Mr Bliss was present and asknowledged the not too cordial applause which greeted his work, which he wisely permitted Mr Monteux to conduct for him.

But two previous performances by soloists at these concerts in the past decade come to mind as comparable to Casals' poignantly beautiful playing yesterday. One was Melba singing Mozart's "Voi che sapete," the other Kreisler playing the Beethoven violin concerto, both before the war. Mr Casals not only made cello playing thrilling to a listener accustomed to regard cello solos as a wearisome infliction; he made cadenzas so exquisite that a listener in the habit of exhausting the vocabulary of invective against cadenzas wished that these would go on forever.

The felicity in detail and the breadth and dignity of style of Casals are beyond praise. Nobody else can get such tone from a cello. Nobody else plays the cello, and only one living man, Fritz Kreisler, plays the violin so well.

Mr Bliss is still young enough to be boyish, and yet too old to pose. His music is frank, sincere, a bit naive. He blends rhythms with astonishing skill. He has the gift of melodic invention, and is not ashamed to use it. Dissonance does not frighten him, yet one never feels that he is trying to shock the sedate, even when he does shock them. This "Color Symphony" is not a symphony in structure or mood. It is a suite, ending with an exuberant double fugue which would make Ebenezer Prout turn in his grave.

The "colors," purple, red, blue, and green, each have a movement named after them, but that is only Mr Bliss' little joke. One surmises that he knows as well as anyone that "color audition" is an irrelevant if perplexing phenomenon as far as the art of music is concerned. Taken as sheer music this symphony is not so remote in mood from Boccherini, nearer still to Haydn.

It comes like a breath of fresh air into the overheated and lifeless "salon" atmosphere in which such composers as Bax and Scott seem to compose. Perhaps this is Mr Bliss' "Rienzi," as well as his first symphony. Maybe a "Meistersinger" or an "Eroica" will follow in due course. If so they will be well worth serious attention.

This "Color Symphony" deserves repetition during the present season. The audience would certainly learn in time to like it, baffled as some of them seemed yesterday by its daring dissonances.

The "Fragments" from "Daphnis et Chloe," which the program used to call a "suite," are tantalising scraps of an interesting modern piece Boston is not likely to see and hear in its entirety. The ballet was given in Paris a dozen years ago, but Ravel is ceasing to be a lad without quite becoming an established genius. Even if he is a genius, there is no ballet likely to come here that would play him.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," his most perfect masterpiece, was not played in the grand manner yesterday. It has classic dignity, and a bigness of structure which Mr Monteux' episodic and none too sympathetic performance obscured.

The accompaniment for the Boccherini, though stodgy in comparison with Casal's playing, was better than is usually given soloists. The Ravel was exceptionally well played, and the performance of Biss' music seemed more than adequate. There are no concerts next week.

P. R.

Trans Dec 28

CONCERTS AND CONDUCTORS

Kusevitzky Praised

SERGE KUSEVITZKY as a conductor has won for himself many admirers in England, yet by no means is there unanimity of opinion regarding his powers. This is chiefly due to the fact that his make-up is not that of a man who can apply himself universally. He has distinct preferences and distinct perjudices. His attitude towards music would seem to be subjective. Give him a piece which appeals to him without the necessity of his going out half-way to meet it, then he will give you a performance both powerful and balanced; but with music which comes to him less directly he will deal impatiently and often with misunderstanding. We remember hearing him on one occasion in three of Wagner's overtures to which he brought such freshness and vigor that they took their stand again on a priori grounds. But there have been other occasions; stereotype is anathema to him, and this very fact has sometimes led him into strange error, In his concert at Albert Hall the other day he revealed but one aspect—that of amazing mastery. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherherazade" Suite was the burden of the concert, and with this vehement and exhilarating brilliance the conductor was among his kin. It is difficult to recall a performance of this music which has made imaginative effort so entirely unnecessary, and in this tribute must be included the London Symphony Orchestra. Kusevitzky's injunctions were very clear but often impetuous and sudden, yet as it seemed not a shade of his intentions was lost. [The London Telegraph.

Kusevitzky Blamed

Coleridge was once taken to one of our Philharmonic Society's concerts to hear Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," and of the march he remarked that it was "like a funeral procession in deep purple." That, of course, is precisely what it is intended to be, and in conducting it one may do almost what one will, provided only that any chance poet who has been brought to the hall is led to make that particular suggestion. If there were a poet present at Mr. Kusevitzky's concert, I doubt whether he did this. He might easily have expressed admiration for one passage or another. He might have praised Beethoven's melodies, or his harmonies, and praise of the orchestration would be very likely to come, since Kusevitzky brought out every detail of it in the clearest way. But I do not think that he would talk of purple, or of funerals, and I feel sure that (unless he had been shown the programme) the word "march" would never have come to his mind.

The strange tempi adopted had a good deal to do with this, and the constant variation of these tempi still more. Admittedly a march for orchestra need not be played like a march for a regimental band; there may be a flexibility in the concert-room that would be disastrous in the street. But it must feel none the less a march for this, and if every hearer is plainly conscious of the changes of speed, they are either excessive or, as to their transitions, injudiciously managed. A complaint as to erratic tempi might also be made in reference to the performance of the last movement. The best-controlled movement was the Scherzo, which was very swift and "slick," as it should be. [The London Observer

Stravinsky's "Sacré"

Mr. Monteux's Next Major "Novelty" at the Symphony Concerts

AT last the full score and the separate parts have come from Paris. They are unpacked. They rest now on the library-shelves at Symphony Hall. Before long they will be distributed to the Symphony Orchestra, and then will begin long and arduous rehearsal of "Le Sacré du Printemps" or "The Rite of the Spring." Possibly late in January, certainly early in February, Mr. Monteux will have this masterpiece of Stravinsky ready for concert-performance. Boston and New York are both to hear it.

"Concert" is written advisedly for "Le Sacré" was originally a mimodrama danced and mimed by Monsieur Diaghylev's ballet as primitive Russian folk. In those days, 1913-14, so loud were the contending tumults of divided Parisian audiences that the music might barely be heard—and not at all grasped—in the theatre. The much-enduring and rebellious Monteux resolved to transfer it bodily to the concert-hall as tone-poem. He would and he did. There "Le Sacré" carried all before it. Many times since, with or without cuts, has it been so repeated. Now, after ten years, Boston is at last to hear this epitome of Stravinsky, this first masterpiece of modernism in music. Slow but sure. . . . ?

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Monteux will soon set on the programme for a pair of Symphony Concerts Deems Taylor's amusing orchestral suite, suggested by figures and episodes in "Alice in Wonderland." In the music, as yet unheard in Boston, humor, fancy and skill join toge

---

Herald Dec 28

TENTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Bliss's "Color" Symphony Played First Time in America

COMPOSER IS CALLED ON STAGE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Boccherini; Violoncello concerto in B flat major (Pablo Casals, violoncellist); Bliss, "Color" Symphony (first time in America); Ravel, First Series of Fragments from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The "Color" Symphony of Mr. Bliss, who was present at the concert and was called on the stage after the performance, was produced at the Three Choirs Festival, Gloucester, England, in September, 1922. It is said of him that, composing, he has long associated colors with music. In this symphony, which is in four movements, he strives to give in tones the ideas that come into the mind with the words "purple," "red," "blue," "green." Thus to Mr. Bliss and no doubt to some others, "purple" suggests amethysts, royalty, pageantry and death; "red" is the color of rubies, wine, revery, furnaces courage, magic; "blue" represents sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy; "green," emerals, hope, joy, youth, Spring, victory."

This symphony might be described as a document in color audition, which has interested many for many years. Rimbaud and Ghil found that vowels have colors. Unfortunately for an exact science, Rimbaud said that "i" is red and "o" is blue, while Ghil said that "o" is red and "i" is blue. This difference of opinion on an important point makes the judicious grieve.

It is also unfortunate that various colors suggest widely differing things to different persons. Then, again, there are many who cannot distinguish tints, much less demi-tints; and there are those that are color-blind.

To watch for the sounds that in Mr. Bliss's movement, "Blue" for instance, would suggest to this or that hearer a sapphire, or the ocean depths, the sky (star bedecked or murky), loyalty (to a political party or to friends), and melancholy might pass the time agreeably, but the character of the music itself would probably escape one. "Melanchody," yes, that can easily be expressed, but we have our doubts about the sapphire, deep water (storm tossed waves can be expressed in music; that is if the hearer is told beforehand that these waves are to be portrayed in tones); we have our doubts about the sky, whatever the meteorological condition may be.

Would it not be better, then, to hear this music without eyes glued on the descriptive program notes? To consider the music and musical idiom of Mr. Bliss.

He certainly has ideas; he has technical skill; his instrumentation is often ingenious in that it surprises; but is he, after all, a colorist? He can create a mood—as in the funeral music of "Purple," but with a great orchestra at his hand he does not seem to us to have so great a command of color as say Duparc, scoring discreetly an accompaniment for one of his songs for a much smaller orchestra, but with a fine sense of combinations and solo effects.

The most musical of the four movements is "Blue," in which there was some charming pages, charming melodically, and by reason of the simple orchestral dress.

Few of us are now afraid of dissonances. We welcome them when they are introduced to gain an effect, and the result is powerful. The bitterer, the harsher, the better. Mr Bliss's dissonances too often turn sound into mere noise, and no descriptive program could justify these pages, which was not even interestingly ugly.

Mr. Monteux had, as is his wont, taken great pains in preparation. Mr. Bliss could not hope for a more expressive performance. The orchestra played brilliantly. 'When works like this "Color" Symphony are produced the hearer must meet the composer more than half way. The Symphony audience as a rule does not rush forward at the risk of tripping and breaking legs when a new work is performed. It is inclined to be shy and backward, words that are not necessarily synonymous with critical. At the end of the performance there was generous applause.

Mr. Casals gave a delightful reading of Boccherini's concerto. The beauty of his tone, his command of nuances, his exquisite phrasing, his technical mastery, and the ease with which he plays, have long excited world-wide admiration.

An eloquent performance of Brahms's noble "Tragic" overture opened the concert, which closed with a poetic and dramatic reading of the fragments from Ravel's ballet.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for the concerts of Jan. 11, 12 is as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso No. 6, G minor; d'Indy, Symphony on a French Mountain Air (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); Gliere, "The Sirens"; Gilbert, Negro Rhapsody.

His 'Color' Symphony Given Here Yesterday

Photograph by Kesslere
ARTHUR BLISS

Globe Dec 28

CASALS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bliss' "Color Symphony" for First Time Here

Boccherini Concerto Played Marvelously

Yesterday's Symphony concert was in every way the most notable of the present season to date. The soloist was Pablo Casals, who gave what can only be described as a marvelous performance of an unfamiliar and thoroughly delightful concerto by Boccherini. The novelty was Arthur Bliss' "A Colour Symphony," which proved to be, with the exception of Holst's "The Planets," by far the most notable English composition heard at these concerts in years.

The repertory pieces were Brahms' "Tragic Overture," a very great classic, and some "Orchestral Fragments" from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." Mr Bliss was present and asknowledged the not too cordial applause which greeted his work, which he wisely permitted Mr Monteux to conduct for him.

But two previous performances by soloists at these concerts in the past decade come to mind as comparable to Casals' poignantly beautiful playing yesterday. One was Melba singing Mozart's "Voi che sapete," the other Kreisler playing the Beethoven violin concerto, both before the war. Mr Casals not only made cello playing thrilling to a listener accustomed to regard cello solos as a wearisome infliction; he made cadenzas so exquisite that a listener in the habit of exhausting the vocabulary of invective against cadenzas wished that these would go on forever.

The felicity in detail and the breadth and dignity of style of Casals are beyond praise. Nobody else can get such tone from a cello. Nobody else plays the cello, and only one living man, Fritz Kreisler, plays the violin so well.

Mr Bliss is still young enough to be boyish, and yet too old to pose. His music is frank, sincere, a bit naive. He blends rhythms with astonishing skill. He has the gift of melodic invention, and is not ashamed to use it. Dissonance does not frighten him, yet one never feels that he is trying to shock the sedate, even when he does shock them. This "Color Symphony" is not a symphony in structure or mood. It is a suite, ending with an exuberant double fugue which would make Ebenezer Prout turn in his grave.

The "colors," purple, red, blue, and green, each have a movement named after them, but that is only Mr Bliss' little joke. One surmises that he knows as well as anyone that "color audition" is an irrelevant if perplexing phenomenon as far as the art of music is concerned. Taken as sheer music this symphony is not so remote in mood from Boccherini, nearer still to Haydn.

It comes like a breath of fresh air into the overheated and lifeless "salon" atmosphere in which such composers as Bax and Scott seem to compose. Perhaps this is Mr Bliss' "Rienzi," as well as his first symphony. Maybe a "Meistersinger" or an "Eroica" will follow in due course. If so they will be well worth serious attention.

This "Color Symphony" deserves repetition during the present season. The audience would certainly learn in time to like it, baffled as some of them seemed yesterday by its daring dissonances.

The "Fragments" from "Daphnis et Chloe," which the program used to call a "suite," are tantalising scraps of an nteresting modern piece Boston is not ikely to see and hear in its entirety. he ballet was given in Paris a dozen ears ago, but Ravel is ceasing to be a ad without quite becoming an established genius. Even if he is a genius, here is no ballet likely to come here hat would play him.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," his most erfect masterpiece, was not played in he grand manner yesterday. It has lassic dignity, and a bigness of structure which Mr Monteux' episodic and none too sympathetic performance obscured.

The accompaniment for the Boccherini, though stodgy in comparison with Casal's playing, was better than is usually given soloists. The Ravel was exceptionally well played, and the performance of Biss' music seemed more than adequate. There are no concerts next week.

P. R.

[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of our visitors from Boston provided an evening of keen pleasure.

Pierre Monteux has done magnificent work with that celebrated body of musicians, and the results were apparent to the very large audience that greeted the band, and Mme. Sigrid Onegin, who graced the occasion with her truly glorious singing of Wagner's ria from "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott," and Schubert's "Erlkoenig," and "Allmacht."

Mr. Monteux elected the first symphony of Sibelius as his principal number, for which we offer devout thanks. Sibelius has written six symphonies, but unless Messrs. Monteux, Muck or Stransky play one or the other every few years, New Yorkers are treated to "Finnlandia," and the "Valse Triste." We wager that the programs of our local orchestras are determined by throwing a coin, heads meaning the Tschaikovsky "Pathetique," and tail a Wagner program. But perhaps we are unjust. We are occasionally treated to such futurist stuff as Dvorak's "New World," Schubert's "Unfinished," and Beethoven's "C Minor Symphonies."

Mr. Monteux's program included Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," and Strauss's "Salome Dance." The Orchestra played delightfully.

[165]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE KANSAS CITY
MO.
STAR

DEC 9 - 1923

THE MUSIC WORLD.

By W. J. Henderson.

The International Composers' Guild gave its first concert of the present season last week. The purpose of this organization is to give darkest New York opportunity to become enlightened as to the progress music is making toward freedom from the shackles of tradition, the restraining forms of the old masters and the enslavement of the antiquated scales and harmonies used by Wagner, Brahms, Bruckner, Mahler, Richard Strauss and that lot. When you go to a concert of the guild you have to sit up.

The program included Stravinsky's ballet, "Renard," which was first performed in Paris at the home of the Princess de Polignac. On May 18, 1922, the Daghilieff company gave it at the Grand Opera. It tells the story of a fox which exercises all its cunning to catch a rooster, but is always defeated by the bird's particular friends, a cat and a goat. The unsuccessful fox is represented by a falsetto voice. There are two tenors and two bass soloists, Jose Delaquerriere, Howard Hanson, John Barclay and Hubert Linscott, and there was a small orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski.

Another tidbit of the evening was Arnold Schoenberg's "Herzgewaesche" for soprano, harp, harmonium and celesta. Mr. Schoenberg, who composed "Pierrot Lunaire," is very popular with the guild, but there was some difficulty in producing the novelty of the evening owing to the appaling range of the soprano role. Miss Eva Leoni said she was not afraid and she sang it. Other pieces on the list were "Three Poems" for voice and piano by Maurice Delage, whose papa makes automobiles, and piano pieces by Arthur Lourre, Paul Hindemith and the redoubtable Bela Bertok. Claude Arrau tackled these.

The Delage music was quite out of date. The composer was a pupil of Ravel and imitated his master. The piano pieces served to arouse wonder at the musical memory of Mr. Arrau, who played them without notes. These pieces were of the latest type, music without any of the ancient devices of Mozart or Beethoven. The audience, which filled the theater, loved them. Then came Mr. Schoenberg's work and Miss Leoni's voice. They were honored with an encore. The music is Schoenberg right up to date. Those who heard the "Pierrot Lunaire" knew at once that they had not measured the composer's possibilities. Some listeners even laughed at this really solemn composition.

The Stravinsky creation was the chief contribution of the list. It proved to be a fine and ironic travesty on the thing that the other composers were struggling to do. As usual Stravinsky showed himself the master. His composition was farcically funny, which it was intended to be. To describe it in detail would require a handbook after the manner of Wolzogen. It was well performed, and the audience was so ravished by it that there was an insistent demand for its repetition. Mr. Stokowski asked the singers if they were willing to sing it again. They were and so Stravinski had the distinction of receiving an encore at the end of a program from an audience that would not go home without it.

"Faust" was given at the Metropolitan opera house for the first time this season. The performance had special interest because Feodor Chaliapin, appeared as the courtly devil of Gounod's masterpiece. He had sung the role only once before at the Metropolitan. It was on January 6, 1908, when his chief associates were Miss Farrar as Marguerite, Mr. Caruso as Faust and Mr. Scotti as Valentin. At that time his impersonation was regarded as quite out of Gounod's picture, rude in style and generally overboisterous.

A wise writer said "The leopard cannot change his spots," to which an appropriate answer might be "No one ever saw a leopard try. "The leopard's spots at any rate may soften their outlines with age. Mr. Chaliapin's Mephistopheles was less exaggerated than it was fifteen years ago. Vocally it was rough and out of style, but the distinguished basso is a Russian artist, not a French one, and he has the artist's privilege to put his own powerful personality into every role.

He indulged in a bit of horse play with Sibel in the Kermess scene and got the justifying laugh from the audience. And has made his own change of tempo in the "Veau d'or," but had to repeat the second stanza. Mephistopheles was the outstanding figure in the opera, just as it was fifteen years earlier, when it stood out somewhat like a shooting star in the peaceful firmament of Gounod.

Mme. Alda was the Marguerite. She was in good voice, looked well, and received plenty of applause. Mr. Martinelli's Faust is familiar, a well-planned performance, but not among this tenor's happiest achievements. There was a new Valentin. Lawrence Tibbett, a Los Angeles barytone, who sang his music with a light voice of agreeable quality and generally in commendable style.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-eighth season in this city took place in Carnegie hall. The program comprised Jan Sibelius's first symphony, the Brahms variations on the "Choral St. Anthony" theme of Haydn and the dance from Richard Strauss's "Salome," with "Gerichter Gott," from "Rienzi," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" as the vocal solo contributions. The singer was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

There was nothing in this list demanding anxious scrutiny or rhapsodic praise. In the program notes the dythyrambic prose of Paul Rosenfeld evoked by the symphonic creations of Sibelius was quoted most aptly. Sibelius deserves every word of it. If one has crossed the narrow sea between Sweden and Finland and landed in the cheerless port of Abo and thence journeyed by train to Petrograd, he suspects that Sibelius well knew how to translate the darkling moods of his country into grandiose and gloomy music.

The performance of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice, not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang with power and enthusiasm, but with many singularities of technic. However, finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be awarded much glory. The audience apparently was well satisfied with Mme. Onegin's offerings.

"MEFISTOFELE" SUNG.

The Monday evening audiences at the Metropolitan opera house seem to be in for a course of intensive training in serious listening. This may be for the much needed benefit of art, but it has the same effect, on social delight, as a discussion of Mr. Einstein's relativity at a dinner party. The first Monday was devoted to what ought to have been a pleasant entertainment, but the performance of "Thais" proved to be a depressant. The second Monday was given over to "William Tell," a singularly gloomy echo of a somber past, and the third to "Die Meistersinger," which, as a social repast, is not regarded as certain to give happiness in every box.

The fourth Monday of the season brought Boito's "Mefistofele," which has long been accepted as the most subtle and psychological of the various musical treatments of Goethe's poems, but which is without question the most episodic and disjointed. The hero of the opera is the devil himself, and he spreads about him an atmosphere of grim sarcasm and biting irony and a series of misfortunes. Perhaps before the season is over the Monday evening subscribers will be greeted with something less exacting.

Mr. Chaliapin, of course, impersonated Mefistofele. He did it in his accustomed manner, singing most of the music in his inimitable and quite unique style, and slipping easily into parlando whenever that style seemed better suited to his need of colloquial utterance. Fastidious listeners will regret Mr. Chaliapin's use of talk, but he achieves his ends, which may not always be Boito's, but are dramatically effective. The general impression created by his Mefistofele is that the arch fiend is present with all his sinister power and the undaunted spirit with which he defies the Creator in the prologues. It is a superb dramatic portraiture, and it will long be remembered by serious opera-goers.

Mme. Alda made her first appearance of the season, singing Margherita, which is one of her best roles. She was cordially received by the large audience, and generously applauded. Mr. Gigli repeated the admirable Faust, with which he made his debut before the New York public.

(Copyright, 1923, by the New York Herald.)

FROM
NEWS, DEC 8 - 1923
Providence, R. I.

Ignace Paderewski, Great Polish Pianist and Statesman, to Be Heard in Concert in Albee Theatre Tomorrow

The great Polish pianist, Ignace Paderewski, will be heard in concert at the Albee Theatre tomorrow afternoon under the management f Albert Steinert. Notwithstanding his retirement for several seasons from concert work the Polish artist returned last season greater than ever. His visit to Providence this season is a welcome even to music lovers here.

The pianist's present tour has been a series of tremendous successes. His great popularity as an artist and his fame as Poland's champion in the great war easily make him ano outstanding figure in the contest field.

At his recital tomorrow Paderewski will play sonatas by Beethoven and Liszt as well as pieces by Rubinstein and one of his own compositions.

Paderewski's fame as a composer has been largely overshadowed by his fame as a pianist. In this respect he resembles Liszt, who was well along in years before the world awoke to the fact that he was a great composed.

The bulk of Pederewski's compositions is not large, but it is important. His more famous shorter pieces are his "Minuet" and "Cracovienne." Among his larger works for piano are his "Polish Fantasia" and his concerto. His symphony written in 1907 is a work of great magnitude and must be regarded as one of the most important contributations to the symphony literature of the last half century. He has also written an opera "Manru," which was performed in this country in 1902.

Known as the poet of the piano in the earlier years of his concert work, Paderewski later became a player more orchestral in the breadth and graduer of his style, at the same time retaining his wonderful delicacy of touch.

A well chosen group of pieces by Chopin is included in tomorrow's programme.

The programme is as follows:

Variations and Fugue, E-flat Minor Op. 23 .... Paderewski
Conata, E-flat Major, Op. 27, No. 1. .... Beethoven
Andante, Allegro, Tempo prino Allegro molto e vivace—adagio con espression Sonata, B-minor .... Liszt
Ballade, F-minor, Op. 52... Chopin
Nocturne, D-flat, Op. 27.... Chopin
Scherzo B-flat Minor ...... Chopin
Barcarolle, A-minor .... Rubinstein
Etude, C-major .... Rubinstein
Valse Caprice .... Rubinstein

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ethel Leginska, the celebrated pianist, will be the soloist of the evening at the second Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday, Dec. 11, at 8:15. This virtuoso has long been regarded in America as the leading pianist of the younger generation. She extended her fame to Europe last season when she appeared with the firs' symphony o rchestras and in recitals in London, Rome, Milan and the cities of Central Europe. Leginska has also appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the regular Boston concerts. She will be heard next Tuesday in Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian folk tunes. Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz" and follow it with the First Symphony in E-minor of Jan Sibelius, the celebrated living Finnish composer, who is perhaps best known through this popular and melodious score. Mr. Monteux will also present Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the ball scene from Berlioz's Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

-08 1923

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which it would ~~now seem~~ will not appear in this city this season for the first time in many years, gave its first concerts of the fall in New York on Thursday and Saturday of last week. H. C. Colles, well known English musical critic, who is now writing for the New York Times, commented on the Saturday concert as follows:

"The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra given at Carnegie hall was more calculated to show the qualities of the orchestra than was that of Thursday night. There is not much to be said of Mahler's first symphony, which began the concert, except that Respighi's delightful arrangements of old Italian dances and airs, Dukas's "La Peri-Poeme Danse" and Smetana's overture to "Peodana Nevesta" did all possible to make amends for the tedious three-quarters of an hour which the symphony imposed. Mahler affecting the beauty of simplicity is more wearisome than Mahler adopting the heavily intellectual pose, and this symphony is like an elaborate landscape painted by an artist who never leaves his studio.

"Respighi, however, brought an altogether fresher atmosphere. He approaches the work of the part with understanding and sympathy, not with patronage. He does not dress up Vincenzo Galilei and the other sixteenth century composers to tickle modern ears with their quaintness, but he gives them just as much of new orchestral coloring as they need to show the freshness of their melodies and rhythms.

"The glowing tone of the strings was specially remarkable in the gagliarda and, altogether, the performance was an admirable piece of work. With Dukas Pierre Monteaux seemed to be on his own ground. Its dance rhythms were played with perfect finish and the wayward charm of its French style was treated with the fullest sympathy. Smetana's overture, the title of which the program translated as "The Sold Bride," belongs to the first and most famous of Smetana's eight Czech operas. It is perhaps the most brilliant of comedy overtures since Mozart's "Figaro," with which it has something in common.

"Like the overture to Figaro its brilliance depends mainly on the strings and the playing of the strings, both in those electrifying sforzandos and in the rapid pianissimo passages, was magnificent. One must not forget to mention also the tone of the brass, which throughout the concert was splendidly resonant and never coarse. Indeed the playing of this group of works gave a very strong impression of the musical ensemble which the Boston orchestra can achieve."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 9 192

After ending his fifth ~~and last~~ season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux is expected to return to France, where he first made his mark as a conductor, having presided over the Colonne and other Paris orchestras.

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun DEC 22 1923
New York City

Features of the second pair of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on January 3 and 5, will be the performance of Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" at the Thursday evening concert and the appearance of Jacques Thibaud as soloist at the Saturday matinee, on which program Pierre Monteux will also introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony."

FALL RIVER
MASS.
GLOBE

DEC - 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING HERE ON SUNDAY DEC. 30

When Pierre Monteux, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to his present post four years ago, he noticed at the first rehearsal the acoustical difference of the empty Hall, and ordered that a great curtain be hung in front of the stage reaching from floor to roof. It has hung at each of his rehearsals since, absorbing the sound and replacing the auditors of Fridays and Saturdays, who probably little realize that they make the music mellow by their physical presence.

To have power over his men a conductor needs two things: their respect and their confidence. If he is adroit in giving cues, if his ear misses nothing, if he knows to a hair's breath what he wants and how to get what he wants with the least drain upon the nerves of each of the hundred waiting musicians, then respect and confidence are a matter of course.

Mr. Monteux's alert ear is a thing to wonder at, nor has he travelled the world over, opera, and ballet o perfecting the art o Nth degree.

Every morning in the on a concert day, is devo hearsing. If any one ima the purpose of a Boston rehearsal is to learn how t piece, he is mistaken. If could penetrate the mysteries Symphony Hall when a work i ing read off at sight for the first by the orchestra he might be that he is hearing a finished perf ance. He would indeed be hearin finished performance, but the p performances of the Boston S phony Orchestra must be su finished. The ability to read most difficult scores at sight is the musicians a starting point, w is taken for granted. When rehearse, they merely ac themselves to the conductor' of stress, of balance and which constitute his person pretation. They familiarize selves with the music in h that they can free themselves the effort of reading—so that

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 16 1923

Newport Musician-Composer Wins Recognition

Allan Lincoln Langley, Brown Graduate in Class of 1914, May Become "Waltz King" as Result of His Successful Compositions

In Allan Lincoln Lagnley, son of Alfred G. Langley of Newport, and a Brown graduate in 1914, Rhode Island may have a potential "waltz king." Some of his waltzes have been played by the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony with high acclaim. He is at present playing in the viola section of the New York organization and was formerly a member of the Boston band.

Johann Strauss has been the inspiration for two of his waltzes, which were played with great success last summer and the preceding one at the Stadium concerts in New York. "The Immortals" was played Aug. 11 of this year, and received with big applause. Elly Ney, wife of Mr. Van Hoogstraten, the conductor, declared it was by far the best American composition played in the Stadium the past season. It was composed in the summer of 1921 and was written, as Mr. Langley says, as a tribute to some of the notable composers who made the waltz famous.

Six waltz composers are remembered in the dedication. The introduction and coda are inscribed to Johann Strauss and his son. The four waltzes are dedicated to Emile Waldteufel, Josef Gung'l, Josef Lanner and Karl Konzak, and in each the effort was made to follow their respective styles.

On Aug. 4, 1922, his "In Strauss's Time" was played at the Stadium, meeting likewise with favor from the audience and the men who performed it. It was written in the form and manner of the old Viennese waltz immortalized by the Johann Strauss family, and aims to recall something of the spirit of that Golden Age of the dance.

From the first Mr. Langley has been a student of the waltz, one of his earliest, "Wanderlust," having been played at the "Pops" in Boston while the composer was at the New England Conservatory following his graduation from Brown. During that period he composed some other waltzes, a march, "Greetings to the Pops," which the orchestra performed, and a string quartet, also played in Boston. Later compositions include a sonata for viola and piano, written for the prize contest at Mrs. Coolidge's Berkshire Festival in 1919. This was played at a faculty concert of the New England Conservatory, in March, 1920, and later by the composer in New York.

Mr. Langley is also a contributor to magazines and has had several articles published on musical subjects. He began his musical studies at the age of 8, taking up the violin and imbibing the rudiments of composition. On entering Brown University he became a member of the college orchestra and took a prominent part in its activities, leading the music for Commencement Day in 1910. He was chosen class poet in his Senior year.

He then went to the Boston Conservatory, being admitted as second violin to the school's orchestra at the beginning of his second term. Later he led the second violins and then the violas. In September, 1918, he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing second violin and viola the first season, and second violin the following year.

In the spring of 1920 he went to New York and joined the National Symphony Orchestra, occupying the first desk of the second violins in the Stadium concerts that summer, and playing among the second violins during the winter season. When the National and the Philharmonic were combined, he was retained for the viola section. He is highly regarded as a player and composer by his associates in the Philharmonic and his former companions in the Boston Symphony.

Allan Lincoln Langley

FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD

DEC 7 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As a museum brings visual works of art before the people, the Boston Symphony orchestra which appears at the Empire theatre, Dec. 30 does its great service to the art of music. It was endowed and supported for the inestimable public benefit it might bring, and through forty years of concerts in Boston, New York, and other principal cities, this world-famous organization has splendidly fulfilled its purpose.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to the light of ideal performance the great wealth of orchestral music. The music of new composers, both American and foreign, which might otherwise remain silent and unknown, has found a presentation and recognition in this way.

A glance at the lives of the hundred members reveals the orchestra as a great organic main source of music activity. The musicians are the best of their kind, and have been brought from every corner of the old world, where musical life flowers from traditional roots centuries old. These virtuosos make America their country. Their sons grow up to be American citizens and often become fine musicians, taking their place in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony players naturally give their first genius to the matchless performances of the Orchestra, and yet this is but part of their service to the community. They instill their talent by teaching. They form among themselves Quartets and other small ensembles such as the Kneisel Quartet and the new Burgin Quartet. The individual virtuosos give concerts of their own. Thus the message of music in smaller forms is spread throughout the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 7 1924

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FEB. 12

A remarkable program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux for the visit of his Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians to Worcester. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall, Feb. 12, at 8.15 o'clock.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Seventh by Beethoven in A major which, among the immortal nine, stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movements sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid as light itself; never was the master more inspired than when he wrote the melody of the divine allegretto. The rhythmic pulse of this symphony led Wagner to call it "the apotheosis of the dance."

Probably the most brilliant score of the evening will be Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." In the more fodern school of descriptive music it would be hard to find a more magnificent achievement than this work of Richard Strauss, who is called the greatest composer living. The poem is about a man who lies in mortal sickness on his humble bed. There is a terrific struggle between life and death. Peace comes when the latter triumphs. There follows the transfiguration of his soul, an impressive and majestic music such as probably no other contemporary composer could remotely approach.

Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals" will also be played. These sketches distinctly reveal Debussy as an impressionist painter and the fact that he painted in tones instead of the pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any canvas. The interpretation of the nocturnes at the hands of the French conductor and the great orchestra under him is said to be unrivaled. Indeed, Pierre Monteux was a close collaborator with Debussy in the early production of his scores.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 23 1923

Thibaud Soloist With The Boston Orchestra

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, Jan. 4.

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the lyric Fourth Symphony of Schumanu, Gliere's symphonic poem, "Sirenes," and, to close the concert, Borodin's dances of stirring barbaric rhythms from his opera, "Pince Igor."

Jacques Thibaud will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in E flat. This splendid French virtuoso has appeared on former notable occasions as soloist with this orchestra elsewhere, but not in Brooklyn. He has just returned from France to open his American tour.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

DEC 23 1923

On Concert Horizon for 1923

COLOR in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced in its home city this week and will bring to town at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 5. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," "Blue," "Green."

The Bostonians on Jan. 3 will revive here Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," of which the composer gave New York the world première years ago. Mr. Monteux's evening program adds Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso." The matinee, besides Bliss's symphony, will include Brahms's "Tragic" overture,

---

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 23 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, January 4.

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, the lyric Fourth Symphony of Schumann, Gliere's symphonic poem "Sirenes," and, to close the concert, Borodin's dances from his opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE STAMFORD
CONN.
ADVOCATE

DEC 1923

Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 3, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteux, conductor.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

DEC 23 1923

Boston Symphony.

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Jan. 4. Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, and music by Schumann, Borodin and others.

NEW YORK
HERALD

DEC 23 1923

The Boston Symphony.

Features of the season's second pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on January 3 and 5, will be Strauss's Symphonic Domestica, which has not been performed by this orchestra for a number of seasons, and the Color Symphony of Arthur Bliss, English composer. The soloist at the Saturday concert, Jacques Thibaud, will be heard in Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The other numbers will be Brahms's Tragic Overture and the First Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The remainder of the Thursday program will be Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso."

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 16 1923

Newport Musician-Composer Wins Recognition

Allan Lincoln Langley, Brown Graduate in Class of 1914, May Become "Waltz King" as Result of His Successful Compositions

In Allan Lincoln Lagnley, son of Alfred G. Langley of Newport, and a Brown graduate in 1914, Rhode Island may have a potential "waltz king." Some of his waltzes have been played by the New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony with high acclaim. He is at present playing in the viola section of the New York organization and was formerly a member of the Boston band.

Johann Strauss has been the inspiration for two of his waltzes, which were played with great success last summer and the preceding one at the Stadium concerts in New York. "The Immortals" was played Aug. 11 of this year, and received with big applause. Elly Ney, wife of Mr. Van Hoogstraten, the conductor, declared it was by far the best American composition played in the Stadium the past season. It was composed in the summer of 1921 and was written, as Mr. Langley says, as a tribute to some of the notable composers who made the waltz famous.

Six waltz composers are remembered in the dedication. The introduction and coda are inscribed to Johann Strauss and his son. The four waltzes are dedicated to Emile Waldteufel, Josef Gung'l, Josef Lanner and Karl Konzak, and in each the effort was made to follow their respective styles.

On Aug. 4, 1922, his "In Strauss's Time" was played at the Stadium, meeting likewise with favor from the audience and the men who performed it. It was written in the form and manner of the old Viennese waltz immortalized by the Johann Strauss family, and aims to recall something of the spirit of that Golden Age of the dance.

From the first Mr. Langley has been a student of the waltz, one of his earliest, "Wanderlust," having been played at the "Pops" in Boston while the composer was at the New England Conservatory following his graduation from Brown. During that period he composed some other waltzes, a march, "Greetings to the Pops," which the orchestra performed, and a string quartet, also played in Boston. Later compositions include a sonata for viola and piano, written for the prize contest at Mrs. Coolidge's Berkshire Festival in 1919. This was played at a faculty concert of the New England Conservatory, in March, 1920, and later by the composer in New York.

Mr. Langley is also a contributor to magazines and has had several articles published on musical subjects. He began his musical studies at the age of 8, taking up the violin and imbibing the rudiments of composition. On entering Brown University he became a member of the college orchestra and took a prominent part in its activities, leading the music for Commencement Day in 1910. He was chosen class poet in his Senior year.

He then went to the Boston Conservatory, being admitted as second violin to the school's orchestra at the beginning of his second term. Later he led the second violins and then the violas. In September, 1918, he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing second violin and viola the first season, and second violin the following year.

In the spring of 1920 he went to New York and joined the National Symphony Orchestra, occupying the first desk of the second violins in the Stadium concerts that summer, and playing among the second violins during the winter season. When the National and the Philharmonic were combined, he was retained for the viola section. He is highly regarded as a player and composer by his associates in the Philharmonic and his former companions in the Boston Symphony.

Allan Lincoln Langley

FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD
DEC 7 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As a museum brings visual works of art before the people, the Boston Symphony orchestra which appears at the Empire theatre, Dec. 30 does its great service to the art of music. It was endowed and supported for the inestimable public benefit it might bring, and through forty years of concerts in Boston, New York, and other principal cities, this world-famous organization has splendidly fulfilled its purpose.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to the light of ideal performance the great wealth of orchestral music. The music of new composers, both American and foreign, which might otherwise remain silent and unknown, has found a presentation and recognition in this way.

A glance at the lives of the hundred members reveals the orchestra as a great organic main source of music activity. The musicians are the best of their kind, and have been brought from every corner of the old world, where musical life flowers from traditional roots centuries old. These virtuosos make America their country. Their sons grow up to be American citizens and often become fine musicians, taking their place in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony players naturally give their first genius to the matchless performances of the Orchestra, and yet this is but part of their service to the community. They instill their talent by teaching. They form among themselves Quartets and other small ensembles such as the Kneisel Quartet and the new Burgin Quartet. The individual virtuosos give concerts of their own. Thus the message of music in smaller forms is spread throughout the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 7 1924

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FEB. 12

A remarkable program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux for the visit of his Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians to Worcester. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall, Feb. 12, at 8.15 o'clock.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Seventh by Beethoven in A major which, among the immortal nine, stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movements sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid as light itself; never was the master more inspired than when he wrote the melody of the divine allegretto. The rhythmic pulse of this symphony led Wagner to call it "the apotheosis of the dance."

Probably the most brilliant score of the evening will be Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." In the more fodern school of descriptive music it would be hard to find a more magnificent achievement than this work of Richard Strauss, who is called the greatest composer living. The poem is about a man who lies in mortal sickness on his humble bed. There is a terrific struggle between life and death. Peace comes when the latter triumphs. There follows the transfiguration of his soul, an impressive and majestic music such as probably no other contemporary composer could remotely approach.

Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals" will also be played. These sketches distinctly reveal Debussy as an impressionist painter and the fact that he painted in tones instead of the pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. This music of mood and subtle suggestion is in its way more potent than any canvas. The interpretation of the nocturnes at the hands of the French conductor and the great orchestra under him is said to be unrivaled. Indeed, Pierre Monteux was a close collaborator with Debussy in the early production of his scores.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
DEC 23 192

Thibaud Soloist With The Boston Orchestra

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, Jan. 4.

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the lyric Fourth Symphony of Schumann, Gliere's symphonic poem, "Sirenes," and, to close the concert, Borodin's dances of stirring barbaric rhythms from his opera, "Pince Igor."

Jacques Thibaud will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto in E flat. This splendid French virtuoso has appeared on former notable occasions as soloist with this orchestra elsewhere, but not in Brooklyn. He has just returned from France to open his American tour.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
DEC 23 1923

On Concert Horizon for 1923

COLOR in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced in its home city this week and will bring to town at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 5. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," "Blue," "Green."

The Bostonians on Jan. 3 will revive here Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," of which the composer gave New York the world première years ago. Mr. Monteux's evening program adds Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso." The matinee, besides Bliss's symphony, will include Brahms's "Tragic" overture, and Mo-

---

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 23 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, January 4.

Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, the lyric Fourth Symphony of Schumann, Gliere's symphonic poem "Sirenes," and, to close the concert, Borodin's dances from his opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE STAMFORD
CONN.
ADVOCATE
DEC 1923

Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 3, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor.

NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE
DEC 23 1923

Boston Symphony.

With Jacques Thibaud as the soloist of the evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music, Friday evening, Jan. 4. Pierre Monteux will present Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, and music by Schumann, Borodin and others.

NEW YORK
HERALD
DEC 23 1923

The Boston Symphony.

Features of the season's second pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on January 3 and 5, will be Strauss's Symphonic Domestica, which has not been performed by this orchestra for a number of seasons, and the Color Symphony of Arthur Bliss, English composer. The soloist at the Saturday concert, Jacques Thibaud, will be heard in Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The other numbers will be Brahms's Tragic Overture and the First Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The remainder of the Thursday program will be Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Gliere's "Sirenes" and Liszt's "Tasso."

ymphony

COMPOSER, NEW SYMPHONY, NEW VICTORIES

Trans Dec 29

HUR BLISS OF THE YOUNGER BRITONS

Music of Imagination and Individuality, Alive and Insistent—Tunes Again and Also All the "Modernisms"—Force and Freedom—Mr. Casals in Perfection—Brahms Inanimate and Ravel Alight

An audience afraid-of-itself sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It is hard to believe that any considerable part of it heard Mr. Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" unimpressed and unstirred. Yet at the end of the piece came no more than brief, mild, ripple of clapping. Had not a few chagrined—and also practiced—hands persisted, it would have stilled even before Mr. Monteux could thrust the composer upon the stage. At sight of him—since the company of Friday is usually polite—the applause lengthened, was even eked out second recall. In these brief instants, Bliss, who is a blond, well-set, quick- and quick-moving young English- somehow contrived to title a "Color Symphony;" ostensibly in the labelling of the four divisions —Purple, Red, Blue, Green—Mr. Bliss's music is not "color music" in the narrower sense of those words. That is to say, he does not too closely identify colors with tones or tones with colors. These measures, if his spokesmen speak advisedly, do not run red; nor those glow green. He lacks Skriabin's simplicities, or subtleties, on this score. He is not of those arbitrary minds which would commit each key to a color; because that key happens so to tint their fancies. Rather, to his imagination, colors as colors suggest certain sights or moods. To him, Purple is "color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death"; Red, "of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage, magic"; Blue, "of sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty, melancholy"; Green, "of emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Into the music of the "Color Symphony," movement by movement, Mr. Bliss has sought to infuse less suggestion of hues than of these implications. His first division paces often to a stately march-rhythm; touches the sonorities of tonal pomps, may here be of courts and there of ceremonial mournings. There is tumult, again, in the rush of the second division, vigor in the rhythm, flash in the play of harmonies and timbres; while, maybe, in the thin, tart solo-measures for the oboe lurks the voice of magic. There are moments in which the third movement seems to sing in cadenzas bright and quivering as the blue of summer sky and sea; moments also in which the music droops into what Mr. Bliss would have the blue of melancholy. As to the finale, call it green, vermilion or chrome yellow—every man to his inclination in colorful tones—and here is music that beats and flames with young joy, young power and young elation in the wielding.

For, to many a listener Mr. Bliss's Symphony was more engrossing and tingling as "absolute" music than as any color-scheme or color-suggestion in tones. It spoke for itself, right valiantly and—to use, for once, a hackneyed and debased word—right lovably. Hear at last in Arthur Bliss, son of Rugby and Cambridge, wanderer from England to the United States and back again, a composer who can write diatonic melody fresh and individual, with a contour, motion and expanding substance all its own; yet who can strew dissonances, sharpen harmonies, flick and bite with timbres in true modernistic fashion. Hear also a composer who in this Symphony, as in other pieces, shuns the orthodox and "thoughtful" development of motivs; yet who at will can write a far-sweeping, all-compelling Double Fugue that, at least in one subject, might have baffled old Johann Sebastian himself. Observe yet again a composer who can ply sonorities for the sonorities' sake—to use a pet word of the modernist doctrinaires—set them in "objective" array, assort them into patterns, give them sensuous appeal; yet who also charges his and orchestra Color Symphony moral remains Though Mr.

Every afternoon concerts chestra often paralysis of the of the dance and self-cons terday was only a ferer thereby—and company. For the chilly and perfum

$10,0

Substantial

fraught music- vel's ballet, " with less reas those pages ha terpiece. Poss any and all young men; threadbare by room. Yet a new Hamlet nightly sells the last seat in the House. There is no accounting for ences—no, not even for their Ba

By

Trans Dec 31

BLISS, RAVEL, TIMELY MORAL, AND PADEREWSKI

THE PIANIST DOING THE DAY'S WORK

He Sets an Unusual Programme—He Plays With Less Than His Wonted Ardors—Again the "Color Symphony"—Also a Hint from the Years — Mitja Nikisch to Return

Above all else Mr. Casals and his playing of the violoncello engrossed the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. Yet it was better disposed than its predecessor of Friday toward Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony" and lent more responsive ear to the beauties of Ravel's music from "Daphnis and Chloë." Yet neither piece—and Mr. Bliss's in particular was too heartily applauded. It is not Mr. Monteux, much thous ward his

---

Worcester Gazette - Jan 1

BIG MUSICAL EVENT, FEB. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play in Worcester After Three Years' Absence

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
Tribune
DEC 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE

One of the most important concerts of the Lawrence season will be the appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians in the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, at 3:15.

The present season, which is the 43rd of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion will return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as music with the imagery that his design predicates.

---

There is no escaping these sonorities in the first division of the "Color Symphony"; no mistaking these pageantries of princes and their ceremonial mournings. It is so, again, with the cadenzas of the woodwind choir in the "Blue" movement and their implications. There is no questioning that fugued finale. The ear, the mind, merely race along with it, like a dog out-flinging at a motor-car and running beside it. Yet here also is written a pæan of elation. Remember, again, the flashing tumults, abrupt progressions, sharp-set harmonies, of the second division—all clear-lined and keen-lined, with melody ready at need to bind and stay them, and then to cut them loose again. Finally—not to burk the word—good set tunes unfold in this Symphony, in the first and the third movements in particular—not fat, wheezy, middle-aged tunes, but tunes keen-edged, free-paced, upspringing, as the tunes of a young voice and imagination should be. In fine, Mr. Bliss neither shatters the older courses of music nor sits adamant before the new. From both he chooses and mates. Scarcely any modernist music, except Stravinsky's, seems so whole so inevitable as his. What of their compeers, these two may write no other way than that which they have chosen.

Best of all, there is no questioning the individuality and the independence of Mr. Bliss. He looks in his head and writes—of purple amethysts and pageantries; red rubies and tumults; sapphire-skies and sapphire-melancholies; green emeralds and springs; while at many a turn his imagery pierces and heats by sheer vitality. He looks in his mind and writes—shaping his blue cadenzas, plunging out his red riotings, plunging into verdant fugue, outflinging or inward turning this eager self in his candid tunes. They are as unyesterday, today and for-sentimental, sharp-set, and stirring as say—to pluck another youthful brand from the burning—is the piano-playing of Mitja Nikisch. Yet they lack not emotion. For the while it may not run too deep; but there it is—alive and to grow.

That same vigorous mind and vital temperament choose and invent Mr. Bliss's means. His progressions, syncopations, timbres, the darts of his modulations, the fling and leap of his rhythms, are all his own. They upspring within him; they lie ready to his hand. He can no other way; while thereby he persuades and convinces. Faint may have been the applause at Symphony Hall, yesterday, but a young composer, like no others, above most others of his time bowed to acknowledge it—when he was not more concerned with his pressing thanks to orchestra and conductor. Fancy a Symphony without the romanticism that Weber and Schumann, Liszt and Wagner, wrought into music; without the romantic realism of Strauss; as far from the filmy impressionism of Debussy as it is from the steely intellectuality of Casella and many a modernist symphony nearer to Bach than qualities are genius of the leader.

Monteux is preparing a program of direct appeal, which will test achieve-fall and destiny inexorable. Yet often the ear and the imagination lacked what sometimes seem the loftiness of the themes, the plangency of the progress. No more than the brooding Brahms remained.

Ravel brought beauty and passion and endless potency of musical means. Scarcely an opera house or a wandering ballet now keeps "Daphnis and Chloë" in active repertory. The piece is on the way to become a two-fold tone-poem, perpetuated in the Suites drawn from it by the composer himself. It was the first that Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played yesterday, finer of musical fibre than the second, if not so graphic of the theatre. From the beginning transpired that faint yet quickening music of mystery which is like stir of life when imagination gropes through the shadows. The dance of the nymphs shifted from words to tones the poet's "antique round." Again the music was like the air a-quiver with distant, gathering tremors. Then piped and whirled and strode the Dance of the Pirates. The completeness of the illusion freedom, of tion the wa and vigors. Monteux was Next, in the reckoning, Mr. Casals prevailed—in a Concerto of Boccherini, that lived, moved and renewed its being on by grace of the master-musician and master-violoncellist who played it. Nay, outside a slow movement, in which the composer fused his gently Italianate melody with an eighteenth-century loveliness and sensibility of line, the music was most alive and freshened in two cadenzas from Mr. Casals's own pen. A hand of a little earlier day—say Bach's at Cöthen—or of a little later time—say Mozart's in his final years—might have devised these transparent patterns, set in this embroidery of elegant exactions. As he wrote, so Mr. Casals played them—in an artful, yet mirror-like, simplicity. It was the finesse of his bow and fingers, endless in the shadings of tone; the light flow of his musical sensibility over figures; his luminous melody, his brightly beating, even, rhythms that reanimated and re-fleshed the bare, dry bones of Boccherini's prelude and finale; while upon the middle song he deployed all the soft lustres, the gentle vibrancies, of his singing voice. Ravel, wrote Mr. Gilman the other day, "could orchestrate an old shoe and make it interesting." Mr. Casals could play over and over the diatonic scale and set the stars a-singing to his violoncello.

Brahms began and Ravel ended the concert. The German's piece was the "Tragic Overture," wherein Mr. Monteux, on the way to rhythmic fervors and tonal brilliance with Bliss and to a whole range of fine ardors with Ravel, somehow missed the pace and accent that reveal, character, and set a-glow this darksome music. He re-stated it—the measures of fortitude and conflict, of spiritual illumination, of down-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
NEWS
JAN 5 - 1924

BE MONTEUX'S ST APPEARANCE HERE WITH THE SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux's appearance as tor of the Boston Symphony orra at the Auditorium tomorrow noon will be his last in Spring-, for at the end of this season he relinquish his baton to the hands erve Koussevitsky, who is comfrom his scenes of triumph in Lonand Paris to take his place. re Monteux will long be remembered here. His genius has added new alities of beauty to the famous orization, and never have its cons been more highly praised or dently enjoyed than under his diction. This, his fifth and last, promes to be, artistically speaking, the nest of them all.

Beethoven's symphony in A major, No 7, opus 92, opens the program tomorrow. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the 7th symphony in the spring of 1812. Prod'homme believes that the work was begun in the winter of 1811-1812. The autograph manuscript that belongs to the Mendelssohn family of Berlin bears the inscription: "Sinfonie. L. v. Bthvn 1812 13ten M." A clumsy binder cut the paper so that only the first line of the M is to be seen. There was, therefore, a dispute as to whether the month were May, June or July. Beethoven wrote to Varena on May 8, 1812: "I promise you immediately a wholly new symphony for the next Academy, and, as I now have opportunity, the copying will not cost you a heller." He wrote on July 19: "A new symphony is now ready. As the Archduke Rudolph will have it copied, you will be at no expense in the matter." It is generally believed that the symphony was completed May 13, in the hope that it would be performed at a concert at Whitsuntide.

The 7th and 8th symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert. The first performance of the 7th was at Vienna in the large hall of the university, on December 8, 1913.

NG FROM THE WELL
MASS.
SSUE OF 1923 mber the visit city on the occance of his cantata by the Choral Soted to know that Boston Symphony to present at an young composer's suite suggested by s in Alice in Won

---

TFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction began its second series of New York concerts on Thursday evening. The second of the series is taking place this afternoon. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, is the soloist this afternoon.

Trans Dec 31

and Violoncello.

As yet the conductors are not too successful in their effort to forestall applause between the movements of short symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's upraised arm did enable him to pass without interruption from the first to the second and from the third to the fourth division, of Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony." A week before, however, Mr. Stokowski in New York, could not restrain his clapping hearers through a symphony of Mozart. Seemingly, the uplifted arm is not yet a coded signal.

The present most successful in its sentatives of the management For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position five years ago. He is recognized one of the foremost authorities French opera in the world.

Getting an

Mr. Monteux of Boston's band was down for a concert the other eve, playing quite allegro & andante & etc.

Symphony

Trans Dec 29

NEW COMPOSER, NEW SYMPHONY, NEW VICTORIES

ARTHUR BLISS OF THE YOUNGER BRITONS

Music of Imagination and Individuality, Alive and Insistent—Tunes Again and Also All the "Modernisms"—Force and Freedom—Mr. Casals in Perfection—Brahms Inanimate and Ravel Alight

AN audience afraid-of-itself sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It is hard to believe that any considerable part of it heard Mr. Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" unimpressed and unstirred. Yet at the end of the piece came no more than brief, mild, ripple of clapping. Had not a few chagrined—and also practiced—hands persisted, it would have stilled even before Mr. Monteux could thrust the composer upon the stage. At sight of him—since the company of Friday is usually polite—the applause lengthened, was even eked out to a second recall. In these brief instants, Mr. Bliss, who is a blond, well-set, quick-minded and quick-moving young Englishman, somehow contrived to thank conductor and orchestra—and the episode of the "Color Symphony" was done.

The moral remains, and it seemed "writ large." Though Mr. Bliss sits high and distinctive among the youngest British composers; though he is making a discoverable place for himself in New Yo k; his music is scarcely known in Boston. He was a new man writing a novel piece, borrowing from no predecessor, resolutely taking his own way, preferring a Symphony of clear individualities to a Symphony of safe commonplaces. Yet "Safety First," he half-mute audience seemed to be saying to itself. It must have been interested; it should have been engrossed, enkindled. Yet was it quite prudent to applaud this new man with a new voice? What might the Mrs. Grundies, the Sir Fretfuls say? Before the audience could make decision, it was too late for any play of hands.

Every student of his neighbors at the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra has often observed this curious paralysis of the rewarding will. It is one of the congenital maladies of excessive prudence and self-consciousness. Mr. Bliss yesterday was only another, but signal, sufferer thereby—and in uncommonly good company. For the assembly was even more chilly and perfunctory to a second full-fraught music—the First Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." And with less reason, since through ten years those pages have been acknowledged masterpiece. Possibly some among us resent any and all music written by relatively young men; would hear only pieces worn threadbare by fifty years of the concert-room. Yet a new Hamlet, and a youthf nightly sells the last seat in the Or House. There is no accounting fo ences—no, not even for their Ba

By

$10,000 Added

Substantial Gift, in Memory of Mr. Higginson, to the Symphony Endowment Fund

BY report of the programme-book at the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, the Endowment Fund of the Orchestra has now risen to $156,003.52, thanks to a single gift, this week, of $10,000—"in memory of Henry L. Higginson." Too slowly, however, mounts the Guarantee Fund to meet the deficit for the current season. It stands now at $65,144.34, leaving $25,000, at the least, still to be pledged. Recent contributors were:

Percy L. Atherton, Amy W. Cabot, Chromatic Club, Mrs. F. H. Lee, Mrs. Henry G. Nichols, Edward M. Pickman, Mrs. Charles R. Sanger, Newton Swift, A. W. Wheelwright, Susie E. White.

Subscriptions to either fund—or better, both—may be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street. The amount so paid may be deducted from taxable income.

Trans Dec 31

BLISS, RAVEL, TIMELY MORAL, AND PADEREWSKI

THE PIANIST DOING THE DAY'S WORK

He Sets an Unusual Programme—He Plays With Less Than His Wonted Ardors—Again the "Color Symphony"—Also a Hint from the Years — Mitja Nikisch to Return

ABOVE all else Mr. Casals and his playing of the violoncello engrossed the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. Yet it was better disposed than its predecessor of Friday toward Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony" and lent more responsive ear to the beauties of Ravel's music from "Daphnis and Chloë." Yet neither piece—and Mr. Bliss's in particular—was too heartily applauded. It is not likely that Mr. Monteux, framing his programme, took much thought of the mood of audiences toward either music, since both richly deserved performance and had been in his mind these six months. None the less, when all had been said and done, a certain wisdom joined them in a single concert.

Loud was the outcry of the aggrieved and the resentful over Mr. Bliss's Symphony. The pounding, shrieking, mounting tumult of his final rio*ings in red, was not to be endured. The ultimate and brazen burst of his green fugue in a shower of rhythmic figures was an "outrage" upon the ear. His leaping dissonances were affronts; his sharp edged, dazzling cadenzas insults. Even his tunes, his unmistakable tunes, were no sooner sung than smothered—which comment, it is permissible to say, is a stifling of the truth. So forth and so onward. Friends of Mr. Bliss and his music dreaded and shuddered. Was he likey to be bound over to keep the peace beore he could flee the town? Was yet more onservative New York—to hear the "Color ymphony" next Saturday—likely to courge him with scorpions in succession to hese Bostonian whips?

Think back ten years or fifteen to the ays when the symphonic music of Joseph Maurice Ravel was slowly and advenurously making way into American conert halls; when conductors "indecently" laced it on programmes; when the infuiate of Friday and Saturday over the inruding Londoner, were not less vocal or certain-sure" over the intruding Parisian. s it seemed to them in those days, he also vrote music "not to be endured." that as "insult" and "outrage" to the ear nce the word "Bolshevik" was not then vented as epithet of personal dislike, narchist" sufficed to dismiss "this Monur Ravel." And now from Vienna to icago and back again, his music goes stays, little questioned, largely admired. en in this Boston of ours, it has prelled. Not a conductor in recent years Symphony Hall has been sparing of it. vel then, Bliss now, and Mrs. Partington broom yesterday, today and for-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOWELL
MASS.

ISSUE OF

DEC 1923

Those who remember the visit of s Taylor to this city on the occaof the performance of his cantata "Highwayman" by the Choral So will be interested to know that Monteux of the Boston Symphony estra proposes to present at an y date the young composer's ng orchestral suite suggested by s and episodes in Alice in Wonland.

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction began its second series of New York concerts on Thursday evening. The second of the series is taking place this afternoon. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, is the soloist this afternoon.

Trans Dec 31

and Violoncello.

As yet the conductors are not too successful in their effort to forestall applause between the movements of short symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's upraised arm did enable him to pass without interruption from the first to the second and from the third to the fourth division, of Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony." A week before, however, Mr. Stokowski in New York, could not restrain his clapping hearers through a symphony of Mozart. Seemingly, the uplifted arm is not yet a oded signal.

Worcester Gazette – Jan 1

BIG MUSICAL EVENT, FEB. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play in Worcester After Three Years' Absence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians will return to Worcester after an absence of three seasons and give a concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This leading musical organization of New England, which is one of the finest of its kind in the world, has, according to general opinion, in the last few seasons attained new heights of eloquence and perfection in performance under Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor.

The coming concert should prove a leading event of the Worcester musical season. It will be the last time that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform in Worcester under Pierre Monteux, for this greatest conductor France has produced, is about to return to his own country. He is now completing his fifth season at the head of this orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name has long stood for the utmost in musical performance. In ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear-cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs lies its distinction. These qualities are primarily due to the genius of the leader.

Mr. Monteux is preparing a program of direct appeal, which will likewise include the greatest achievements in the field of orchestral music in different parts of the world.

Worcester Telegram Jan 1 1924

Year In

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position five years ago. He is recognized one of the foremost authorities o French opera in the world.

Getting an

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

Tribune

DEC 31

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE

One of the most important concerts of the Lawrence season will be the appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians in the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, at 3:15.

The present season, which is the 43rd of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion will return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The soloist to appear with the orchestra will be Raymond Havens, the celebrated pianist whose appearance with the same orchestra in Lawrence several seasons ago made an unusual impression upon the audience. This virtuoso has played with the orchestra in a number of cities, including Boston and New York.

Every appearance of this world famous orchestra in Lawrence has been welcomed by splendid audiences. In 1919 M. Rabaud conducted the conecrt here where Mr. Havens made his instantaneous success. In 1920 the orchestra first appeared under Mr. Monteux with Miss Lily Meagher, a protege of John McCarmack, as soloist. Mr. Monteux again achieved a triumph when he returned in 1922 with Mr. Burgin, violinist, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1924

WILL BE MONTEUX'S LAST APPEARANCE HERE WITH THE SYMPHONY

M Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium tomorrow afternoon will be his last in Springfield, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to the hands of Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place. Pierre Monteux will long be remembered here. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization, and never have its concerts been more highly praised or evidently enjoyed than under his direction. This, his fifth and last, promises to be, artistically speaking, the finest of them all.

Beethoven's symphony in A major, No 7, opus 92, opens the program tomorrow. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the 7th symphony in the spring of 1812. Prod'homme believes that the work was begun in the winter of 1811-1812. The autograph manuscript that belongs to the Mendelssohn family of Berlin bears the inscription: "Sinfonie. L. v. Bthvn 1812 13ten M." A clumsy binder cut the paper so that only the first line of the M is to be seen. There was, therefore, a dispute as to whether the month were May, June or July. Beethoven wrote to Varena on May 8, 1812: "I promise you immediately a wholly new symphony for the next Academy, and, as I now have opportunity, the copying will not cost you a heller." He wrote on July 19: "A new symphony is now ready. As the Archduke Rudolph will have it copied, you will be at no expense in the matter." It is generally believed that the symphony was completed May 13, in the hope that it would be performed at a concert at Whitsuntide.

The 7th and 8th symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert. The first performance of the 7th was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on December 8, 1913.

Mr. Monteux of Boston's band was down for a concert the other eve, playing quite allegro & andante & etc.

Symphony

Trans Dec 29

NEW COMPOSER, NEW SYMPHONY, NEW VICTORIES

ARTHUR BLISS OF THE YOUNGER BRITONS

Music of Imagination and Individuality, Alive and Insistent—Tunes Again and Also All the "Modernisms"—Force and Freedom—Mr. Casals in Perfection—Brahms Inanimate and Ravel Alight

AN audience afraid-of-itself sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It is hard to believe that any considerable part of it heard Mr. Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" unimpressed and unstirred. Yet at the end of the piece came no more than brief, mild, ripple of clapping. Had not a few chagrined—and also practiced—hands persisted, it would have stilled even before Mr. Monteux could thrust the composer upon the stage. At sight of him—since the company of Friday is usually polite—the applause lengthened, was even eked out to a second recall. In these brief instants, Mr. Bliss, who is a blond, well-set, quick-minded and quick-moving young Englishman, somehow contrived to thank conductor and orchestra—and the episode of the "Color Symphony" was done.

The moral remains, and it seemed "writ large." Though Mr. Bliss sits high and distinctive among the youngest British composers; though he is making a discoverable place for himself in New Yo k; his music is scarcely known in Boston. He was a new man writing a novel piece, borrowing from no predecessor, resolutely taking his own way, preferring a Symphony of clear individualities to a Symphony of safe commonplaces. Yet "Safety First," he half-mute audience seemed to be saying to itself. It must have been interested; it should have been engrossed, enkindled. Yet was it quite prudent to applaud this new man with a new voice? What might the Mrs. Grundies, the Sir Fretfuls say? Before the audience could make decision, it was too late for any play of hands.

Every student of his neighbors at the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra has often observed this curious paralysis of the rewarding will. It is one of the congenital maladies of excessive prudence and self-consciousness. Mr. Bliss yesterday was only another, but signal, sufferer thereby—and in uncommonly good company. For the assembly was even more chilly and perfunctory to a second full-fraught music—the First Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë." And with less reason, since through ten years those pages have been acknowledged masterpiece. Possibly some among us resent any and all music written by relatively young men; would hear only pieces worn threadbare by fifty years of the concert-room. Yet a new Hamlet, and a youthful, nightly se'ls the last seat in the Or[illegible] House. There is no accounting fo[illegible] ences—no, not even for their Ba[illegible]

By

$10,000 Added

Substantial Gift, in Memory of Mr. Higginson, to the Symphony Endowment Fund

BY report of the programme-book at the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, the Endowment Fund of the Orchestra has now risen to $156,003.52, thanks to a single gift, this week, of $10,000—"in memory of Henry L. Higginson." Too slowly, however, mounts the Guarantee Fund to meet the deficit for the current season. It stands now at $65,144.34, leaving $25,000, at the least, still to be pledged. Recent contributors were:

Percy L. Atherton, Amy W. Cabot, Chromatic Club, Mrs. F. H. Lee, Mrs. Henry G. Nichols, Edward M. Pickman, Mrs. Charles R. Sanger, Newton Swift, A. W. Wheelwright, Susie E. White.

Subscriptions to either fund—or better, both—may be sent to E. B. Dane, Treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street. The amount so paid may be deducted from taxable income.

Trans Dec 31

BLISS, RAVEL, TIMELY MORAL, AND PADEREWSKI

THE PIANIST DOING THE DAY'S WORK

He Sets an Unusual Programme—He Plays With Less Than His Wonted Ardors—Again the "Color Symphony"—Also a Hint from the Years — Mitja Nikisch to Return

ABOVE all else Mr. Casals and his playing of the violoncello engrossed the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. Yet it was better disposed than its predecessor of Friday toward Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony" and lent more responsive ear to the beauties of Ravel's music from "Daphnis and Chloë." Yet neither piece—and Mr. Bliss's in particular—was too heartily applauded. It is not likely that Mr. Monteux, framing his programme, took much thought of the mood of audiences toward either music, since both richly deserved performance and had been in his mind these six months. None the less, when all had been said and done, a certain wisdom joined them in a single concert.

Loud was the outcry of the aggrieved and the resentful over Mr. Bliss's Symphony. The pounding, shrieking, mounting tumult of his final rio'ings in red, was not to be endured. The ultimate and brazen burst of his green fugue in a shower of rhythmic figures was an "outrage" upon the ear. His leaping dissonances were affronts; his sharp edged, dazzling cadenzas insults. Even his tunes, his unmistakable tunes, were no sooner sung than smothered—which comment, it is permissible to say, is a stifling of the truth. So forth and so onward. Friends of Mr. Bliss and his music dreaded and shuddered. Was he likely to be bound over to keep the peace before he could flee the town? Was yet more conservative New York—to hear the "Color Symphony" next Saturday—likely to scourge him with scorpions in succession to these Bostonian whips?

Think back ten years or fifteen to the days when the symphonic music of Joseph Maurice Ravel was slowly and adventurously making way into American concert halls; when conductors "indecently" placed it on programmes; when the infuriate of Friday and Saturday over the intruding Londoner, were not less vocal or "certain-sure" over the intruding Parisian. As it seemed to them in those days, he also wrote music "not to be endured," that was "insult" and "outrage" to the ear since the word "Bolshevik" was not then invented as epithet of personal dislike, "anarchist" sufficed to dismiss "this Monsieur Ravel." And now from Vienna to Chicago and back again, his music goes and stays, little questioned, largely admired. Even in this Boston of ours, it has prevailed. Not a conductor in recent years at Symphony Hall has been sparing of it. Ravel then, Bliss now, and Mrs. Partington [illegible] broom yesterday, today and for-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOWELL

MASS.

ISSUE OF

DEC 1923

Those who remember the visit of Deems Taylor to this city on the occasion of the performance of his cantata "The Highwayman" by the Choral Society will be interested to know that Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony orchestra proposes to present at an early date the young composer's amusing orchestral suite suggested by figures and episodes in Alice in Wonderland.

HARTFORD,

CONN.

TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction began its second series of New York concerts on Thursday evening. The second of the series is taking place this afternoon. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, is the soloist this afternoon.

Trans Dec 31

and Violoncello.

As yet the conductors are not too successful in their effort to forestall applause between the movements of short symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's upraised arm did enable him to pass without interruption from the first to the second and from the third to the fourth division, of Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony." A week before, however, Mr. Stokowski in New York, could not restrain his clapping hearers through a symphony of Mozart. Seemingly, the uplifted arm is not yet a heeded signal.

BIG MUSICAL EVENT, FEB. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play in Worcester After Three Years' Absence

Worcester Gazette – Jan 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians will return to Worcester after an absence of three seasons and give a concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This leading musical organization of New England, which is one of the finest of its kind in the world, has, according to general opinion, in the last few seasons attained new heights of eloquence and perfection in performance under Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor.

The coming concert should prove a leading event of the Worcester musical season. It will be the last time that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform in Worcester under Pierre Monteux, for this greatest conductor France has produced, is about to return to his own country. He is now completing his fifth season at the head of this orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name has long stood for the utmost in musical performance. In ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear-cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs lies its distinction. These qualities are primarily due to the genius of the leader.

Mr. Monteux is preparing a program of direct appeal, which will likewise include the greatest achievements in the field of orchestral music in different parts of the world.

Worcester Telegram Jan 1 1924

Year In

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position five years ago. He is recognized as one of the foremost authorities on French opera in the world.

Getting an

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE

MASS.

Tribune

DEC 31

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE

One of the most important concerts of the Lawrence season will be the appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians in the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, at 3:15.

The present season, which is the 43rd of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion will return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The soloist to appear with the orchestra will be Raymond Havens, the celebrated pianist whose appearance with the same orchestra in Lawrence several seasons ago made an unusual impression upon the audience. This virtuoso has played with the orchestra in a number of cities, including Boston and New York.

Every appearance of this world famous orchestra in Lawrence has been welcomed by splendid audiences. In 1919 M. Rabaud conducted the conecrt here where Mr. Havens made his instantaneous success. In 1920 the orchestra first appeared under Mr. Monteux with Miss Lily Meagher, a protege of John McCarmack, as soloist. Mr. Monteux again achieved a triumph when he returned in 1922 with Mr. Burgin, violinist, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD,

MASS.

NEWS

JAN 5 - 1924

WILL BE MONTEUX'S LAST APPEARANCE HERE WITH THE SYMPHONY

M Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium tomorrow afternoon will be his last in Springfield, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to the hands of Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place. Pierre Monteux will long be remembered here. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization, and never have its concerts been more highly praised or evidently enjoyed than under his direction. This, his fifth and last, promises to be, artistically speaking, the finest of them all.

Beethoven's symphony in A major, No 7, opus 92, opens the program tomorrow. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the 7th symphony in the spring of 1812. Prod'homme believes that the work was begun in the winter of 1811-1812. The autograph manuscript that belongs to the Mendelssohn family of Berlin bears the inscription: "Sinfonie. L. v. Bthvn 1812 13ten M." A clumsy binder cut the paper so that only the first line of the M is to be seen. There was, therefore, a dispute as to whether the month were May, June or July. Beethoven wrote to Varena on May 8, 1812: "I promise you immediately a wholly new symphony for the next Academy, and, as I now have opportunity, the copying will not cost you a heller." He wrote on July 19: "A new symphony is now ready. As the Archduke Rudolph will have it copied, you will be at no expense in the matter." It is generally believed that the symphony was completed May 13, in the hope that it would be performed at a concert at Whitsuntide.

The 7th and 8th symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert. The first performance of the 7th was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on December 8, 1913.

Mr. Monteux of Boston's band was down for a concert the other eve, playing quite allegro & andante & etc.

[168]

mphony

Trans Dec 29

[illegible] COMPOSER, NEW SYMPHONY, NEW VICTORIES

ARTHUR BLISS OF THE YOUNGER BRITONS

Music of Imagination and Individuality, Alive and Insistent—Tunes Again and Also All the "Modernisms"—Force and Freedom—Mr. Casals in Perfection—Brahms Inanimate and Ravel Alight

AN audience afraid-of-itself sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It is hard to believe that any considerable part of it heard Mr. Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" unimpressed and unstirred. Yet at the end of the piece came no more than brief, mild, ripple of clapping. Had not a few chagrined—and also practiced—hands persisted, it would have stilled even before Mr. Monteux could thrust the composer upon the stage. At sight of him—since the company of Friday is usually polite—the applause lengthened, was even eked out to a second recall. In these brief instants, Mr. Bliss, who is a blond, well-set, quick-minded and quick-moving young Englishman, somehow contrived to thank conductor and orchestra—and the episode of the "Color Symphony" was done.

The moral remains, and it seemed "writ large." Though Mr. Bliss sits high and distinctive among the youngest British composers; though he is making a discoverable place for himself in New Yo k; his music is scarcely known in Boston. He was a new man writing a novel piece, borrowing from no predecessor, resolutely taking his own way, preferring a Symphony of clear individualities to a Symphony of safe commonplaces. Yet "Safety First," he half-mute audience seemed to be saying to itself. It must have been interested; it should have been engrossed, enkindled. Yet was it quite prudent to applaud this new man with a new voice? What might the Mrs. Grundies, the Sir Fretfuls say? Before the audience could make decision, it was too late for any play of hands.

Every student of his neighbors at the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra has often observed this curious paralysis of the rewarding will. It is one of the congenital maladies of excessive prudence and self-consciousness. Mr. Bliss yesterday was only another, but signal, sufferer thereby—and in uncommonly good company. For the assembly was even more chilly and perfunctory to a second full-

---

$10,000 Added

Substantial Gift, in Memory of M Higginson, to the Symphony Endowment Fund

BY report of the programmes at the Symphony Concer terday afternoon, the Endo Fund of the Orchestra h risen to $156,003.52, thanl single gift, this week, of $ "in memory of Henry L son." Too slowly, howeve the Guarantee Fund to deficit for the current stands now at $65,144, $25,000, at the least, pledged. Recent contri Percy L. Atherton, Chromatic Club, Mrs Henry G. Nichols, Edv Mrs. Charles R. Sa A. W. Wheelwright.

Subscriptions better, both—m Dane, Treasure The amount s ed from taxa

---

) Coa himse out cas
5,00 an hem for its, and ary model. T

---

fraught musi vel's ballet, with less r
those page terpiece.
any and young m threadbare b room. Yet a nightly sells th House. There is ences—no, not eve
By

Musk

THERE

Trans Dec 31

BLISS, RAVEL, TIMELY MORAL, AND PADEREWSKI

THE PIANIST DOING THE DAY'S WORK

He Sets an Unusual Programme—He Plays With Less Than His Wonted Ardors—Again the "Color Symphony"—Also a Hint from the Years — Mitja Nikisch to Return

ABOVE all else Mr. Casals and his playing of the violoncello engrossed the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening. Yet it was better disposed than its predecessor of Friday toward Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony" and lent more responsive ear to the beauties of Ravel's music from "Daphnis and Chloë." Yet neither piece—and Mr. Bliss's in particular—was too heartily applauded. It is not likely that Mr. Monteux, framing his programme, took much thought of the mood of audiences toward either music, since both richly deserved performance and had been in his mind these six months. None the less, when all had been said and done, a certain wisdom joined them in a single concert.

Loud was the outcry of the aggrieved and the resentful over Mr. Bliss's Symphony. The pounding, shrieking, mounting tumult of his final rioings in red, was not to be endured. The ultimate and brazen burst of his green fugue in a shower of rhythmic figures was an "outrage" upon the ear. His leaping dissonances were affronts; his sharp edged, dazzling cadenzas insults. Even his tunes, his unmistakable tunes, were no sooner sung than smothered—which comment, it is permissible to say, is a stifling of the truth. So forth and so onward. Friends of Mr. Bliss and his music dreaded and shuddered. Was he likely to be bound over to keep the peace before he could flee the town? Was yet more conservative New York—to hear the "Color Symphony" next Saturday—likely to scourge him with scorpions in succession to these Bostonian whips?

Think back ten years or fifteen to the days when the symphonic music of Joseph Maurice Ravel was slowly and adventurously making way into American concert halls; when conductors "indecently" placed it on programmes; when the infuriate of Friday and Saturday over the intruding Londoner, were not less vocal or "certain-sure" over the intruding Parisian. As it seemed to them in those days, he also wrote music "not to be endured." that was "insult" and "outrage" to the ear Since the word "Bolshevik" was not then invented as epithet of personal dislike, "anarchist" sufficed to dismiss "this Monsieur Ravel." And now from Vienna to Chicago and back again, his music goes and stays, little questioned, largely admired. Often in this Boston of ours, it has prevailed. Not a conductor in recent years at Symphony Hall has been sparing of it. Ravel then, Bliss now, and Mrs. Partington her broom yesterday, today and for-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LOWELL
MASS.

ISSUE OF

DEC 1923

Those who remember the visit of Deems Taylor to this city on the occasion of the performance of his cantata "The Highwayman" by the Choral Society will be interested to know that Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony orchestra proposes to present at an early date the young composer's amusing orchestral suite suggested by figures and episodes in Alice in Wonderland.

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction began its second series of New York concerts on Thursday evening. The second of the series is taking place this afternoon. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, is the soloist this afternoon.

Trans Dec 31

---

and Violoncello.

As yet the conductors are not too successful in their effort to forestall applause between the movements of short symphonies. Last Friday and Saturday, Mr. Monteux's upraised arm did enable him to pass without interruption from the first to the second and from the third to the fourth division, of Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony." A week before, however, Mr. Stokowski in New York, could not restrain his clapping hearers through a symphony of Mozart. Seemingly, the uplifted arm is not yet a heeded signal.

Worcester Gazette — Jan 1

BIG MUSICAL EVENT, FEB. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play in Worcester After Three Years' Absence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians will return to Worcester after an absence of three seasons and give a concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This leading musical organization of New England, which is one of the finest of its kind in the world, has, according to general opinion, in the last few seasons attained new heights of eloquence and perfection in performance under Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor.

The coming concert should prove a leading event of the Worcester musical season. It will be the last time that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform in Worcester under Pierre Monteux, for this greatest conductor France has produced, is about to return to his own country. He is now completing his fifth season at the head of this orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name has long stood for the utmost in musical performance. In ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear-cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs lies its distinction. These qualities are primarily due to the genius of the leader.

Mr. Monteux is preparing a program of direct appeal, which will likewise include the greatest achievements in the field of orchestral music in different parts of the world.

Worcester Telegram Jan 1 1924

Year In

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position five years ago. He is recognized a one of the foremost authorities o French opera in the world.

Getting an

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

Tribune

DEC 31

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE

One of the most important concerts of the Lawrence season will be the appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians in the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, at 3:15.

The present season, which is the 43rd of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be the fifth under Pierre Monteux, who at its conclusion will return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent. It was in France that Mr. Monteux made his first reputation. He first attained prominence presiding over the Colonne concerts and other foremost symphony orchestras of Paris, as well as at the opera and at his own Monteux concerts. He toured Europe four years at the head of the Ballet Russe and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his genius has found its finest expression.

The soloist to appear with the orchestra will be Raymond Havens, the celebrated pianist whose appearance with the same orchestra in Lawrence several seasons ago made an unusual impression upon the audience. This virtuoso has played with the orchestra in a number of cities, including Boston and New York.

Every appearance of this world famous orchestra in Lawrence has been welcomed by splendid audiences. In 1919 M. Rabaud conducted the conecrt here where Mr. Havens made his instantaneous success. In 1920 the orchestra first appeared under Mr. Monteux with Miss Lily Meagher, a protege of John McCarmack, as soloist. Mr. Monteux again achieved a triumph when he returned in 1922 with Mr. Burgin, violinist, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1924

The Hunchback of

WILL BE MONTEUX'S LAST APPEARANCE HERE WITH THE SYMPHONY

M Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium tomorrow afternoon will be his last in Springfield, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to the hands of Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place. Pierre Monteux will long be remembered here. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization, and never have its concerts been more highly praised or evidently enjoyed than under his direction. This, his fifth and last, promises to be, artistically speaking, the finest of them all.

Beethoven's symphony in A major, No 7, opus 92, opens the program tomorrow. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the 7th symphony in the spring of 1812. Prod'homme believes that the work was begun in the winter of 1811-1812. The autograph manuscript that belongs to the Mendelssohn family of Berlin bears the inscription: "Sinfonie. L. v. Bthvn 1812 13ten M." A clumsy binder cut the paper so that only the first line of the M is to be seen. There was, therefore, a dispute as to whether the month were May, June or July. Beethoven wrote to Varena on May 8, 1812: "I promise you immediately a wholly new symphony for the next Academy, and, as I now have opportunity, the copying will not cost you a heller." He wrote on July 19: "A new symphony is now ready. As the Archduke Rudolph will have it copied, you will be at no expense in the matter." It is generally believed that the symphony was completed May 13, in the hope that it would be performed at a concert at Whitsuntide.

The 7th and 8th symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert. The first performance of the 7th was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on December 8, 1913.

King in Hawaii.

Mr. Monteux of Boston's band was down for a concert the other eve, playing quite allegro & andante & etc.

[168]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Altogether, the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's baton gave excellent renditions, particularly in the Strauss compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

- 1924

Excellent Concert By Boston Orchestra

Jacques Thibaud gave an outstanding performance of violin playing last night second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their series at the Academy of Music. The French virtuos brought out the passionate beauty of the Mozart Concerto in E flat major (Koechel No. 268) which is ordinarily played in a frigid pyrotechic style.

Monteux again showed his Catholic tendencies in the choice of the program. The first number was the well known "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, played with the vigor that the opus demands. The Symphony No. 4 in D Minor by Schumann followed. The four movements were played without a pause, lending an added effect to the work which otherwise would have lacked in continuity.

One of the most beautiful interpretations of the season was heard when the orchestra played Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens." Following the Gliere piece, Thibaud played the concerto with the orchestra. The program closed with the Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

These dances are in no sense waltzes or minutes. At times the syncopation was terrific. Borodin almost exhausted the possibilities of orchestration in creating the effects in the dances, which were as colorful as a painting by Bekst.

The performance by the Boston Symphony' Orchestra was exceptional and the excellence of the program will remain a pleasurable memory in the minds of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 6 _ 1924

SYMPHONY HERE TODAY

Director Monteux Will Give Up Conductorship Soon.

Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium this afternoon will be his last in Springfield and probably his last in America also, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place.

Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, opens the program today. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the Seventh Symphony in the spring of 1812.

The Seventh and Eighth Symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert.

The first performance of the Seventh was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on Dec. 8, 1813.

[169]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 4 - 1924

Thibaud to Play With Boston Symphony To-Night

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who has recently returned from France for a tour of America, will make an introductory appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the Brooklyn season, to take place in the Academy of Music to-night. Thibaud, who is called the greatest violinst of France, and one of the finest virtuosos of western Europe, is said to lend new beauty to the concerto of Mozart in E flat major, in which he is to be heard at this concert.

Pierre Monteux will also present the following numbers: Berlioz' overture "The Roman Carnival," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Gliere' symphonic poem "The Sirens," and th Polovtsian Dances from Borodin opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

- 1924

MUSIC

Thibaud Soloist at Academy With Boston Orchestra

A programme of rococco order was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for its second Brooklyn concert of the season, held last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and responsive with its applause.

The concert was devoted to Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Schumann's D minor symphony (No. 4, opus 120), Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," Mozart's E flat major concerto for violin (Koechel edition, No. 268), with Jacques Thibaud as solo artist, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

In the Mozart concerto, Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist (his first appearance in Brooklyn as soloist with the B. S. O.), revealed artistry of an exceptionally high order, combining a limpid tone with spiritual ethereal purity raised to the nth degree of beauty. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as Mozart should be played. He brought to his task a high endeavor backed by years of scholarly study and a reverent regard for the work. Thibaud is today the foremost representative of the French school of violin playing.

Schumann's D minor symphony revives memories of Boston concerts under Gericke, Tuck and Fiedler. For sentimental association (on the part of older music-lovers) the work commands affection. To younger ears this symphony as a whole lacks much of Schumann's accustomed and inspired "outlook," as in the first period compositions. In fact, there are spots rather dull and prosaic. Nor does the thematic material seem to be so vitally co-related or coordinated between the four movements as to make necessary playing without pause for more than half an hour (per the composer's directions).

Gliere's "The Sirens" is new to Brooklyn though heard several times in Manhattan. It is an early opus of a modern Russian composer. The opening passages are built on the Wagnerian idiom but the development and climax are more in the modern school, employing whole-tone scale effects with wailing chromatic glissando passages in the strings and woodwind. The "programme" of Gliere's symphonic poem deals with the fabulous creatures of Greek mythology who lived on an enchanted isle in the middle of the sea. By their alluring songs they enticed the sailors of passing ships, who, captivated by the irresistible music, steered toward the isle of the treacherous siren's, where their vessels were wrecked upon hidden rocks. The composition is divided into five clearly recognizable parts, namely, "The Sea," "The Isle of the Sirens," "Approach of the Vessel," "The Song of the Sirens," The Shipwreck."

Debussy preceded Gliere, it may be recalled, with the same subject, in the third of his Nocturnes for orchestra, "Siren's." But the French composer, more literal than Gliere of Russia, permitted the song of his sirens to be hummed by sixteen sopranos and mezzo-sopranos. And more alluring the effect.

The playing of the orchestra in this number was of the virtuoso order. Mr. Monteux brought to the surface all the salient points in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 6 - 1924

An Interesting New Singer.

Making his first American tour, Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will give a recital in the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Jan. 19.

The singer worked his way up from humble surroundings in the South and won an education and vocal development through his own efforts. The success of his preliminary public appearances encouraged him to try his fortunes in Europe three years ago. He first went to London, where he quickly gained recognition and where he sang by special command for King George in Buckingham Palace. This enthusiasm and popularity was repeated in Paris, and again in Vienna. Mr. Hayes has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has given recitals in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other ties of the South and West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 6 _ 1924

Henry Hadley Here With Philharmonic

This afternoon at the Academy of Music, Mr. Hadley will conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting Felix Borowski's "Youth," which had its first New York performance recently under Mr. Hadley's direction, for the first time in Brooklyn. Harold Bauer will be soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. The Gretry-Mottl ballet music from "Cephale and Procris" and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite also will be played.

The last of the three new works which Henry Hadley has selected for his concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra is "Blue Flower," a tone poem by Carl McKinley, an American composer. "Blue Flower" will have its first hearing at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Mr. McKinley is at present associated with the musical staff of the Capitol Theatre in New York, and this is his first orchestral work to be heard locally. Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, the prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "The Preuldes," complete the program.

On Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, Willem Van Hoogstraten will resume the direction of the Philharmonic Orchestra. The program will consist of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the Rhapsodie Espagnol by Ravel and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The program will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23, in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer on this occasion.

Jan 6

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Henry F. Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody," both of which pieces are to have their first performance at these concerts.

The soloist will be Robert Schmitz, French virtuoso, who will play the piano part in D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air."

Jan 6

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston debut of Cecilia Hansen, the famous Russian violinist, will add importance to the second Monday Symphony concert on January 14. This remarkable young woman will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be conducted by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS. Tribune

DEC - 1923

Jan

MONTEAUX AND SYMPHONY

How Famous Leader Deals With His Orchestra and His Public Coming Here January 20.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not of this sort; his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

His audiences Mr. Monteux strives to please with programs which are well ordered and balanced, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. He has accordingly made himself popular above all others as a compiler of programmes and in this he has always directly moulded public taste toward the best even while pleasing it. This is particularly noticeable in his courageous championship of rising and unrecognised genius alizing that the daring music of day and tomorrow is apt to strange at first, Mr. Monteux made it famous by making it miliar. His "Concerts Monteux" Paris Casino became generally for pioneer performances—notorious. It was here that Monteux conducted the first formance, now historical, of "Rites of Spring" by Stravinsky then considered merely wild lawless, but now universally teemed. The music caused a riot the audience; eggs and all of vegetables wer thrown. The of vegetables were thrown. The managed to escape, although his hat did not. The public had heard the music, and therefore Monteux repeated it the following week.

These innovations are not always popular at the time, but later when the music becomes understood and appreciated Mr. Monteux thanked for his efforts. In his present post, while always giving standard favorites of the orchestra repertory their due predominance he has revealed his evident instinct for singling out new genius, American and foreign.

Symphony orchestra will be heard at the Colonial theatre here Sunday afternoon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

Music Notes A

FOLLOWING its statem in the program book scribers who have cover its annual deficit, Symphony Orchestra publishe cial record for the last thr From this it appears that the reduced from $121,000 in 192 $83,000 in 1923

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

The Boston Orchestra presented Stuart Mason's new suite, conducted by the composer. His present work is a complete contrast to his "Rhapsodie on a Persian Air," for piano and orchestra, in which he employed the modern idiom. His suite is written in the eighteenth century manner and his score is said to "borrow the charm of Mozart and Rameau without slavish imitation."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 6 - 1924

Boston Orches in a Hodge Po of Old-time M

By GRENA BENNET

Yesterday afternoon' gramme of Boston Sy Orchestra in Carnegie H a hodge-podge of good ioned music, charmin melodies, and the ravi modern cacophonist.

In the first class wer with his magnificent overture superbly and Mozart's E flat featuring Jacques Thibaud and his beautiful violin artistry.

Ravel's excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe," like delicate rhymes intoned with grace, constituted the poetic part of the programme.

But the feature was Bliss's so-called "Color" symphony, which was introduced locally at yesterday's event. The British composer may, as the programme stated, have found inspiration in different tints, but it cannot be said that his hearers discovered any distinguishing colors in the various sections of his symphony. With the same futile result he might have entitled the movements North, South, East and West, or even Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter and reached.

His "Purple" first movement contained fragments of Irish folk song throttled in clangour. The "Red" section was a veritable anarchy of clashing instruments with occasional passages suggesting the wailing oboe and staccato drum taps of the midway plaisaunce.

500

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 6 -

Ocean.

Henry Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23 in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Altogether, the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's baton gave excellent renditions, particularly in the Strauss compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

- 1924

Excellent Concert By Boston Orchestra

Jacques Thibaud gave an outstanding performance of violin playing last night at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their series at the Academy of Music. The French virtuos brought out the passionate beauty of the Mozart Concerto in E flat major (Koechel No. 268) which is ordinarily played in a frigid pyrotechic style.

Monteux again showed his Catholic tendencies in the choice of the program. The first number was the well known "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, played with the vigor that the opus demands. The Symphony No. 4 in D Minor by Schumann followed. The four movements were played without a pause, lending an added effect to the work which otherwise would have lacked in continuity.

One of the most beautiful interpretations of the season was heard when the orchestra played Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens." Following the Gliere piece, Thibaud played the concerto with the orchestra. The program closed with the Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

These dances are in no sense waltzes or minutes. At times the syncopation was terrific. Borodin almost exhausted the possibilities of orchestration in creating the effects in the dances, which were as colorful as a painting by Bekst.

The performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was exceptional and the excellence of the program will remain a pleasurable memory in the minds of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN6 _ 1924

SYMPHONY HERE TODAY

Director Monteux Will Give Up Conductorship Soon

Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium this afternoon will be his last in Springfield and probably his last in America also, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place.

Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, opens the program today. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the Seventh Symphony in the spring of 1812.

The Seventh and Eighth Symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert.

The first performance of the Seventh was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on Dec. 8, 1813.

[169]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 4 - 1924

Thibaud to Play With Boston Symphony To-Night

